PREFACE

THE importance of local history is appreciated more to-day than ever before. A general desire is being manifested by the people to preserve the records made by the pioneers, in every community. In obedience to this universal demand, historical firms have sprung into existence, and county, city and town histories have appeared in great numbers in the past decade. Knowing that Sangamon County afforded an abundance of material for an interesting and profitable history, the INTER-STATE PUBLISHING Co., in the Spring of 1881, placed in the field a corps of experienced historians, with instructions to prepare a faithful and reliable history of the County.

As preliminary to the work, they secured the co-operation of the officers of the Old Settlers' Society, who appointed a committee to read and revise the manuscript of the general history, and a like committee in each township, to examine and correct the history of the respective townships. With but one or two exceptions, every man thus appointed served to the best of his ability, and the wisdom of the choice of the committees is shown in the work performed. We feel confident that we here present to our patrons and the citizens of the County, a history that is as correct as can be made at this day. Special care was taken in its compilation, hundreds of men and women being interviewed, and every source of information canvassed, that facts alone should be incorporated in it. The manuscript was then read to the committees, and time given to make such corrections as they deemed necessary, and each member was urged to exercise care, and not to be backward in making such corrections or such suggestions as might be deemed necessary to insure correctness and add to the value of the work. Our thanks are certainly due to these men, a number of whom spent much time, with no thought of other reward than in the consciousness of a duty well performed. It would be utterly impossible to mention all who thus labored, and who did all in their power to make the History of Sangamon County a model county history. But we must not forget Hon. John T. Stuart, Chairman of the General Committee, on whose advice we greatly relied, and who never once refused to aid us in our work, treating us with a kindness that will ever be appreciated, furnishing much valuable information for the history, and speaking a good word for us upon every occasion. Hon. William H. Herndon also deserves great credit. On more than one occasion he walked seven miles to meet with the committee in the examination of the manuscript, and few errors escaped his notice, especially in relation to facts that transpired at an early day. Of Hon. Charles H. Lanphier, we can say that few men are better posted in the affairs of the county, especially in political matters, since 1840. He was a close reader, his experience in newspaper work and proof-reading aiding him here, and he did not fail us when asked to pass judgment upon the manuscript. If not present when the committee was in session, he would take the manuscript and read it carefully, noting such corrections as he believed it right and proper to make. Zimri A. Enos and John DeCamp, though not as active as those mentioned, yet we believe it can be said of them and of the woman of the Scriptures, that they "done what they could." Of the members of the township committee, thanks are especially due M. G. Wadsworth, editor of the Auburn Citizen, who furnished much valuable information.

R. W. Diller, President of the Old Settlers' Society, was indeed a friend to the enterprise. He entered into the work with his whole soul, and it appeared that he could do too much for us. Through his influence much valuable information was obtained, and valuable aid was rendered by him to us, in other ways. We shall always kindly remember him, and ever be grateful for the many favors shown to us. James H. Matheny, too, we can never forget. It mattered not how busy he was, he always found time to render us all the aid in his power. We confess that we have at times felt ashamed that we were compelled to call on him so often for information; but if he ever felt provoked at us, he never showed it in his action. L. H. Tichnor, County Clerk, with his deputy, Mr. Cleverly, placed us under many obligations. No men could be more accommodating. The same can be said of all the county officers, not one of whom showed any disposition to avoid aiding us in our work. The State officers were also as accommodating to us as one could desire.

J. C. Power, author of the "History of the Early Settlers of Sangamon County," took great pains to aid us in our work, and having gone over much of the ground that we were compelled to travel, his advice and counsel was valuable. Never did he show, by word or action, that he believed us to be intruding upon his rights, but seemed at all times to manifest great interest in our welfare, and expressed an ardent desire for our success. The history of the Early Settlers of Sangamon County we regard as the best work of its kind known to us.

The press of the county is also entitled to our special gratitude. Without an exception we have received the kindest treatment from each, their files being placed at our disposal from which we gathered much of the information contained in this volume. The editors of the various papers we now number among our friends, and trust that the kind feelings will be retained.

In conclusion, we will say that our work is now done; the History of Sangamon County you have placed in your hands. We trust that you will be well pleased with it. It has in a measure, to us, a labor of love, and the pleasant hours that we have spent with the pioneers of old Sangamon, will often be recalled, and the remembrance will be one of unalloyed pleasure.

HISTORY OF ILLINOIS.

INTRODUCTORY.

Illinois, the fourth State in the Union in wealth, population and political power, lies in the very heart of the upper valley of the Mississippi. Stretching over five degrees of latitude, from $37\frac{1}{2}$ to $42\frac{1}{2}$, it has considerable diversity, both of soil and climate. The boundary line of the State is about twelve hundred miles. From the point where it joins the Wisconsin line on the northeast, Lake Michigan bounds it on the east for fifty miles to the northeast corner of Indiana; thence a line is drawn due south one hundred and sixty-eight miles to the Wabash river. The Wabash and the Ohio rivers constitute the remainder of the eastern and southern boundary, while the lordly Mississippi washes its entire western border. The extreme length of the State is three hundred and seventy-eight miles; the extreme breadth, in the latitude of Danville and Rushville, is two hundred and ten miles, and the average breadth is about one hundred and fifty miles.

Illinois contains 55,405 square miles, or more than 35,000,000 acres of land. Fully two-thirds of this is prairie, and nearly all of it is susceptible of proper cultivation. The State has ten thousand more square miles than New York or Ohio, and is larger than Pennsylvania and New Jersey combined, and is almost as large as all the New England States taken together.

THE MOUND-BUILDERS.

That Illinois was inhabited by a race of men prior to the present Indian race that yet inhabit a portion of the Union hardly admits of a doubt. It is clearly demonstrated by the well authenticated accounts of discoveries made that a civilized people, and one highly cultivated, once occupied the great prairie State and various parts of the country now constituting the American Union, but the date of their rule in the western world is so remote that all traces of this history, progress and decay, lie buried in the deepest obscurity. This pre-historic race is known as the Mound-Builders, from the numerous large mounds of earth-works left by them. Their character can be but partially gleaned from the internal evidences and peculiarities of all that remains of them—the mounds. Remains of what were apparently villages, altars, temples, idols, cemeteries, monuments, camps, fortifications, and pleasure grounds, have been found, but nothing showing of what material were their habitations.

The question as to the origin of the Mound-Builders is an interesting one. If they were not the ancestors of the Indians, who were they? Those who do not believe in the common parentage of mankind contend that they were an indigenous race of the western hemisphere; others think they came from the East, and imagine they are coincident with the religion of the Hindoos and Southern Tartars and the supposed theology of the Mound-Builders. They were, no doubt, idolaters, and it has been conjectured that the sun was the object of their adoration. The mounds were generally built in a situation affording a view of the rising sun; when enclosed in walls their gateways were toward the east; the caves in which their dead were occasionally buried always opened in the same direction; whenever a mound was partially enclosed by a semi-circular pavement, it was on the east side; when bodies were buried in graves, as was frequently the case, they were laid in a direction east and west; and, finally, medals have been found representing the sun and his rays of light.

At what period they came to this country, is likewise a matter of speculation. From the comparatively rude state of the arts among them, it has been inferred that the time was very remote. Their axes were of stone. Their raiment, judging from fragments which have been discovered, consisted of the bark of trees, interwoven with feathers; and their military works were such as a people would erect who had just passed to the pastoral state of society from that dependent alone upon hunting and fishing.

The mounds and other ancient earth-works constructed by this people are far more abundant than generally supposed, from the fact that while some are quite large, the greater part of them are small and inconspicuous. Along nearly all our water courses that are large enough to be navigated with a canoe, the mounds are almost invariably found, covering the base points and headlands of the bluffs which border the narrower valleys; so that when one finds himself in such positions as to command the grandest views for river scenery, he may almost always discover that he is standing upon, or in close proximity to, some one or more of these traces of the labors of an ancient people.

One of the most singular earth-works in the State was found on the top of a ridge near the east bank of the Sinsinawa creek in the lead region. It resembled some huge animal, the head, ears, nose, legs and tail, and general outline of which being as perfect as if made by men versed in modern art. The ridge on which it was situated stands on the prairie, 300 yards wide, 100 feet in height, and rounded on the top by a deep deposit of clay. Centrally, along the line of its summit, and thrown up in the form of an embankment three feet high, extended the outline of a quadruped measuring 250 feet from the tip of the nose to the end of the tail, and having a width of 18 feet at the center of the body. The head was 35 feet in length, the ears 10 feet, legs 60 and tail 75. The curvature in both the fore and hind legs was natural to an animal lying on its side. The general outline of the figure most nearly resembled the extinct animal known to geologists as the Megatherium. The question naturally arises, by whom and for what purpose was this earth figure raised? Some have conjectured that numbers of this now extinct animal lived and roamed over the prairies of Illinois when the Mound-Builders first made their appearance on the upper part of the Mississippi Valley, and that the wonder and admiration, excited by the colossal dimensions of these huge creatures, found some expression in the erection of this figure. The bones of some similar gigantic animals were exhumed on this stream about three miles from the same place.

Mr. Breckenridge, who examined the antiquities of the Western country in 1817, speaking of the mounds in the American Bottom, says: "The great number and extremely large size of some of them may be regarded as furnishing, with other circumstances, evidences of their antiquity. I have sometimes been induced to think that at the period when they were constructed there was a population here as numerous as that which once animated the borders of the Nile or Euphrates, or of Mexico. The most numerous, as well as considerable, of these remains are found in precisely those parts of the country where the traces of a numerous population might be looked for, namely, from the mouth of the Ohio on the east side of the Mississippi, to the Illinois river, and on the west from the St. Francis to the Missouri. I am perfectly satisfied that cities similar to those of ancient Mexico, of several hundred thousand souls, have existed in this country."

OTHER RACES.

Following the Mound-Builders as inhabitants of North America, were as it is supposed, the people who reared the magnificent cities the ruins of which are found in Central America. This people was far more civilized and advanced in the arts than were the Mound-Builders. The cities built by them, judging from the ruins of broken columns, fallen arches and crumbling walls of temples, palaces and pyramids, which in some places for miles bestrew the ground, must have been of great extent, magnificent and very populous. When we consider the vast period of time necessary to erect such colossal structures, and, again, the time required to reduce them to their present ruined state, we can conceive something of their antiquity. These cities must have been old when many of the ancient cities of the Orient were being built.

The third race inhabiting North America distinct from the former two in every particular, is the present Indians. They were, when visited by the early discoverers, without cultivation, refinement or literature, and far behind the Mound-Builders in the knowledge of the arts. The question of their origin has long interested archaeologists, and is the most difficult they have been called upon to answer. Of their predecessors the Indian tribes knew nothing; they even had no traditions respecting them. It is quite certain that they were the successors of a race which had entirely passed away ages before the discovery of the New World. One hypothesis is that the American Indians are an original race indigenous to the Western hemisphere. Those who entertain this view think their peculiarities of physical structure preclude the possibility of a common parentage with the rest of mankind. Prominent among those distinctive traits is the hair, which in the red man is round, in the white man oval, and in the black man flat. A more common supposition, however, is that they are a derivative race, and sprang from one or more of the ancient peoples of Asia. This last is doubtless the true theory.

INDIANS.

When Christopher Columbus had finally succeeded in demonstrating the truth of his theory that by sailing westward from Europe land would be discovered, landing on the Island of Bermuda he supposed that he had reached the East Indies. This was an error, but it led to the adoption of the name of "Indians" for the inhabitants of the newly discovered country, by which name the red men of America have ever since been known.

At the time of the discovery of America the Algonquins, one of the most powerful tribes of Indians, occupied the seaboard, while the Iroquois, another great tribe, inhabited the country almost surrounded by them. The Algonquins spread over vast territory, and various tribes of Algonquin lineage sprung up over the country, in time adopting distinct tribal customs and laws. An almost continuous warfare was carried on between tribes, but when the white men came a confederacy of Indian tribes were formed and every foot of territory was fiercely disputed. The Algonquins formed the most extensive alliance to resist the encroachment of the whites, especially the English. Such was the nature of King Philip's war. This King, with his Algonquin braves, spread terror and desolation throughout New England. With the Algonquins as the controlling spirit, a confederacy of continental proportions was the result, embracing in its alliance the tribes of every name and lineage from the northern lakes to the gulf, Pontiac, having breathed into them his implacable hate of the English intruders, ordered the conflict to commence, and all the British colonies trembled before the desolating fury of Indian vengeance.

ILLINOIS CONFEDERACY.

The Illinois confederacy, the various tribes of which comprised most of the Indians of Illinois at one time, was composed of five tribes: the Tamaroas, Michigans, Kaskaskias, Cahokas, and Peorias. The Illinois, Miamis and Delawares were of the same stock. As early as 1670, the priest, Father Marquette, mentions frequent visits made by individuals of this confederacy to the missionary station at St. Esprit, near the western extremity of Lake Superior. At that time they lived west of the Mississippi, in eight villages, whither they had been driven from the shores of Lake Michigan by the Iroquois. Shortly afterward they began to return to their old hunting ground, and most of them finally settled in Illinois. Joliet and Marquette, in 1673, met with a band of them on their famous voyage of discovery down the Mississippi. They were treated with the greatest hospitality by the principal chief. On their return voyage up the Illinois river they stopped at the principal town of the confederacy, situated on the banks of the river seven miles below the present town of Ottawa. It was then called Kaskaskia. Marquette returned to the village in 1675 and established the mission of the Immaculate Conception, the oldest in Illinois. When, in 1679, LaSalle visited the town, it had greatly increased, numbering 460 lodges, and at the annual assembly of the different tribes, from 6,000 to 8,000 souls. In common with other western tribes, they became involved in the conspiracy of Pontiac, although displaying no very great warlike spirit. Pontiac lost his life by the hands of one of the braves of the Illinois tribe, which so enraged the nations that had followed him as their leader that they fell upon the Illinois to avenge his death, and almost annihilated them.

STARVED ROCK.

Tradition states that a band of this tribe, in order to escape the general slaughter, took refuge upon the high rock on the Illinois river known as Starved Rock. Nature has made this one of the most formidable military fortresses in the world. From the waters which wash its base it rises to an altitude of one hundred and twenty-five feet. Three of its sides it is impossible to scale, while the other may be climbed with difficulty. From its summit, almost as inaccessible as an eagle's nest, the valley of the Illinois is seen as a landscape of exquisite beauty. The river near by struggles between a number of wooded islands, while further below it quietly meanders through vast meadows till it disappears like a thread of light in the dim distance. On the summit of this rock the Illinois were besieged by a superior force of the Pottawatomies whom the great strength of their natural fortress enabled them to keep at bay. Hunger and thirst, however, soon accomplished what the army was unable to effect. Surrounded by a relentless foe, without food or water, they took a last look at their beautiful hunting grounds, and with true Indian fortitude laid down and died from starvation. Years afterwards their bones were seen whitening in that place.

At the beginning of the present century the remnants of this once powerful confederacy were forced into a smaller compass around Kaskaskia. A few years later they emigrated to the southwest, and in 1850 they were in the Indian Territory, and numbered but eighty-four persons.

EARLY DISCOVERIES.

Nicholas Perrot, a Frenchman, was the first white man to visit the present great State of Illinois. In the year 1671 he was sent to Chicago by M. Talon, Intendant of Canada, for the purpose of inviting the Indians to a peace convention, to be held at Green Bay. The object of this convention was the formation of a plan for the exploration of the Mississippi River. De Soto, the Spanish explorer, had discovered the river nearly one hundred and fifty years previously, but did not effect a settlement or explore the country any further. It remained as it was until the French determined to visit it, for which purpose it was deemed a wise policy, as far as possible, to secure the friendship and co-operation of the Indians before venturing upon an enterprise which their hostility might render disastrous. A plan was accordingly arranged, and Louis Joliet joined Father Jacques Marquette, at the Jesuit Mission, on the Strait of Mackinaw, and, with five other Frenchmen and a simple outfit, the daring explorers on the 17th of May, 1673, set out on their perilous voyage to discover the Mississippi. Coasting along the northern shore of Lake Michigan, they entered Green Bay, and passed thence up Fox River and Lake Winnebago to a village of the Muscatines and Miamis, where great interest was taken in the expedition by the natives. With guides they proceeded down the river. Arriving at the portage, they soon carried their light canoes and scanty baggage to the Wisconsin, about three miles distant. Their guides now refused to accompany them further, and endeavored, by reciting the dangers incident to the voyage, to induce them to return. They stated that huge demons dwelt in the great river, whose voices could be heard a long distance, and who engulfed in the raging waters all who came within their reach. They also represented that if any of them should escape the dangers of the river, fierce tribes of Indians dwelt upon its banks ready to complete the work of destruction. They proceeded on their journey, however, and on the 17th of June pushed their frail barks on the bosom of the stately Mississippi, down which they smoothly glided for nearly a hundred miles. Here Joliet and Marquette, leaving their canoes in charge of their men, went on the western shore, where they discovered an Indian village, and were kindly treated. They journeyed on down the unknown river, passing the mouth of the Illinois, then running into the current of the muddy Missouri, and afterwards the waters of the Ohio joined with them on their journey southward. Near the mouth of the Arkansas, they discovered Indians who showed signs of hostility; but when Marquette's mission of peace was made known to them, they were kindly received. After proceeding up the Arkansas a short distance, at the advice of the natives they turned their faces northward to retrace their steps. After several weeks of hard toil they reached the Illinois, up which stream they proceeded to Lake Michigan. Following the western shore of the lake, they entered Green Bay the latter part of September, having traveled a distance of 2,500 miles.

FIRST SETTLEMENTS.

On his way up the Illinois, Marquette visited the Kaskaskias, near what is now Utica, in LaSalle county. The following year he returned, and established among them the mission of the Immaculate Conception. This was the last act of his life. He died in Michigan, May 18, 1675. The town was named Kaskaskia by Marquette.

The first military occupation of the country was at Fort Crevecoeur, erected in 1680; but there is no evidence that a settlement was commenced there, or at Peoria, on the lake above, at that early date. The first settlement of which there is any authentic account was commenced with the building of Fort St. Louis, on the Illinois river, in 1682; but this was soon abandoned. The oldest permanent settlement, not only in Illinois, but in the valley of the Mississippi, is at Kaskaskia, situated six miles above the mouth of the Kaskaskia river. This was settled in 1690 by the removal of the mission from old Kaskaskia, or Ft. St. Louis, on the Illinois river. Cahokia was settled about the same time. The reason for the removal of the old Kaskaskia settlement and mission was probably because the dangerous and difficult route by Lake Michigan and the Chicago portage had been almost abandoned, and travelers and traders traveled down and up the Mississippi by the Fox and Wisconsin rivers. It was removed to the vicinity of the Mississippi in order to be in the line of travel from Canada to Louisiana, that is, the lower part of it, for it was all Louisiana then south of the lakes. Illinois came into possession of the French in 1682, and was a dependency of Canada and a part of Louisiana. During the period of French rule in Louisiana, the population probably never exceeded ten thousand. To the year 1730 the following five distinct settlements were made in the territory of Illinois, numbering, in population, 140 French families, about 600 "converted" Indians, and many traders: Cahokia, near the mouth of Cahokia creek, and about five miles below the present city of St. Louis; St. Philip, about forty-five miles below Cahokia; Fort Chartres, twelve miles above Kaskaskia; Kaskaskia, situated on the Kaskaskia river six miles above its confluence with the Mississippi, and Prairie du Rocher, near Fort Chartres. Fort Chartres was built under the direction of the Mississippi Company in 1718, and was for a time the headquarters of the military commandants of the district of Illinois, and the most impregnable fortress in North America. It was also the center of wealth and fashion in the West. For about eighty years the French retained peaceable possession of Illinois. Their amiable disposition and tact of ingratiating themselves with the Indians enabled them to escape almost entirely the broils which weakened and destroyed other colonies. Whether exploring remote rivers or traversing hunting grounds in pursuit of game, in the social circle or as participants in the religious exercises of the church, the red men became their associates, and were treated with the kindness and consideration of brothers. For more than a hundred years peace between the white man and the red was unbroken, and when at last this reign of harmony terminated it was not caused by the conciliatory Frenchman, but by the blunt and sturdy Anglo-Saxon. During this century, or until the country was occupied by the English, no regular court was ever held. When, in 1765, the country passed into the hands of the English, many of the French, rather than submit to a change in their institutions, preferred to leave their homes and seek a new abode. There are, however, at the present time, a few remnants of the old French stock in the State, who still retain to a great extent the ancient habits and customs of their fathers.

ENGLISH RULE.

In 1750 France claimed the whole valley of the Mississippi, and England the right to extend her possessions westward as far as she might desire. Through colonial controversies, the two mother countries were precipitated into a bloody war within the Northwestern Territory, George Washington firing the first gun of the military struggle which resulted in the overthrow of the French not only in Illinois, but in North America. The French evinced a determination to retain control of the territory bordering the Ohio and Mississippi from Canada to the Gulf, and so long as the English colonies were confined to the sea-coast there was little reason for controversy. As the English, however, became acquainted with this beautiful and fertile portion of our country, they not only learned the value of the vast territory, but also resolved to set up a counter claim to the soil. The French established numerous military and trading posts from the frontiers of Canada to New Orleans, and in order to establish also their claims to jurisdiction over the country, they carved the lilies of France on the forest trees, or sunk plates of metal in the ground. These measures did not, however, deter the English from going on with their explorations; and though neither party resorted to arms, yet the conflict was gathering, and it was only a question of time when the storm should burst upon the frontier settlement. The French based their claims upon discoveries, the English on grants of territory extending from ocean to ocean, but neither party paid the least attention to the prior claims of the Indians. From this position of affairs, it was evident that actual collision between the contending parties would not much longer be deferred. The English Government, in anticipation of a war, urged the Governor of Virginia to lose no time in building two forts, which were equipped by arms from England. The French anticipated the English, and gathered a considerable force to defend their possessions. The Governor determined to send a messenger to the nearest French post and demand an explanation. This resolution of the Governor brought into the history of our country for the first time the man of all others whom America most loves to honor, namely, George Washington. He was chosen, although not yet twenty-one years of age, as the one to perform this delicate and difficult mission. With five companions, he set out on November 10, 1753, and after a perilous journey returned January 6, 1754. The struggle commenced, and continued long, and was bloody and fierce; but on the 10th of October, 1765, the ensign of France was replaced on the ramparts of Fort Chartres by the flag of Great Britain. This fort was the depot of supplies and the place of rendezvous for the united forces of the French. At this time the colonies of the Atlantic seaboard were assembled in preliminary congress at New York, dreaming of liberty and independence for the continent; and Washington, who led the expedition against the French for the English king, in less than ten years was commanding the forces opposed to the English tyrant. Illinois, besides being constructively a part of Florida for over one hundred years, during which time no Spaniard set foot upon her soil or rested his eyes upon her beautiful plains, for nearly ninety years had been in the actual occupation of the French, their puny settlements slumbering quietly in colonial dependence on the distant waters of the Kaskaskia, Illinois and Wabash.

GEN. CLARK'S EXPLOITS.

The Northwest Territory was now entirely under English rule, and on the breaking out of the Revolutionary war the British held every post of importance in the West. While the colonists of the East were maintaining a fierce struggle with the armies of England, their western frontiers were ravaged by merciless butcheries of Indian warfare. The jealousy of the savage was aroused to action by the rapid extension of American settlement westward and the improper influence exerted by a number of military posts garrisoned by British troops. To prevent indiscriminate slaughter arising from these causes, Illinois became the theater of some of the most daring exploits connected with American history. The hero of the achievements by which this beautiful land was snatched as a gem from the British crown, was George Rogers Clark, of Virginia. He had closely watched the movements of the British throughout the Northwest, and understood their whole plan; he also knew the Indians were not unanimously in accord with the English, and therefore was convinced that if the British could be defeated and expelled from the Northwest, the natives might be easily awed into neutrality. Having convinced himself that the enterprise against the Illinois settlement might easily succeed, he repaired to the capital of Virginia, arriving November 5, 1777. While he was on his way, fortunately, Burgoyne was defeated (October 17), and the spirits of the colonists were thereby greatly encouraged. Patrick Henry was Governor of Virginia, and at once entered heartily into Clark's plans. After satisfying the Virginia leaders of the feasibility of his project, he received two sets of instructions,—one secret, the other open. The latter authorized him to enlist seven companies to go to Kentucky, and serve three months after their arrival in the West. The secret order authorized him to arm these troops, to procure his powder and lead of General Hand, at Pittsburg, and to proceed at once to subjugate the country.

With these instructions General Clark repaired to Pittsburg, choosing rather to raise his men west of the mountains, as he well knew all were needed in the colonies for the conflict there. Enlisting his men, he at once proceeded to carry out his instructions. His plan was to go by water as far as Fort Massac, and thence march direct to Kaskaskia. Here he intended to surprise the garrison, and after its capture go to Cahokia, then to Vincennes, and lastly to Detroit. Each of these posts were in turn captured.

The services of Clark proved of essential advantage to his countrymen. They disconcerted the plans of Hamilton, the Governor of Detroit, who was intending to make a vigorous and concerted attack upon the frontier, and not only saved the western frontier from depredations by the savages, but also greatly cooled the ardor of the Indians for carrying on a contest in which they were not likely to be the gainers. Had it not been for this small army, a union of all the tribes from Maine to Georgia against the colonies might have been effected, and the whole current of our history changed.

COUNTY OF ILLINOIS.

In October, 1778, after the successful campaign of Colonel Clark, the assembly of Virginia erected the conquered country, embracing all the territory northwest of the Ohio river, into the county of Illinois, which was doubtless the largest county in the world, exceeding in its dimensions the whole of Great Britain and Ireland. To speak more definitely, it contained the territory now embraced in the great States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Wisconsin and Michigan. On the 12th of December, 1778, John Todd was appointed Lieutenant Commandant of this county by Patrick Henry, then Governor of Virginia, and accordingly, also, the first of Illinois county.

NORTHWESTERN TERRITORY.

Illinois continued to form a part of Virginia until March 1, 1784, when that State ceded all the territory north of the Ohio to the United States. Immediately the general government proceeded to establish a form of government for the settlers in the territories thus ceded. This form continued until the passage of the ordinance of 1787, for the government of the Northwestern Territory. No man can study the secret history of this ordinance and not feel that Providence was guiding with sleepless eye the destinies of these unborn States. American legislation has never achieved anything more admirable, as an internal government, than this comprehensive ordinance. Its provisions concerning the distribution of property, the principles of civil and religious liberty which it laid at the foundation of the communities since established, and the efficient and simple organization by which it created the first machinery of civil society, are worthy of all the praise that has ever been given them.

ORDINANCE OF 1787.

For some years Thomas Jefferson had vainly tried to secure a system of government for the Northwestern Territory. He was an emancipationist and favored the exclusion of slavery from the territory, and in this he was opposed by almost the entire south. In July, 1787, Manasseh Cutler appeared in New York to lobby on the question of organization of the Northwestern Territory. He was a courtly gentleman of the old style, a man of commanding presence and of inviting face. He came representing a Massachusetts company that desired to purchase a tract of land, now included in Ohio, for the purpose of planting a colony. This company, together with certain speculators in New York, enabled him to represent a demand for 5,500,000 acres. The amount thus received from the sale of this land would apply towards reducing the National debt, which Jefferson was anxious should be paid as soon as possible.

Massachusetts then owned the territory of Maine, which she was crowding on the market. She was opposed to opening the northwestern region. This fired the zeal of Virginia. The South caught the inspiration, and all exalted Dr. Cutler. The entire South rallied around him. Massachusetts could not vote against him, because many of the constituents of her members were interested personally in the Western speculation. Thus Cutler, making friends in the South, and doubtless using all the arts of the lobby, was enabled to command the situation. True to deeper convictions, he dictated one of the most compact and finished documents of wise statesmanship that has ever adorned any human law book. He borrowed from Jefferson the term "Articles of Compact," which, preceding the federal constitution, rose into the most sacred character. He then followed very closely the constitution of Massachusetts, adopted three years before. Its most prominent points were:

1. The exclusion of slavery from the territory forever.
2. Provision for public schools, giving one township for a seminary and every section numbered 16 in each township; that is, one thirty-sixth of all the land for public schools.
3. A provision prohibiting the adoption of any constitution or the enactment of any law that should nullify pre-existing contracts.

Be it forever remembered that this compact declared that "religion, morality, and knowledge being necessary to good government and the happiness of mankind, schools and the means of education shall always be encouraged." Dr. Cutler planted himself on this platform and would not yield. Giving his unqualified declaration that it was that or nothing,—that unless they could make the land desirable they did not want it,—he took his horse and buggy and started for the constitutional convention at Philadelphia. On July 13, 1787, the bill was put upon its passage, and was unanimously adopted. Thus the great States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, and Wisconsin, a vast empire, were consecrated to freedom, intelligence, and morality. Thus the great heart of the nation was prepared to save the Union of States, for it was this act that was the salvation of the republic and the destruction of slavery. Soon the South saw their great blunder and tried to have the compact repealed. In 1803 Congress referred it to a committee, of which John Randolph was chairman. He reported that this ordinance was a compact and opposed repeal. Thus it stood, a rock in the way of the on-rushing sea of slavery.

Gen. Arthur St. Clair was, by Congress, elected Governor of this vast territory.

ILLINOIS TERRITORY.

After the division of the Northwestern Territory, Illinois became one of the counties of the Territory of Indiana, from which it was separated by an act of Congress February 3, 1809, forming the Territory of Illinois, with a population estimated at 9,000, and then included the present State of Wisconsin. It was divided, at the time, into two counties—St. Clair and Randolph. John Boyle, of Kentucky, was appointed Governor, by the President, James Madison, but declining, Ninian Edwards, of the same State, was then appointed and served with distinction; and after the organization of Illinois as a State he served in the same capacity, being its third Governor.

During Governor Edwards' administration the war of 1812 commenced, and the few whites in the State had to contend against a savage foe incited on to deeds of violence by the British officers sent out for that purpose. The massacre at Fort Dearborn, of helpless prisoners, by the infuriated Indians, forms a black page in the history of Illinois. Several expeditions were put on foot by Governor Edwards against the Indians, and in the various campaigns the Governor bore an honorable and heroic part. Peace came at last, the Indian depredations ceased, and the Territory of Illinois was again on the road to prosperity.

STATE ORGANIZATION.

In January of 1818 the Territorial Legislature forwarded to Nathaniel Pope, delegate in Congress from Illinois, a petition praying for admission into the National Union as a State. On April 18th of the same year Congress passed the enabling act, and December 3, after the State government had been organized and Governor Bond had signed the Constitution, Congress by a resolution declared Illinois to be "one of the United States of America, and admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States in all respects."

FIRST CONSTITUTION.

In July and August of 1818 a convention was held at Kaskaskia for the purpose of drafting a constitution. This constitution was not submitted to a vote of the people for their approval or rejection, it being well known that they would approve it. It was about the first organic law of any State in the Union to abolish imprisonment for debt. The first election under the constitution was held on the third Thursday and the two succeeding days in September, 1818. Shadrach Bond was elected Governor, and Pierre Menard Lieutenant Governor. Their term of office extended four years. At this time the State was divided into fifteen counties, the population being about 40,000. Of this number by far the larger portion were from the Southern States. The salary of the Governor was $1,000, while that of the Treasurer was $500. The legislature re-enacted, verbatim, the Territorial Code, the penalties of which were unnecessarily severe. Whipping, stocks and pillory were used for minor offenses, and for arson, rape, horse stealing, etc., death by hanging was the penalty. These laws, however, were modified in 1821.

The legislature first convened at Kaskaskia, the ancient seat of empire for more than one hundred and fifty years, both for the French and Americans. Provisions were made, however, for the removal of the seat of government by this legislature. A place in the wilderness on the Kaskaskia river was selected and named Vandalia. From Vandalia it was removed to Springfield in the year 1839.

THE WINNEBAGO WAR.

The Indians, who for some years were on peaceful terms with the whites, became troublesome in 1827. The Winnebagoes, Sacs and Foxes and other tribes had been at war more than a hundred years. In the summer of 1827 a war party of the Winnebagoes surprised a party of Chippewas and killed eight of them. Four of the murderers were arrested and delivered to the Chippewas, by whom they were immediately shot. This was the first irritation of the Winnebagoes. Red Bird, a chief of this tribe, in order to avenge the execution of the four warriors of his own people, attacked the Chippewas, but was defeated; and being determined to satisfy his thirst for revenge by some means surprised and killed several white men. Upon receiving intelligence of these murders, the whites who were working the lead mines in the vicinity of Galena formed a body of volunteers, and, re-inforced by a company of United States troops, marched into the country of the Winnebagoes. To save their nation from the miseries of war, Red Bird and six other men of his nation voluntarily surrendered themselves. Some of the number were executed, some of them imprisoned and destined, like Red Bird, ingloriously to pine away within the narrow confines of a jail, when formerly the vast forests had proven too limited for them.

BLACK HAWK WAR.

In the year of 1804 a treaty was concluded between the United States and the chiefs of the Sac and Fox nations. One old chief of the Sacs, however, called Black Hawk, who had fought with great bravery in the service of Great Britain during the war of 1812, had always taken exceptions to this treaty, pronouncing it void. In 1831 he established himself, with a chosen band of warriors, upon the disputed territory, ordering the whites to leave the country at once. The settlers complaining, Governor Reynolds dispatched General Gaines, with a company of regulars and 1,500 volunteers, to the scene of action. Taking the Indians by surprise, the troops burnt their villages and forced them to conclude a treaty, by which they ceded all lands east of the Mississippi, and agreed to remain on the western side of the river. Necessity forced the proud spirit of Black Hawk into submission, which made him more than ever determined to be avenged upon his enemies. Having rallied around him the warlike braves of the Sac and Fox nations, he crossed the Mississippi in the spring of 1832. Upon learning of this invasion, Governor Reynolds hastily collected a body of 1,800 volunteers, placing them under command of Brigadier General Whiteside. The army marched to the Mississippi, and having reduced to ashes the Indian village known as "Prophet's Town," proceeded several miles up the river to Dixon to join the regular forces under General Atkinson. They found at Dixon two companies of volunteers, who, sighing for glory, were dispatched to reconnoitre the enemy. They advanced under command of Major Stillman to a small creek, afterwards known as "Stillman's Run," and while there encamped saw a party of mounted Indians at a distance of a mile. Several of Stillman's party mounted their horses and charged the Indians, killing three of them, but being attacked by the main body, under Black Hawk, they were routed, and by their precipitated flight spread such a panic through the camp that the whole company ran off to Dixon as fast as possible. On their arrival it was found that eleven of their number were killed.

In June, 1832, Black Hawk, with a band of one hundred and fifty warriors, attacked Apple River Fort, near Galena, defended by twenty-five men. This fort, a mere palisade of logs, was erected to afford protection to the miners.

For fifteen consecutive hours the garrison had to sustain the assault of the savage enemy; but knowing very well that no quarter would be given them, they fought with such fury and desperation that the Indians, after losing many of their best warriors, were compelled to retreat.

New forces being sworn into the service, Generals Atkinson and Henry determined to pursue the retreating foe. They followed them into Wisconsin, and hearing that Black Hawk was encamped at Rock river, at the Manitou village, issued orders to continue the pursuit. The officers of General Henry handed to him a written protest; but he, a man equal to any emergency, ordered the officers to be arrested and escorted to General Atkinson. Within a few minutes after the order was given the officers all collected around the General's quarters, pledged themselves that if forgiven they would return to duty and never do the like again.

The battle of Bad Axe immediately followed, resulting in a loss to the Indians of three hundred, besides fifty prisoners. The whites had but seventeen killed and twelve wounded. Black Hawk, with twenty of his braves, escaped, retreating up the Wisconsin river. The Winnebagoes, desiring to secure the friendship of the whites, went in pursuit and captured and delivered them to General Street, the United States Indian Agent. Among the prisoners were the son of Black Hawk and the prophet of the tribe. These, with Black Hawk, were taken to Washington, D. C., and were soon confined as prisoners at Fortress Monroe. Thus ended the Black Hawk war.

INTERNAL IMPROVEMENTS.

At the general election in 1834 Joseph Duncan was chosen Governor by a handsome majority. A reckless and uncontrollable desire for internal public improvements seized the minds of the people. In his message to the legislature, in 1835, Governor Duncan said: "When we look abroad and see the extensive lines of intercommunication penetrating almost every section of our sister States; when we see the canal-boat and the locomotive bearing with seeming triumph the rich productions of the interior to the rivers, lakes and ocean, almost annihilating time, burthen and space, what patriotic bosom does not beat high with a laudable ambition to give Illinois her full share of those advantages which are adorning her sister States, and which a magnificent Providence seems to invite by a wonderful adaptation of our whole country to such improvements?"

STUPENDOUS SYSTEM OF IMPROVEMENTS INAUGURATED.

The legislature responded to the ardent words of the Governor, and enacted a system of internal improvements without a parallel in the grandeur of its conception. They ordered the construction of 1,300 miles of railroad, crossing the State in all directions. This was surpassed by the river and canal improvements. There were a few counties not touched by the railroad, river or canal, and they were to be comforted and compensated by the free distribution of $200,000 among them. To inflate this balloon beyond credence, it was ordered that work should commence on both ends of each of these railroads and rivers, and at each river crossing, all at the same time. This provision, which has been called the crowning folly of the entire system, was the result of those jealous combinations emanating from the fear that advantages might accrue to one section over another in the commencement and completion of the works. We can appreciate better, perhaps, the magnitude of this grand system by reviewing a few figures. The debt authorized for these improvements in the first instance was $10,230,000. But this, as it was soon found, was based upon estimates at least too low by half. This, as we readily see, committed the State to a liability of over $20,000,000, equivalent to $200,000,000 at the present time, with over ten times the population and more than ten times the wealth.

Such stupendous undertakings by the State naturally engendered the fever of speculation among individuals. That particular form known as the town-lot fever assumed the malignant type at first in Chicago, from whence it spread over the entire State and adjoining States. It was an epidemic. It cut up men's farms without regard to locality, and cut up the purses of the purchasers without regard to consequences. It was estimated that building lots enough were sold in Indiana alone to accommodate every citizen then in the United States.

Chicago, which in 1830 was a small trading-post, had within a few years grown into a city. This was the starting point of the wonderful and marvelous career of that city. Improvements, unsurpassed by individual efforts in the annals of the world, were then begun and have been maintained to this day. Though visited by the terrible fire fiend and the accumulation of years swept away in a night, yet she has arisen, and to-day is the best built city in the world. Reports of the rapid advance of property in Chicago spread to the east, and thousands poured into her borders, bringing money, enterprise and industry. Every ship that left her port carried with it maps of splendidly situated towns and additions, and every vessel that returned was laden with immigrants. It was said at the time that the staple articles of Illinois export were town plats, and that there was danger of crowding the State with towns to the exclusion of land for agriculture.

ILLINOIS AND MICHIGAN CANAL.

The Illinois and Michigan canal again received attention. This enterprise is one of the most important in the early development of Illinois, on account of its magnitude and cost, and forming as it does the connecting link between the great chain of lakes and the Illinois and Mississippi rivers. Governor Bond, the first Governor, recommended in his first message the building of the canal. In 1821 the legislature appropriated $10,000 for surveying the route. This work was performed by two young men, who estimated the cost at $600,000 or $700,000. It cost, however, when completed, $8,000,000. In 1825 a law was passed to incorporate the Canal Company, but no stock was sold. In 1826, upon the solicitation of Daniel P. Cook, Congressman from this State, Congress gave 800,000 acres of land on the line of the work. In 1828 commissioners were appointed, and work commenced with a new survey and new estimates. In 1834-5 the work was again pushed forward, and continued until 1848, when it was completed.

PANIC REPUTATION ADVOCATED.

Bonds of the State were recklessly disposed of both in the East and in Europe. Work was commenced on various lines of railroad, but none were ever completed. On the Northern Cross Railroad, from Meredosia east eight miles, the first locomotive that ever turned a wheel in the great valley of the Mississippi was run. The date of this remarkable event was November 8, 1838. Large sums of money were being expended with no assurance of a revenue, and consequently, in 1840, the legislature repealed the improvement laws passed three years previously, not, however, until the State had accumulated a debt of nearly $15,000,000. Thus fell the most stupendous, extravagant and almost ruinous folly of a grand system of internal improvements that any civil community, perhaps, ever engaged in. The State banks failed, specie was scarce, an enormous debt was accumulated, the interest of which could not be paid, people were disappointed in the accumulation of wealth, and real estate was worthless. All this had a tendency to create a desire to throw off the heavy burden of State debt by repudiation. This was boldly advocated by some leading men. The fair fame and name, however, of the State was not tarnished by repudiation. Men, true, honest and able, were placed at the head of affairs; and though the hours were dark and gloomy, and the times most trying, yet our grand State was brought through and prospered, until to-day, after the expenditure of millions for public improvements and for carrying on the late war, it has, at present, no public debt whatever.

MORMON WAR.

In April, 1840, the "Latter Day Saints," or Mormons, came in large numbers to Illinois, and purchased a tract of land on the east side of the Mississippi river, about ten miles above Keokuk. Here they commenced building the city of Nauvoo. A more picturesque or eligible site for a city could not have been selected.

The origin, rapid development, and prosperity of this religious sect are the most remarkable and instructive historical events of the present century. That an obscure individual, without money, education, or respectability, should persuade hundreds of thousands of people to believe him inspired of God, and cause a book, contemptible as a literary production, to be received as a continuation of the sacred revelation, appears almost incredible; yet in less than half a century, the disciples of this obscure individual have increased to hundreds of thousands; have founded a State in the distant wilderness, and compelled the government of the United States to practically recognize them as an independent people.

The founder of Mormonism was Joseph Smith, a native of Vermont, who emigrated while quite young with his father's family to western New York. Here his youth was spent in idle, vagabond life, roaming the woods, dreaming of buried treasures, and in endeavoring to learn the art of finding them by the twisting of a forked stick in his hands or by looking through enchanted stones. Both he and his father became famous as "water wizards," always ready to point out the spot where wells might be dug and water found. Such was the character of the young profligate when he made the acquaintance of Sidney Rigdon, a person of considerable talent and information, who had conceived the design of founding a new religion. A religious romance, written by Mr. Spaulding, a Presbyterian preacher of Ohio, then dead, suggested the idea, and finding in Smith the requisite duplicity and cunning to reduce it to practice, it was agreed that he should act as prophet; and the two devised a story that gold plates had been found buried in the earth containing a record inscribed on them in unknown characters, which, when deciphered by the power of inspiration, gave the history of the ten lost tribes of Israel.

After their settlement in and about Nauvoo, in Hancock county, great depredations were committed by them on the "Gentiles." The Mormons had been received from Missouri with great kindness by the people of this State, and every possible aid granted them. The depredations committed, however, soon made them odious, when the question of getting rid of them was agitated. In the fall of 1841, the Governor of Missouri made a demand on Governor Carlin for the arrest and delivery of Joe Smith as a fugitive of justice. Smith was subsequently arrested, but was released by Judge Douglas, upon the ground that the writ had once been returned before it had been executed. In 1842, he was again arrested, and again escaped. Emboldened by success, the Mormons became more arrogant and overbearing. Many people began to believe they were about to set up a government for themselves in defiance of the laws of the State. Owners of property stolen in other counties made pursuit into Nauvoo, and were fined by the Mormon courts for daring to seek their property in the holy city. About this time they petitioned Congress to establish a territorial government for them in Nauvoo.

Smith soon began to play the tyrant over his people. Among the first acts of this sort was an attempt to take the wife of William Law, one of his most talented disciples, and make her his spiritual wife. He established, without authority, a recorder's office, and an office to issue marriage licenses. He proclaimed that none could deal in real estate or sell liquor but himself. He ordered a printing office demolished, and in many ways controlled the freedom and business of the Mormons. Not only did he stir up some of the Mormons, but by his reckless disregard for the laws of the land raised up opposition on every hand. It was believed that he instructed the Danite band, which he had chosen as the ministers of his vengeance, that no blood, except that of the church, was to be regarded as sacred, if it contravened the accomplishment of his object. It was asserted that he inculcated the legality of perjury and other crimes, if committed to advance the cause of true believers; that God had given the world and all it contained to his saints, and since they were kept out of their rightful inheritance by force, it was no moral offense to get possession of it by stealing. It was reported that an establishment existed in Nauvoo for the manufacture of counterfeit money, and that a set of outlaws was maintained for the purpose of putting it in circulation. Statements were circulated to the effect that a reward was offered for the destruction of the Warsaw Signal, an anti-Mormon paper, and that Mormons dispersed over the country threatened all persons who offered to assist the constable in the execution of the law, with the destruction of their property and the murder of their families. There were rumors also afloat that an alliance had been formed with the western Indians, and in case of war they would be used in murdering their enemies. In short, if only one-half of these reports were true, the Mormons must have been the most infamous people that ever existed.

William Law, one of the proprietors of the printing office destroyed by Smith, went to Carthage and procured a writ for the arrest of Smith and others in the deed. The prophet, his brother Hyrum, and others, surrendered themselves at Carthage June 24, 1844, on a charge of riot, and all entered into recognizance before a justice of the peace for their appearance at court. They were again arrested and thrown into prison at Carthage. The citizens of Hancock, McDonough and Schuyler counties had assembled, armed and ready to avenge the outrages that had been committed by the Mormons. Great excitement prevailed. All were anxious to march into Nauvoo. The 27th of June was appointed for the march, but Governor Ford, who at the time was in Carthage, apprehended trouble if the militia should attempt to invade Nauvoo, disbanded the troops, retaining only a guard for the jail.

Governor Ford went to Nauvoo on the 27th. The same morning about two hundred men from Warsaw, many being disguised, hastened to Carthage. On learning that one of the companies left as a guard had disbanded, and the other stationed one hundred and fifty yards from the jail while eight men were left to guard the prisoners, a communication was soon established between the Warsaw troops and the guard; and it was arranged that the guard should have their guns charged with blank cartridges and fire at the assailants when they attempted to enter the jail. The conspirators came up, jumped the fence around the jail, were fired upon by the guard, which, according to arrangement, was overpowered, and the assailants entered the prison to the door of the room where the two prisoners were confined. An attempt was made to break open the door; but Joe Smith, being armed with a pistol, fired several times as the door was burst open, and three of the assailants were wounded. At the same time several shots were fired into the room by some of which John Taylor, a friend of the Smiths, received four wounds, and Hyrum Smith was instantly killed. Joe Smith, severely wounded, attempted to escape by jumping out of a second-story window, but was so stunned by the fall that he was unable to rise. In this position he was dispatched by balls shot through his body. Thus fell Joe Smith, the most successful imposter of modern times. Totally ignorant of almost every fact in science, as well as in law, he made up in constructiveness and natural cunning whatever in him was wanting of instruction.

Many feared the Mormons would assemble in force and attack Carthage for the purpose of avenging the death of the prophet. But this was never done. In the fall of 1845 a convention, consisting of delegates from eight of the adjoining counties assembled to concert measures for the expulsion of the Mormons from the State. The Mormons seriously contemplated emigration westward, believing the times forebode evil for them. Accordingly, during the winter of 1845-'46, the most stupendous preparations were made by the Mormons for removal. All the principal dwellings, and even the temple, were converted into work-shops, and before spring, 12,000 wagons were in readiness; and by the middle of February the leaders, with 2,000 of their followers, had crossed the Mississippi on the ice.

THE BATTLE OF NAUVOO.

In September a writ was issued against several prominent Mormons, and placed in the hands of John Carlin, of Carthage, for execution. Carlin called out a posse to help make the arrest, which brought together quite a large force in the neighborhood of Nauvoo. Carlin, not being a military man, placed in command of the posse, first, General Singleton, and afterward Colonel Brockman, who proceeded to invest the city, erecting breastworks, and taking other means for defensive as well as offensive operations. What was then termed a battle next took place, resulting in the death of one Mormon and the wounding of several others, and loss to the anti-Mormons of three killed and four wounded. At last, through the intervention of an anti-Mormon committee of one hundred, from Quincy, the Mormons and their allies were induced to submit to such terms as the posse chose to dictate, which were that the Mormons should immediately give up their arms to the Quincy committee, and remove from the State. The trustees of the church and five of their clerks were permitted to remain for the sale of Mormon property, and the posse were to march in unmolested, and leave a sufficient force to guarantee the performance of their stipulations. Accordingly, the constable's posse marched in with Brockman at their head. It consisted of about 800 armed men and 600 or 700 unarmed, who had assembled from all the country around, through motives of curiosity, to see the once proud city of Nauvoo humbled and delivered up to its enemies. They proceeded into the city slowly and carefully, examining the way for fear of the explosion of a mine, many of which had been made by the Mormons, by burying kegs of powder in the ground, with a man stationed at a distance to pull a string communicating with the trigger of a percussion lock affixed to the keg. This kind of a contrivance was called by the Mormons "hell's half-acre." When the posse arrived in the city the leaders of it elected themselves into a tribunal to decide who should be forced away and who remain. Parties were dispatched to hunt for fire-arms, and for Mormons, and to bring them to judgment. When brought, they received their doom from the mouth of Brockman, who sat a grim and unawed tyrant for the time. As a general rule, the Mormons were ordered to leave within an hour or two, and by rare grace some of them were allowed until next day, and in a few cases longer time was granted.

MEXICAN WAR.

In 1846, when the war with Mexico commenced, Illinois sent her quota of six regiments to the tented field. More men were offered, but only the six regiments could be accepted. These six shed imperishable honors, not only upon the State, but upon the American Union. Veterans never fought more nobly and effectively than did the volunteers from Illinois. At the battle of Buena Vista, by the coolness and bravery of the gallant Second regiment, under Colonel Bissell, the day was saved. The conflict began early on the morning of February 22, 1847, and was continued till nightfall of the next day. The solid columns of the enemy were hurled against our forces all day long, but were met and held in check by the unerring fire of our musketry and artillery. A portion of General Lane's division was driven back by the enemy, who appeared in such formidable numbers as to be almost irresistible. At this time the Second Illinois, under Colonel Bissell, with a squadron of cavalry and a few pieces of artillery, came handsomely into action and gallantly received the concentrated fire of the enemy, which they returned with deliberate aim and terrible effect; every discharge of the artillery seemed to tear a bloody path through the heavy columns of the enemy. Says a writer: "The rapid musketry of the gallant troops from Illinois poured a storm of lead into their serried ranks, which literally strewed the ground with the dead and dying." But, notwithstanding his losses, the enemy steadily advanced until our gallant regiment received fire from three sides. Still they maintained their position for a time with unflinching firmness against that immense host. At length, perceiving the danger of being entirely surrounded, it was determined to fall back to a ravine. Colonel Bissell, with the coolness of ordinary drill, ordered the signal "cease firing" to be made; he then, with the same deliberation, gave the command, "Face to the rear, battalion about face; forward march," which was executed with the regularity of veterans to a point beyond the peril of being outflanked. Again, in obedience to command, these brave men halted, faced about, and under a murderous tempest of bullets from the foe, resumed their well-directed fire. The conduct of no troops could have been more admirable; and, too, until that day they had never been under fire, when, within less than half an hour eighty of their comrades dropped by their sides.

From Colton's History of the battle of Buena Vista the following extract is taken: "As the enemy on our left was moving in retreat along the head of the plateau, our artillery was advanced until within range, and opened a heavy fire upon him, while Colonels Hardin, Bissell, and McKee, with their Illinois and Kentucky troops, dashed gallantly forward in hot pursuit. A powerful reserve of the Mexican army was then just emerging from the ravine, where it had been organized, and advanced on the plateau, opposite the head of the southernmost gorge. Those who were giving way rallied quickly upon it; when the whole force, thus increased to over 12,000 men, came forward in a perfect blaze of fire. It was a single column, composed of the best soldiers of the republic, having for its advanced battalions the veteran regiments. The Kentucky and Illinois troops were soon obliged to give ground before it and seek the shelter of the second gorge. The enemy pressed on, arriving opposite the head of the second gorge. One-half of the column suddenly enveloped it, while the other half pressed on across the plateau, having for the moment nothing to resist them but the three guns in their front. The portion that was immediately opposed to the Kentucky and Illinois troops, ran down along each side of the gorge, in which they had sought shelter, and also circled around its head, leaving no possible way of escape for them except by its mouth, which opened upon the road. Its sides, which were steep,—at least an angle of forty-five degrees,—were covered with loose pebbles and stones, and converged to a point at the bottom. Down there were our poor fellows, nearly three regiments of them (First and Second Illinois and Second Kentucky), with but little opportunity to load or fire a gun, being hardly able to keep their feet. Above the whole edge of the gorge, all the way around, was darkened by the serried masses of the enemy, and was bristling with muskets directed on the crowd beneath. It was no time to pause. Those who were not immediately shot down rushed on toward the road, their number growing less and less as they went, Kentuckians and Illinoisans, officers and men, all mixed up in confusion, and all pressing on over the loose pebbles and rolling stones of those shelving, precipitous banks, and having lines and lines of the enemy firing down from each side and rear as they went. Just then the enemy's cavalry, which had gone to the left of the reserve, had come over the spur that divides the mouth of the second gorge from that of the third, and were now closing up the only door through which there was the least shadow of a chance for their lives. Many of those ahead endeavored to force their way out, but few succeeded. The lancers were fully six to one, and their long weapons were already reeking with blood. It was at this time that those who were still back in that dreadful gorge heard, above the din of the musketry and the shouts of the enemy around them, the roar of Washington's Battery. No music could have been more grateful to their ears. A moment only, and the whole opening, where the lancers were busy, rang with the repeated explosions of spherical-case shot. They gave way. The gate, as it were, was clear, and out upon the road a stream of our poor fellows issued. They ran panting down toward the battery, and directly under the flight of iron then passing over their heads, into the retreating cavalry. Hardin, Clay, McKee, Willis, Zabriskie, Houghton,—but why go on? It would be a sad task indeed to name over all who fell during this twenty minutes' slaughter. The whole gorge, from the plateau to its mouth, was strewn with our dead. All dead! No wounded there—not a man; for the infantry had rushed down the sides and completed the work with the bayonet."

After a hard fight at night both armies laid down upon their arms in much the same position as in the morning. However, early on the following morning, the glad tidings were heard amidst our army that the enemy had retreated, thus again crowning the American banners with victory.

In addition to Colonel Bissel, other names that shine as stars in this war are Shields, Baker, Harris, Hardin, Coffee—all from Illinois. Such indeed were the intrepid valor and daring courage exhibited by Illinois volunteers during the Mexican war that their deeds should live in the memory of their countrymen while time shall last.

THE WAR FOR THE UNION.

In the war for the Union no State can show a more glorious record than that of Illinois. Sumpter was fired upon April 12, 1861. Two days after President Lincoln issued his first call for volunteers—75,000 in numbers. On the 15th Governor Yates issued his proclamation convening the legislature, and ordering the enlistment of six regiments, the quota assigned the State. The call was no sooner made than filled. Patriotism filled every heart. The farm, the workshop, the office, the pulpit, the bar, the bench, every vocation in life offered its best men. On assembling, the legislature authorized the raising of ten additional regiments, anticipating another call. At the close of 1861, Illinois had sent to the field nearly 50,000 men, and had 17,000 in camp awaiting marching orders, thus exceeding its full quota by 15,000.

In July and August of 1862, the President called for 600,000 men—the quota of Illinois being 52,296—and gave until August 15th as the limits in which the number might be raised by volunteering, after which a draft would be ordered. The State had already furnished 17,000 in excess of her quota, and it was first thought this number would be deducted from the present requisition, but that could not be done. But thirteen days were granted to enlist this vast army, which had to come from the farmers and mechanics. The former were in the midst of harvest, but, inspired by love of country, over 50,000 of them left their harvest ungathered, their tools and their benches, the plows in their furrows, turning their backs on their homes, and before eleven days had expired the demands of the Government were met and both quotas filled.

The war went on, and call followed call, until it began to look as if there would not be men enough in all the Free States to crush out and subdue the monstrous war traitors had inaugurated. But to every call for either men or money there was a willing and ready response. And it is a boast of the people that, had the supply of men fallen short, there were women brave enough, daring enough, patriotic enough, to have offered themselves as sacrifices on their country's altar. On the 21st of December, 1864, the last call for troops was made. It was for 300,000. In consequence of an imperfect enrollment of the men subject to military duty, it became evident, ere this call was made, that Illinois was furnishing thousands of men more than what her quota would have been, had it been correct. So glaring had this disproportion become, that under this call the quota of some districts exceeded the number of able-bodied men in them.

No troops ever fought more heroically, stubbornly, and with better effect, than did the boys from the "Prairie State." At Pea Ridge, Donelson, Pittsburg Landing, Iuka, Corinth, Stone River, Holly Springs, Jackson, Vicksburg, Chancellorsville, Lookout Mountain, Murfreesboro, Atlanta, Franklin, Nashville, Chattanooga, and on every other field where the clash of arms was heard, her sons were foremost.

The people were liberal as well as patriotic; and while the men were busy enlisting, organizing, and equipping companies, the ladies were no less active, and the noble, generous work performed by their tender, loving hands deserves mention along with the bravery, devotion, and patriotism of their brothers upon the southern fields of carnage.

The continued need of money to obtain the comforts and necessities for the sick and wounded of our army suggested to the loyal women of the North many and various devices for the raising of funds. Every city, town, and village had its fair, festival, picnic, excursion, concert, which netted more or less to the cause of hospital relief, according to the population of the place and the amount of energy and patriotism displayed on such occasions. Especially was this characteristic of our own fair State, and scarcely a hamlet within its borders which did not send something from its stores to hospital or battlefield, and in the larger towns and cities were well organized soldiers' aid societies, working systematically and continuously from the beginning of the war till its close. The great State Fair held in Chicago in May, 1865, netted $250,000. Homes for traveling soldiers were established all over the State, in which were furnished lodging for 600,000 men, and meals valued at $2,500,000. Food, clothing, medicine, hospital delicacies, reading matter, and thousands of other articles, were sent to the boys at the front.

The rebellion ended with the surrender of Lee and Johnson, in April, 1865, and as soon as possible the troops were disbanded. The following is a summary of troops furnished by the State:

Infantry.....	185,944
Cavalry.....	32,082
Artillery.....	7,277
Total.....	225,303

He received a classical education, yet was not polished. He was an ultra Democrat; attended the Charleston Convention in 1860, and urged the seizure of United States arsenals by the South. Joel A. Matteson.—Was born in Jefferson county, New York, in 1808. His father was a farmer, and gave his son only a common school education. He first entered upon active life as a small tradesman, but subsequently became a large contractor and manufacturer. He was a heavy contractor in building the canal. He was elected Governor in 1852 upon the Democratic ticket.

William H. Bissell.—Was elected by the Republican party in 1856. He had previously served two terms in Congress; was colonel in the Mexican war, and has held minor official positions. He was born in New York State in 1811; received a common education; came to Illinois early in life and engaged in the medical profession. This he changed for the law, and became a noted orator, and the standard-bearer of the Republican party in Illinois. He died in 1860, while Governor.

Richard Yates.—"The war Governor of Illinois," was born in Warsaw, Kentucky, in 1818; came to Illinois in 1831; served two terms in Congress; in 1860 was elected Governor, and in 1865 United States Senator. He was a college graduate, and read law under J. J. Hardin. He rapidly rose in his chosen profession and charmed the people with oratory. He filled the gubernatorial chair during the trying days of the Rebellion, and by his energy and devotion won the title of "War Governor." He died in St. Louis after the expiration of his term as Senator.

Richard J. Oglesby.—Was born in 1821, in Kentucky; an orphan at the age of eight, came to Illinois when only twelve years old. He was apprenticed to learn the carpenter's trade; worked some at farming, and read law occasionally. He enlisted in the Mexican war and was chosen First Lieutenant. After his return he again took up the law, but during the gold fever of 1849 went to California; soon returned, and, in 1852, entered upon his illustrious political career. He raised the second regiment in the State, to suppress the Rebellion, and for gallantry was promoted to Major-General. In 1864 he was elected Governor, and re-elected in 1872, and resigned for a seat in the United States Senate. He is a staunch Republican, and resides at Decatur.

He was born in North Carolina in 1791, and came to Illinois in 1815; served one term in Congress, and in 1829 was elected to the United States Senate, but the following year died. He is said to have been the most gifted man of his period in Illinois.

From his first entrance in the Senate he was acknowledged the peer of Clay, Webster and Calhoun, with whom he served his first term. His famous contest with Abraham Lincoln for the Senate in 1858 is the most memorable in the annals of our country. It was called the battle of the giants, and resulted in Douglas' election to the Senate, and Lincoln to the Presidency. He was born in Brandon, Vermont, April 23, 1813, and came to Illinois in 1833, and died in 1861. He was appointed Secretary of State by Gov. Carlin in 1840, and shortly afterward to the Supreme Bench.

Mr. Browning was born in Harrison county, Kentucky; was admitted to the bar in 1831, and settled in Quincy, Illinois, where he engaged in the practice of law, and was instrumental, with his friend, Abraham Lincoln, in forming the Republican party of Illinois at the Bloomington Convention. He entered Johnson's cabinet as Secretary of the Interior, and in March, 1868, was designated by the President to perform the duties of Attorney General, in addition to his own as Secretary of the Interior Department.

William A. Richardson.—Was elected to the U. S. Senate in 1863, to fill the unexpired term of his friend, Stephen A. Douglas. He was born in Fayette county, Ky., about 1810, studied law, and settled in Illinois; served as captain in the Mexican war, and, on the battle-field of Buena Vista, was promoted for bravery, by a unanimous vote of his regiment. He served in the Lower House of Congress from 1847 to 1856, continually.

THEN AND NOW.

Less than three-fourths of a century ago the Territory of Illinois was organized, with a population estimated at 2,000; to-day it numbers not less than three and one-half millions—a greater number than in all the colonies during the Revolution. When organized, steamboats had never traversed its waters; railroads, telegraphs and telephones were unknown; to-day every navigable stream is alive with vessels carrying her products to other lands; while railroads traverse every county and almost every township in the State; while the number of miles of telegraph wire would probably encircle the globe, and the telephone is placed in thousands of homes, enabling their inmates to converse intelligibly with parties at a distance of several miles. Then the light that shone out of darkness was only the tallow-dip, or that furnished from blazing logs in the old-fashioned fire-places; to-day, after having displaced the tallow-dip, the candle and the common house-lamp, the darkness of night is penetrated by the glare of gas and the bright rays of the electric light, rivaling the light of day. Then agriculture was in its infancy, it being possible with the machinery then used only to raise sufficient crops to supply the wants of those living within its boundary; to-day, with the improved plows, the self-binding reaper, the steam thrasher, and other improved machinery, Illinois can feed a nation of 50,000,000 of people. Then the newspaper was a rare visitor in the household; to-day the humblest citizen can hardly exist without his daily and weekly paper. Then knowledge was possessed by few; to-day, by means of free schools, well endowed colleges and other influences, there is no excuse for being ignorant. But time would fail to compare the advantages of to-day over that of the first decade of the present century, and the student of history, as he reads of the progress made, can only wonder what the future will reveal.

HISTORY OF SANGAMON COUNTY.

CHAPTER I.

IN THE BEGINNING.

When the Territory of Illinois was organized that part now comprising the county of Sangamon was an unknown wilderness inhabited only by the wild beasts of the forest, wild birds of the air, and no less wild red men, who roamed at will over the broad prairies and through the heavy forests; fishing in the Sangamo, or hunting the game that everywhere abounded, seemingly caring nothing for the morrow, and only living in the ever present. The thought of the "pale-faces" penetrating this beautiful country had not yet disturbed them, and so they continued on in their daily life of hunting and fishing, with occasionally a short war between tribes to relieve the monotony of their lives. But the time was soon to come when they were to surrender up the lands and move on toward the setting sun. The time was soon to come when all nature must be changed. The fair prairies with their beautiful flowers, painted only by the hand of God, must be broken up by the husbandman, and grain fit for the use of civilized man sown therein; forests were to be felled and clearings made that the art of man could be exercised in the building and adornment of homes. Thus it was in 1817 when Robert Pulliam erected his cabin upon section 24, in the present township of Ball. Previous to this time the soil had been unweary by the plow and the woodman's axe had never been heard. The cabin of the settler, with its smoke curling heavenward, and with an air inviting the weary traveler to come and rest, was not to be seen, nor even the faintest trace of civilization; but instead, boundless emerald seas and luxuriant grasses.

These the gardens of the deserts—these
The unshorn fields, boundless and beautiful.
And fresh as the young earth, ere man had sinned.
Lo! they stretch
In airy undulations far away
As if the ocean in the gentlest swell
Stood still, with all his rounded billows fixed,
And motionless forever.

THE GARDEN SPOT.

That it was a beautiful country is the testimony of every one who visited it at an early day. In proof of this a local paper on one occasion inserted the following:

"Some sixty years ago, before the first mile of railroad was made, while the Indian still lingered in Central Illinois—when the turnpike road from Baltimore and Washington, over the mountains to the Ohio river, was the great national highway from the Eastern to the infant Western States, and when four-horse stage-coaches for carrying the United States mails and passengers were the best facilities afforded for travel, was the time the facts we record occurred.

"Mercantile agents, or drummers, at that early day were unknown. Twice a year Western merchants went East to replenish their stock of goods. The stage-coaches were run night and day, traveling about one hundred miles in twenty-four hours. About the time we speak of one of these elegant stages left Baltimore crowded with Western passengers, mostly merchants, for Wheeling, on the Ohio river. Having traveled one day and night, they were crossing the mountains slowly, tired and sleepy. Discussions on various topics were often encouraged to enliven the otherwise tedious hours. On this occasion three of the passengers were discussing the claims of several of the States to the 'Garden Spot of America,' while others listened or slept.

"One of the three presented the claim of Lancaster county, Pennsylvania, in its then highly cultivated condition; its rich limestone soil, its beautiful rolling surface, its never failing harvests, its immense barns, etc.

"The second, in elegant terms, portrayed the region round about Frankfort, Kentucky, for beauty and climate, and for fertility of soil and elegant improvements, as the 'Garden Spot.'

"And the third gentleman presented and urged the claim of the Shenandoah Valley, of Virginia, surrounded by the mountains and watered by ten thousand never failing springs gushing from the mountains; its golden harvests of grains and luscious fruits, and its blooded flocks upon a thousand hills.

"This interesting discussion was suddenly stopped by a roughly dressed passenger, in a jeans hunting suit, fringed, who had been sleeping and snoring for an hour or more. With an expression of terror in his face, he declared that something serious was going to happen the stage. I've had a remarkable dream, and with a serious earnestness commenced telling his dream to the anxious passengers:

"I dreamed that the horses became unmanageable and plunged over one of these mountain precipices, and we fell and rolled several hundred feet. I found myself struggling in a very cold stream of water, but gained the opposite shore. I looked, and behold, I seemed to be in a paradise—the precincts of Heaven—the trees, and flowers and birds, were exceedingly beautiful, and at a little distance there was a high wall, as if built of precious stones or rocks, and a golden door in the wall. The knob of the door seemed to be a very large diamond, glittering as a star. I concluded I was in the spirit world, and that the golden door was the entrance to Heaven. While thus bewildered this gentleman (pointing to one of the trio disputants) appeared and walked to the golden door. He knocked. The door opened, and a glorious personage appeared, whom I was impressed to think was St. Peter. 'Whence comest thou?' he said to this gentleman; and you answered 'from Lancaster county, Pennsylvania, and he said, 'enter.' Then came this other gentleman and knocked, St. Peter opened and inquired from whence he came. He replied, 'from Frankfort, Kentucky.' He was invited to enter. And, after a long while, this gentleman (pointing to the third of the trio) hastened to the door and rapped. The door was opened again, and St. Peter appeared for the third time, and inquired from what part of the earth he came. He said: 'From the Valley of Virginia.' And he was permitted to enter.

"The more I looked about me the more I became enchanted. I heard the sweetest music that ever fell on mortal ears, sounding as if from over the wall, and I passed on to the door and rapped with a small silver mallet, that seemed there for the purpose. St. Peter appeared. When he saw me, he said, in sweetest tones: 'Whence comest thou?' I said, 'from the Sangamo country, Illinois. I shall never forget the candid and kind manner St. Peter said: 'My friend, I advise you to go back, as there is no such beautiful land in Heaven as the valley drained by the Sangamo river. By nature it is the Garden Spot of America, and by the art of man is destined to become the Paradise of the New World—a land of corn and wine, and though the first several generations of settlers may have to toil, yet before the tenth generation shall appear, this wilderness will be made to blossom as the rose.'

"The early settler of Sangamo was so ingenious in presenting the claim of Illinois as containing the 'Garden Spot,' that it was unanimously awarded to it. And at the next stopping place the trio treated to the wine."

FIRST WHITE MEN IN SANGAMON COUNTY.

History and tradition are both silent as to who was the first white man to visit this country. The early French explorers came within a few miles of its border, but it is doubtful if they set foot within it. Following only the courses of the great rivers, and penetrating inland but a short distance, the beautiful Sangamo country was unperceived by them. From the time of their visit to the Mississippi in 1673, a century and a half passed before Robert Pulliam in his wanderings came upon the scene, followed closely by Henry Funderburk, William Drennan, Joseph Dodds, James McCoy and others.

FIRST SETTLEMENT.

In 1858, on the organization of the Old Settlers' Society, it was determined to have the first annual celebration on or near the site of the first cabin erected in the county. To this end, a committee was appointed to investigate the claims of all parties to the honor of being the first settler. After much investigation that committee decided, on the evidence of the family and some others, that Robert Pulliam erected a cabin in the fall of 1816, which, without doubt, was the first built in the county. Accordingly, the celebration was here held. So far as is known, no one at that time disputed the claim.

It is now claimed by the descendants of Henry Funderburk that he was the first settler in the county; that he arrived in the spring of 1817, and raised that year a small quantity of corn, and that Pulliam was not then here. Their claim is supported by Jacob Hinkle, of Pawnee, who says that he was six years old when his father arrived in the county in the spring of 1818; that he well remembers seeing shocks of corn on Mr. Funderburk's place which must have been raised the year previous.

Sixty-four years have now passed since the first settlement was made, and there is not living in all Sangamon county one who came during the years 1817 or 1818 who was a man or woman grown at that time. Evidence must now be taken second-hand, or from those who were very small when brought by their parents to this county. It cannot, then, be wondered at that there is a disagreement upon this and many other points. In the history of the township of Ball will be found all the evidence now attainable with reference to the claims of Pulliam, and in the history of Cotton Hill township the Funderburk claim is set forth. The attention of the reader is called to these chapters.

OTHER EARLY SETTLERS.

In the spring of 1818, William Drennan, Joseph Drennan, Joseph Dodds, Mr. Vancil and George Cox settled in township 14, north of range 5, west, in what is now Ball township.

James McCoy and Levi W. Goodin, in the fall of 1818, settled in township 14, range 4, but moved to township 15, range 4, what is now known as Rochester township. Mr. McCoy and Mr. Goodin brought their wives, who were the first white women to come to the county for the purpose of making it their home. It is said that but six women came that year, the other four being wives of William and Joseph Drennan, Mr. Vancil and Joseph Dodds.

In what is now Auburn township, Jacob Ellis, James Black, Samuel Vancil, and John Wallace settled in 1818. In other parts of the county were Zachariah Peter, Justice Hinkle, William Nelson, Mason Fowler, Joseph Dixon, Joseph Neeley, and others.

AREA AND POSITION OF THE COUNTY.

Sangamon county is centrally situated, north and south, in the State and is bounded on the north by Menard and Logan counties, on the south by Macoupin, Montgomery and Christian counties, on the east by Macon county and on the west by Morgan county. It contains an area of 875 square miles, or 550,000 acres of land.

ORGANIZATION OF THE COUNTY.

Sangamon county was created by an act of the legislature, approved January 30, 1821. The following is the act in question:

SECTION 1. Be it enacted by the People of the State of Illinois, represented in the General Assembly, That all that tract of country within the following boundaries, to-wit: Beginning at the northeast corner of township twelve north, on the third principal meridian, thence north with said meridian to the Illinois river, thence down the middle of said river to the mouth of Balance or Negro creek, thence up said creek to its head, thence through the middle of the prairie which divides the waters of the Sangamon and Mauges Terre to the northwest corner of township twelve north, range seven west, of the third principal meridian, thence east along the north boundary of township twelve to the place of beginning, shall constitute a separate county to be called Sangamon.

SECTION 2. Be it further enacted, That so soon as the county commissioners of said county shall be elected and duly qualified into office, they shall meet at some convenient place in said county as circumstances will admit, and such place where selected by said county commissioners, shall be the temporary seat of justice for said county, until otherwise provided by law: Provided, however, that if any settler or settlers, owner or owners, of the place so selected as aforesaid, shall refuse to have the temporary seat of justice fixed on his or her or their improvements, then the said commissioners may determine on such other place contiguous thereto as they may deem proper.

SECTION 3. Be it further enacted, That said county commissioners shall be allowed the same compensation for the time necessarily employed in fixing the temporary seat of justice as in other cases.

SECTION 4. Be it further enacted, That the citizens of Sangamon county are hereby declared in all respects entitled to the same rights and privileges as are allowed in general to other counties in this State.

Provided, always, That in all cases where freeholders only are capable of performing any duty, or are entitled to any privilege; housekeepers shall for all such purposes, be considered as freeholders in the said Sangamon county, and shall and may do all duties appertaining to the different offices in the county.

SECTION 5. Be it further enacted, That the county of Sangamon shall compose a part of the first judicial circuit of the State.

The following is the original boundary of the county as thus created: Commencing at the northeast corner of Locust township, in Christian county, thence north to a point on the Illinois river about two miles west of the city of Peru, thence down the middle of said river to what is now the boundary line between Cass and Morgan counties, thence west to the northeast corner of Morgan county, thence south on the line between Morgan and Sangamon counties to the northwest corner of Otter township in Macoupin county; thence east to the place of beginning. It will be seen that the boundaries between this county and Morgan, Macoupin and Montgomery, are unchanged. The original metes and bounds of Sangamon county, as given, embraced the following counties and parts of counties as at present constituted: Part of Christian, a small part of Macon all of Logan part of McLean, all of Tazewell, part of Woodford, part of Marshall, part of Putnam, all of Mason, all of Menard and all of Casa.

The territory then constituting the county was thus set apart by law. An election for county officers was held Monday, April 2, 1821. At this election William Drennan, Zachariah Peter and Rivers Cormack were elected County Commissioners, met the next day and took the oath of office.

ACTS OF THE COUNTY COMMISSIONERS.

The first meeting of the County Commissioners' Court was held at the house of John Kelley, on Tuesday, April 3, 1821; there being present all the members elect—William Drennan, Zachariah Peter and Rivers Cormack. After taking the oath of office prescribed by law, the first business was the appointment of a clerk, Charles R. Matheny being honored with the position. Mr. Matheny took the oath of office and entered into bond with James Latham as security for the faithful performance of his duties. No further business was transacted at this time and the court adjourned.

The second special term was held at the same place, on the 10th day of April, 1821, Zachariah Peter and William Drennan being present.

John Spillers was allowed the sum of ten dollars for carrying the election returns to Vandalia, then the capital of the State.

John Linsey, Stephen Stillman and John Robinson were nominated to the Governor as proper persons to fill the office of Justices of the Peace.

James Simms was appointed County Treasurer.

The Commissioners who were appointed by the act creating the county to select a temporary county-seat, reported as follows:

"WHEREAS, The act of the General Assembly, entitled, 'an act establishing the County of Sangamon' requires of the County Commissioners when elected and qualified into office, to fix a temporary seat of justice for said county: therefore, we, the undersigned, County Commissioners of said county, do certify that we, after full examination of the situation of the population of said county, have fixed and designated a certain point in the prairie near John Kelley's field on the waters of Spring creek, at a stake marked Z. D., as the temporary seat of justice for said county, and do further agree that the said county-seat be called and known by the name of Springfield.

"Given under our hand this 10th day of April, 1821.

ZACHARIAH PETER,
WILLIAM DRENNAN."

The next meeting of the board of County Commissioners was held at the court house in Springfield, June 4, 1821, all the members being present, with Charles R. Matheny, Clerk, and John Taylor, Sheriff.

From the records the following is extracted:

"The court, pursuant to public notice given, proceeded to let out the building of a jail to the lowest bidder, which was cried off to Robert Hambleton, at $84.75, who thereupon entered into an agreement with the aforesaid Commissioners to have the same completed by the first Monday in September next.

"Ordered, that William Drennan be appointed guardian for George Cox, an infant under the age of fourteen years, and that he enter into bond in one hundred dollars, with Rivers Cormack as security."

Several public roads were ordered laid out at this session, and John Hamblin and David Black were appointed constables.

James Simms refusing to qualify for the office of treasurer, George Haworth was appointed, and was duly qualified, presenting Zachariah Peter and Robert Pulliam as security.

In order to defray the necessary expenses of the county, it was ordered by the County Commissioners that "the Assessor, in assessing the taxable property, assess the following property, to-wit: Horses, neat cattle, wheel-carriages, stock in trade and distillery.

The county was divided into two battalion districts of four companies each, and an election ordered for militia officers in each district.

A special term was next held July 16, 1821, the members of the court all being present. The only business transacted being the levying of one-half of one per cent. upon all taxable property "for the purpose of procuring public buildings and other necessary expenses for the year 1821."

On the first Monday in September, 1821, the Commissioners again met for the transaction of business.

Jacob Ellis was allowed the sum of $4.50 for a judge's seat and bar in the court-house.

Andrew Orr, Matthew Higgins, Norris A. Thomas, Jacob A. Miller and Robert Hamilton were appointed constables, each of whom qualified in open court.

John Taylor was allowed $30.75 for book and stationery furnished the clerk of the court.

At a term held December 3, 1821, Robert Hamilton was allowed the sum of $84.75 for the jail built by him for the use of the county. John Taylor, sheriff of the county, protested against receiving the jail as not suitable; but his protest was not heeded.

Charles R. Matheny was allowed $87.50 for salary as clerk of the Circuit Court, and for stationery furnished for the year 1821; Rivers Cormaek was allowed $25 for services as Commissioner; William Drennan and Zachariah Peter each $30 for services as Commissioners; John Taylor was allowed $57 as salary for the year 1821.

The first tavern license granted by the board was at this term, Robert Pulliam being permitted to engage in the business for the sum of $3 per year. He was permitted to charge the following rates:

Meal victuals	25 cents.
Bed, per night	12½ "
Feed for horse	12½ "
Keeping horse over night	37½ "
Whisky, per half-pint	12½ "

On the first Monday in March, 1822, the court licensed Elijah Slater to "keep a tavern or public house of entertainment in the town of Springfield." Whether provisions were scarce, or whatever the cause, he was permitted to charge a higher rate than Mr. Pulliam, the court fixing the following prices:

Meal victuals	37½ cents.
Lodging	12½ "
Brandy, per half-pint	25 "
Wine, " "	25 "
Rum, " "	25 "
Gin, " "	18½ "
Horse, per night	50 "
Horse feed	12½ "
Whisky, per half-pint	12½ "

Tuesday, March 5, 1822, the board was again in session, at which time it was "ordered by the court that the treasurer, in assessing the property for taxation for the year 1822, take and include all personal property, goods and chattels of whatsoever kind or nature the same may be, including all the personal estate, in addition to the real estate made taxable by law."

Charles R. Matheny was instructed to contract for county seals, weights and measures for the use of the county.

Erastus Wright was authorized to keep a ferry on the Illinois river at Fort Clark (Peoria), and was permitted to charge the following rates:

For man and horse, or single person or horse	25 cents.
For man or other person	12½ "
For each ox, bull, cow, steer or heifer	12½ "
For each calf, sheep or hog	6½ "
For each wagon cart, sleigh, sled or vehicle drawn by two horses or two oxen	50 "
For each additional span or yoke of horses or oxen	25 "

All other less or greater number of persons or yokes or parts thereof, in the same proportion as above allowed.

Thomas Price was authorized to keep tavern with rates as already given.

Robert Hamilton was appointed treasurer and entered into bond with John Scott and George Hayworth as securities, which bond was approved.

At the June term, 1822, Aaron and Gideon Hawley were authorized to keep a ferry across the south fork of the Sangamo river, at what was known as Jarvis' Ford. The following rates were established:

Each man or other person	6½ cents.
For man and horse	12½ "
Lead horse or gelding	6½ "
Bull, cow or steer	6½ "
Calf, sheep or hog	6½ "
Wagon and two horses or oxen	37½ "
Vehicle drawn by one horse	25 "

Extra teams charged in proportion to the foregoing rates.

The sum of $12 was allowed Thomas Smith for a stray found in Springfield, for the use of the county, and Andrew Orr was appointed to take charge of the same.

In July the Commissioners were again in session.

The treasurer was authorized and ordered to extend a tax of 37½ cents on the $100 on all taxable property.

At the annual election held in 1822, William Morgan and Samuel Lee were elected members of the board vice William Drennan and Rivers Cormack.

The first session of the new board was held on the second day of September, 1822. No business of any special importance was transacted, and the court adjourned till court in course.

The next meeting of the court was held in December, at which time Charles R. Matheny was allowed $94 for stationery furnished the county.

Jacob Ellis was allowed $1 for hinges and hanging the court house door.

At the March term, 1824, the first allowance for paupers was made. John Orendorff was allowed $51.50 for keeping two paupers for six months, and Nathan Hussey $20 for keeping one pauper six months.

In 1825, specie must have been scarce, judging from the fact that at the June term of that year all allowances were made "in specie or its equivalent."

At the July term, 1825, the board met to let the building of a new brick court house, but the records are silent as to any action on the subject.

At the September term, same year, Thomas Clark was appointed to superintend the opening and improvement of the navigation of the Sangamon river, a subscription being raised for that purpose. Subscribers to the fund were allowed to pay their subscription in labor at the rate of $1 per day.

The last meeting of the County Commissioners' Court was held November 5, 1849. But little business was transacted. Their term of office was about at an end, being succeeded by the board of justices.

The following named served as County Commissioners for the years named, and is a complete list from the organization of the county:

BOARD OF JUSTICES.

In 1849, the county government was vested in a Board of Justices, consisting of a county judge and two associate justices, all the powers previously held by the County Commissioners being transferred to them. The first meeting of the Board of Justices was held at the court house in Springfield, Monday, December 3, 1849. There were present, Thomas Moffett, county judge; Cyrus W. Vanderen and William F. Elkin, associate justices. The unfinished business of the County Commissioners' court was first taken up, and then the new board proceeded to the transaction of all business brought before them.

In 1861 the county adopted the township organization law, and the last meeting of the Board of Justices was held Thursday, March 14, 1861.

The following named composed the Board of Justices, each serving the term of four years.

- 1849—Thomas Moffett, County Judge; William F. Elkin, Cyrus W. Vanderen, Associate Justices.
- 1853—John W. Taylor, County Judge; Samuel K. Swingley, William Armstrong, Associate Justices.
- 1857—William D. Power, County Judge; Moses K. Anderson, J. A. Bell, Associate Justices.

TOWNSHIP ORGANIZATION.

A petition was presented to the Board of Justices June 5, 1860, praying the board to submit the question to a vote of the people for the adoption of township organization. The prayer of the petitioners was granted, and the subject was ordered submitted to the people at the next general election, held Tuesday, November 6, 1860. The vote was canvassed by the board in December following, when it was ascertained there was a majority of 859 votes in its favor, out of a total vote of 7,241. The board thereupon appointed John S. Bradford, John Gardner, Sen., and Joseph Campbell, commissioners to divide the county into towns, in accordance with the general law relating to township organizations. At a meeting of the Board, held March 1, 1861, the commissioners submitted their report, by which the county was divided into twenty-two townships under the following names:

Auburn,	Island Grove,
Ball,	Loami,
Buffalo Hart,	Mechanicsburg,
Campbell,	Power,
Cartwright,	Pawnee,
Clear Lake,	Rochester,
Cooper,	Sackett,
Cotton Hill,	Springfield,
Curran,	Talkington,
Gardner,	Williams,
Illiopolis,	Woodside.

New Berlin has since been formed from part of Island Grove, Wheatfield from part of Illiopolis.

olis, and Capital from part of Springfield, making a total of twenty-five towns, as follows:

RIVER AND CREEKS.

Sangamon county is well supplied with streams of living water, the most important of which is the Sangamon river, the north fork of which takes its rise in McLean county, and pursuing a tortuous course, forms the southern boundary line of Sangamon along Illipolis and part of Cooper township, entering the county on section 15 of the last named township, passing through it and Rochester into Clear Lake township, where it is joined, on section 27, with the south fork, which heads in Shelby county, entering Sangamon on section 12, Cotton Hill township, and passing through Rochester into Clear Lake. The two forks uniting as stated, pass into and through Springfield, Gardner and Salisbury townships, from which it enters Menard county from section 22.

For many years the river retained its old Indian name of the Sangamo, but it was finally dropped, and the modern name adopted.

NAVIGATION OF THE SANGAMO RIVER.

The boys that play upon the banks of the Sangamo river in this year of our Lord one thousand, eight hundred and eighty-one little dream that it was ever thought by anyone that the river was a navigable stream, much less that an attempt was ever made to run a steamer on its sluggish waters. But such was the case.

Before the days of the iron horse, when railroads were comparatively unknown, many attempts were made at the navigation of insignificant streams, in order to cheapen transportation. Especially was this true in new countries.

The Sangamo Journal, January 19, 1832, after speaking of the signs of an early spring and the preparation for improvement going on, says:

"And last, not least, it is seriously projected by our fellow-citizen, V. A. Bogue, to introduce to the good people of Springfield, within a month or so, by way of the Sangamo river, a steamboat, which will be laden with goods for our merchants. We have strong confidence that the undertaking will succeed. We will not now undertake to state the results that would benefit to this village and county from the complete success of this experiment. It would be worth more to us than a dozen railroads—in the newspapers. Wasn't our inimitable bard prophetic when he said:—

"And I will make our Sangamo Outshine in verse, the famous Po?"

In the Journal of the 26th of January, 1832, appears a letter from Mr. Bogue in reference to the proposed trip of the steamer up the Sangamo. He says:—

"I am well aware that the undertaking is dangerous, difficult and expensive—still I am willing to risk my all upon it. All I ask is the cheerful and hearty concurrence of those gentlemen who must be more interested in the success than I am or can be. If I am unfortunate, I will cheerfully bear the loss; if I am successful, which, God willing, I have little doubt every individual in that fine section of country must feel the beneficial effects of it. (The concurrence I allude to is to advise me immediately on receipt, and keep me advised of the state of the river—what probable rise may be expected above low-water mark—that I should be met at the mouth of the river by ten or twelve men, having axes with long handles, under the direction of some experienced man, and that one of the men should be one of those who has most often descended the river with flatboats (to show the course of the stream). I shall deliver freight from St. Louis at the landing on Sangamo river, opposite the town of Springfield, for thirty-seven-and-a-half cents per hundred pounds

The Journal was an enthusiastic friend of the project of the navigation of the river, but tempers its enthusiasm by saying: "It would be folly, perhaps, ever to anticipate for our village advantages from steamboat navigation equal to those which St. Louis has derived from that source; yet such anticipation cannot be more chimerical than was the project of running steamboats from the mouth of the Ohio to St. Louis in 1817."

In the Journal of February 16, 1832, appears the following paragraph:

"We find the following advertisement in the Cincinnati Gazette of the 19th ult. We hope such notices will soon cease to be such novelties. We seriously believe that the Sangamo river can be made navigable for steamboats for several months in the year. Here is the advertisement:

FOR SANGAMO RIVER, ILLINOIS—The splendid upper-cabin steamer, TALISMAN, J. M. POLLOCK, Master, will leave for Portland, Springfield, on the Sangamo river, and all intermediate ports and landings, say, Boardman, Naples, St. Louis, Louisville, on Thursday, February 2. For freight or passage apply to Captain Vincent A. Bogue, at the Broadway Hotel, or to Allison Owen.

After the foregoing notices appeared in the Journal, a public meeting of citizens of Springfield was held February 14, 1832, to take into consideration what measures should be adopted to assist Mr. Bogue in his enterprise. Elijah Iles was elected chairman, and William Porter secretary. On motion of Dr. Todd, the following preamble and resolution was adopted:

WHEREAS, We have learned with great pleasure that our townsman, Mr. Bogue, is about to navigate the Sangamo river in a steamboat

Resolved, That a committee of three citizens be appointed to meet him, with a suitable number of hands, and render him all the assistance we are capable of, or on the failure of Mr. Bogue, that assistance be afforded to any other boat wishing to engage in the enterprise.

E. D. Taylor, Washington Iles and T. M. Neale were appointed that committee. T. Moffett, G. Jayne, and D. Dickerson were appointed a committee to solicit funds to carry out the foregoing resolution.

According to announcement the Talisman started on its journey from Cincinnati, and after various trials succeeded in accomplishing its object. The Journal of March 8, announces the arrival of the steamer at Meredosia, when its further progress was obstructed by ice. In its issue of March 29th, it says:

"On Saturday last the citizens of this place (Springfield) were gratified by the arrival of the steamboat Talisman, J. W. Pollock, master, of 150 tons burthens, at the Portland landing, opposite this town. (Portland was at the south side of the Sangamon river, between where the bridges of the Chicago & Alton and the Gilman, Clinton & Springfield railroads now stand). The safe arrival of a boat the size of the Talisman, on a river never before navigated by steam, had created much solicitude, and the shores for miles were crowded by our citizens. Her arrival at her destined port was hailed with loud acclamations and full demonstrations of pleasure. When Capt. Bogue located his steam mill on Sangamo river, twelve months ago, and asserted his determination to land a steamboat there within a year, the idea was considered chimerical by some, and utterly impracticable by others. The experiment has been made, and the result has been as successful as the most enthusiastic could expect; and this county owes a deep debt of gratitude to Captain Bogue for getting up the expedition, and his never tiring and unceasing efforts until the end was accomplished. Capt. Pollock, who is naturally warm and enthusiastic, entered fully into the feeling of our citizens, who visited the mouth of the river to render any and every assistance in their power; and much credit is due him for his perseverance and success. The boat experienced some difficulty from drifts, and leaning timber on shore, which made her trip somewhat tedious. The result has clearly demonstrated the practicability of navigating the river by steamboats of proper size; and by the expenditure of $2,000 in removing logs and drifts and standing timber, a steam boat of 80 tons burthen will make a trip in two days from Beardstown to this place. The citizens of Beardstown manifested great interest for the success of the enterprise, and some of them accompanied the boat until the result was no longer doubtful. They proposed the cutting of a communication or canal from the bluffs to their landing—about five miles—whereby seventy-five miles of navigation may be saved, and offered one thousand dollars to assist in completing it. It is to be hoped that the next legislature will afford some aid in making the river safe and pleasant in its navigation. Springfield can no longer be considered an inland town. We have no doubt but within a few months a boat will be constructed for the special purpose of navigating the Sangamo river. The result which must follow the successful termination of this enterprise to our county, and to those counties lying in its neighborhood, it would be impossible to calculate. Here is now open a most promising field for the exercise of every branch of honest industry. We congratulate our farmers, our mechanics, our merchants and professional men, for the rich harvest in prospect, and we cordially invite emigrating citizens from other states, whether rich or poor, if so be they are industrious and honest, to come hither and partake of the good things of Sangamo."

The poets of the day immortalized the occasion in verse, while the ladies gave a grand ball in honor of the occasion. The Journal's poet, in speaking of the appearance of the steamer, says:

Say ye, bold Springfield men, the sight—
Did it not give you vast delight?
And you, fair dames, your comments on it,
It almost equalled a new bonnet,
Could anything be so bewitching—
Lord, Lord, to think on't sets me itching—
That is in rhyme, my pretty dears,
As some one says some other wheres.
Both town and county went to see
What this strange animal could be;
But cautious first, and by degrees,
The suckers peeped behind the trees,
'Till more familiar grown, they chase
And boldly stare her in the face.
One thought it might be Noah's ark—
No, no, another did remark,
'Tis only Bogue's, his luck to try,
Nor need he here a dove let fly;
He only fears it should be dry!
The news to Springfield quickly flew,
And all the folks went out to view
So strange a sight, to them so new;
Some thought the world was at an end,
And Heaven in mercy did this send

To save the chosen people in,
Who never yet committed sin,
Or only now and then got frisky
When broached an extra tub of whisky.

In speaking of the general rejoicing and the ball in the evening, the bard continues:

Heigh, sirs, but I forgot to tell
That great rejoicings here befell,
Such stuffing—all the eggs in town
I do believe were there crammed down,
And the next morn old Ned quite high,
Had risen in price, and none to buy.
There was a ball at night, I guess,
For th' ladie's sakes it couldn't be less—
And twenty bachelors they say,
Were strung on Hymen's noose that day.

Notwithstanding all this general rejoicing the navigation of the Sangamon was a failure. The Talisman, on account of low water, was unable to turn around, and was compelled to back out of the stream. Her first trip was her last. She was burned to the water's edge opposite St. Louis, in the latter part of April, 1832.

Even as late as 1853 a small steamer came up the river to Petersburg, which caused Simeon Francis, who felt bound to make the Sangamon river navigable, write as follows, under date of April 25, 1853:

"It has long been a conceded fact by those who have the best knowledge on the subject, that the Sangamon river can be made navigable for a small class of steamers five or six months in the year. Some days ago the steamer Wave, Captain Monroe, arrived at Petersburg. He found no difficulty in navigating the river for want of water. There was a depth of four feet, but there were obstructions from drifts and narrow turns that could readily be obviated. He supposes the distance by the Sangamon river to the Illinois from Petersburg is about ninety miles, thirty miles of which will need improvement. This improvement should be done, if not by the State, by a company, who should be authorized to receive tolls for boats. We believe the legislature has authorized a company to improve the Kaskaskia river, and to charge tolls. Captain Moore has navigated the last mentioned river, and he expresses himself decidedly of the opinion that the Sangamon is a better river for navigation than the Kaskaskia.

"We learn that so thoroughly satisfied are the property holders and business men of Petersburg of the feasibility of navigating the Sangamon by steamboats, and the great benefit that would result to that section of country from a steamboat connection with other navigable streams, that a subscription of some five thousand dollars has already been raised to build and equip a steamboat for the especial navigation of the Sangamon. The attempts made years ago for the same purpose were not made in a way to secure success. The company will be able to avoid the obstacles which defeated the project on a former occasion. As one of the means for developing the rich resources of the country on the Sangamon, we most fervently desire that the enterprise may be successful."

This was the last attempt at the navigation of the river, and a look at the stream in this year, 1881, will convince one that it was wise.

CREEKS.

Sangamon county is well watered by many living streams, after the Sangamon river the most important being Sugar creek, Lick creek, Horse creek, Brush creek, Clear creek, Fancy creek, Cantrall creek, Prairie creek, Richland creek, Wolf creek, and Spring creek, an account of each being found in the township history of the townships through which the flow.

CHAPTER II.

GEOLOGY.—BY A. H. WORTHEN.

The Sangamon river traverses the entire extent of the county from east to west, and with its tributaries furnishes a reasonable supply of water in ordinary seasons.

This stream, as well as its main affluents, are skirted with belts of excellent timber, which make this one of the best/timbered counties in the central portion of the State. About one-third of the county was originally covered with timber, but much of the timbered land has been cleared up and brought under cultivation.]

The principal varieties of timber observed in this county are the following; and it will be found that the list embraces nearly every variety of forest tree that is to be found in the central portion of the State: sugar and white maple, buckeye, shellbark hickory, swamp hickory, mocher nut and thick shellbark hickory, hornbeam, serviceberry, backberry, red bud, dogwood, red thorn, black thorn, persimmon, waahoo, white, blue and black ash, coffee nut, white and black walnut, mulberry, sycamore, cottonwood, wild plum, wild cherry, crab apple, white oak, scarlet oak, chestnut oak, laurel oak, red oak, pin oak, swamp white oak, bur oak, sumac, elder, sassafras, linden, willow, American elm, slippery elm, prickly ash, pawpaw, red birch, hazel, spiceberry, and honey locust. }

The superficial deposits in this county comprise the three principal divisions of the Quaternary: alluvium, loess and drift. Narrow belts of alluvial bottom skirt the Sangamon through a large part of its course in this county, but they are subject to be annually overflowed by the river floods, and are most valuable for the heavy growth of timber they sustain.

The loess covers a large part of the uplands to the depth of from six to twenty feet, and is composed of the usual marly beds of buff and gray sands and sandy clays. Underneath the surface soil at Springfield we usually meet the following successions of beds:—

No. 1, soil,.....	1 to 2 feet
No. 2, buff colored silicious clay, 2½ to 3 feet
No. 3, very fine gray marly sand, 3 to 4 feet
No. 4, brown drift clays, usually extending down to the bed rock, 30 to 40 feet

Nos. 2 and 3 of the above section may properly be referred to the loess, and at several points, in the vicinity of the city, it has been found to contain the characteristic shells usually found in it.

We are indebted to Mr. Joseph Mitchell, who has dug many wells in the northwest part of Sangamon county and in the adjoining portions of Menard, for the following section of the beds usually passed through by him:

No. 1, soil,.....	1 to 2½ feet
No. 2, yellow clay,.....	3 feet
No. 3, whitish (gray) jointed clay with shells,.....	5 to 8 feet
No. 4, black muck, with fragments of wood,.....	3 to 8 feet
No. 5, bluish colored boulder clay,.....	8 to 10 feet
No. 6, gray hard-pan (very hard),.....	2 feet
No. 7, soft blue clay, without boulders,.....	20 to 40 feet

No. 3 of this section is undoubtedly loess, and he affirms that this order of succession was invariably observed at many different localities in that portion of the county, the black mucky soil always appearing immediately below the loess, and varying from three to eight feet in thickness, and always overlaying the true drift or boulder clay. This old soil is probably the equivalent of a chocolate-colored band a foot or more in thickness, which lies at the base of the loess in the bluffs at Quincy.

In my report on Adams county, published in Vol. IV, page 45, I suggested that the layers of chocolate colored soil at the base of the loess might be the equivalent of the old post tertiary soil penetrated in the shaft at Coatsburg, and in consequence of the absence of true drift deposits at Quincy, it was difficult to fix the relation which this chocolate-colored soil might hold to the boulder clays, but the occurrence of a similar deposit at so many different localities in this county, and at the base of the loess and always above the boulder clays seem to indicate pretty conclusively that the stratum of Quincy also belongs above the true drift and to a more recent period than that penetrated at Coatsburg.

These two ancient soils, the one at the base of the loess, and the other below the boulder clay, belong to distinct and widely separated periods and indicates two distinct emergencies of the surfaces during the Quaternary period and the prevalence of conditions suitable for the growth of an arboreal vegetation.

The boulder clays, or true drift, consists for the most part of brown, gravelly clay with small boulders. Occasionally a boulder, two feet or more in diameter, is met with in the beds of the ravines, but they are not common. In the vicinity of Springfield, this division of the quaternary ranges from twenty to forty feet in thickness, and this is probably not far from its average thickness throughout the county; but at some localities there is a blue clay or hard pan below the brown clays, which attains about the same thickness as the former, making the aggregate thickness of the drift where fully developed from fifty to eighty feet. No fossils have as yet been obtained from the drift in this county, so far as I am aware, though the tooth of a mammoth was found some years ago in the bluffs of the Sangamon, and near the surface, and probably came from beds not older than loess.

The discovery of the Niantic mastodon, some three years since, between Illiopolis and Niantic, and just over the Macon county line, excited considerable interest when the discovery was first announced, and I visited the locality, and was present when a part of the bones were taken out. The discovery was made on the farm of William F. Correll, in sinking a stock well in a wet, spongy piece of ground, located in a swale or depression of the surface that had evidently once been a pond of water, and had been filled up by the wash from the surrounding highland, until it formed a morass or quagmire in dry weather.

The bones were about four feet below the surface and partly imbedded in a light, gray quicksand filled with fresh water shells, Plass-orbis, Cyclas, Physa, etc. Above this quicksand there was four feet of black, peaty soil, so soft that a common fence rail could be easily pushed down through it. The quicksand had evidently once formed the bottom of a fresh water pond, fed probably by springs and was the resort of the animals whose bones were found here. The first bone met with in sinking the well was one of the tusks, and supposing it to be a small tree it was cut in two with an axe before its true character was suspected. The other tusk was taken out whole, and measured nine feet in length around the curve, and about two feet in circumference where it was inserted in the skull. The lower jaw, with the teeth in place, and the teeth of the upper jaw and some of the smaller bones were also found in a good state of preservation.

A fine pair of antlers of the elk, with some other bones of the same animal, and bones of the buffalo and deer were found in the position as the bones of the mastodon, but the bones of the smaller animals, although imbedded at the same depth, were lighter colored, less decayed, and appeared to have been buried at a more recent period.

The depth of the quicksand was not fully ascertained, but it was probed to the depth of two feet or more without reaching a solid bottom.

STRATIFIED ROCKS.

The stratified rocks, outcropping at the surface in this county, all belong to the upper coal measures, and overline all the main coal seams worked in the State. The lowest beds exposed in the county, are found on the Sangamon river, near the Menard line, and on Richland creek, one of the southern affluents of the Sangamon, in the western part of the county.

They consist mainly of sandstones and shales, including the horizon of the Rock creek limestone, although we have not, as yet, seen any out-crop of this limestone in Sangamon county.

A vertical section of all the beds exposed on the Sangamon and its tributaries, in the central and western portions of the county, would show the following relative position and thickness of strata:—

No. 1, sandy shales and soft sandstone,	15½ feet
No. 2, hard gray limestone, partly bleached,	10 to 12 feet
No. 3, black, slaty shale,	2 to 3 feet

No. 1, clay shale,	4 to 6 feet
No. 5, brown, calcareous sandstone, passing into ferruginous limestone,	4 to 5 feet
No. 6, clay shales, partly bituminous,	1 to 6 feet
No. 7, hard gray limestone (Carlinville limestone),	6 to 8 feet
No. 8, sandy shales and soft sandstone,	30 to 40 feet
No. 9, argillaceous limestone and calcareous shales,	2 to 3 feet
No. 10, bituminous shales,	1 foot
No. 11, coal No. 8,	1 to 2 feet
No. 12, fire clay,	2 to 3 feet
No. 13, impure limestone,	2 to 3 feet
No. 14, sandy shale and soft sandstones, with local bands of argillaceous and bituminous shale, ..	50 to 60 feet
No. 15, hard gray limestone, ...	2 to 6 feet
No. 16, shales—sandy, argillaceous and bituminous, with thin seam of coal,	30 to 60 feet

The beds numbered from one to seven, inclusive, of the above section, are well exposed on Sugar creek, two miles north of Virden, and thence down the creek to the crossing of the St. Louis, Alton & Chicago Railroad, between which points all the beds included in these numbers outcrop in succession, the eastward dip of the strata being somewhat less than the fall of the stream.

The upper limestone No. 2, of the above section is well exposed near the bridge on the main road north of Virden, and has been quarried both for lime and building stone. The upper part of the bed is a nodular, unevenly-bedded rock, partly brecciated, while the lower portion is more evenly bedded, affording a tolerably good building stone, in layers from four inches to a foot or more in thickness.

A little farther up the creek the whole mass becomes brecciated and fragmentary, and quarries in pebbly fragments suitable for macadamizing material.

The brown ferruginous bed, No. 5, of the foregoing section is a hard, massive rock, resembling the limestone at Crow's mill, on Sugar creek, six miles south of Springfield, of which it is probably the equivalent.

It contains numerous fossils, among which are Productus costatus, P. Nebraskaensis, P. Prattensis, Spriifer cameratus, Athyris subtilita, Yerebatula boides, Pinna per-acuta, and Myalina ampla?

The limestone No. 7, of the foregoing section is not fully exposed, but the upper layers outcrop in the bed of the creek just above the railroad bridge, in pebbly layers not unlike the upper layers of No. 2; as they appear above the bridge on the main road north of Virden. This out-crop is very similar in appearance to the upper layers of the Carlinville limestone, just below Carr's mill on Macoupin creek, northeast of Carlinville, and I have no doubt but this limestone on Sugar creek is the equivalent of that. Below the railroad bridge the shale underlying these limestones are the only beds exposed for some distance, but east of Auburn the limestones are again met with, and are found in outcrops from this point to Crow's mill, seven miles south of Springfield, where the rock for the old State House was obtained. At Peddecord's quarries, on Sugar creek, the State House rock is well exposed, affording the following section:

No. 1. Thin bedded ferruginous limestone,	2 to 3 feet.
No. 2. Massive, coarse-grained limestone,	4 feet.
No. 3. Clay shale, partly bituminous,	6 feet.
No. 4. Thin bedded limestone, .	3 to 4 feet.
No. 5. Sandy shale,	10 to 12 feet.

The material for the old State House was obtained mainly from No. 2 of the foregoing section, and there is a nearly continuous outcrop of these beds from this point to Crow's mill, two miles below, where the old State House quarries were located.

This rock is a coarse-grained, brownish-gray, crinoidal limestone, almost entirely composed of crinoidal joints and the calcareous remains of marine mollusca, cemented together by calcareous and ferruginous sediment.

In addition to the fossils already enumerated as occurring in this limestone at the locality north of Virden, the quarries here afford numerous specimens of springopora multithamata, which seem to belong in the clay shale under the limestone No. 2 of the foregoing section, and, so far as I am aware, has been found nowhere else but in this shale in Sangamon and Macoupin counties.

Some of the masses obtained on Sugar creek are nearly a foot in diameter. This limestone has also afforded fine specimens of Cladodus mortifer, Petalodus destructor, and Cyathocrinus Sangamonensis. This rock possesses the same lithological characters, and affords exactly the same group of fossils as the upper division of the main limestone at La Salle, and I have no doubt they are stratigraphical equivalents. Below Crow's mill to the outlet of Sugar creek into the Sangamon river, the sandy shales and sandstones intervening between this limestone and the coal outcroppings at Howlett, are the only beds to be seen. This coal seam, numbered 11, in the general section, given on a preceding page, ranges in thickness from eighteen inches to two feet, and is coal No. 8, of our general section of the Coal Measures, given in Vol. III, page 5, of these reports. It outcrops in the bank of the Sangamon river at Howlett, and on Spring creek and its branches north and west of Springfield; and previous to the discovery of the heavy beds below this, it was extensively worked in strip banks, and by tunnels along its line of outcrop. It is overlaid by a calcareous shale, and argillaceous limestone, which are wonderfully rich in fossils, and have afforded more than sixty species of shells, corals and crinoida characteristic of the upper coal measures. The coal is underlaid with a dark bluish-gray fire-clay two or three feet in depth, below which an impure nodular limestone is sometimes found, but more frequently the fire-clay rests directly upon the sandy shales and sandstones below.

At Howlett, the argillaceous limestone overlaying this coal seam, is succeeded by sandy shales, passing upward into soft mucaceous sandstones, which outcrop along the railroad grades just beyond Camp Butler, and contain an intercalated seam of poor coal only a few inches thick.

The limestones of Sugar creek, which properly overlay this sandstone, are not found in the vicinity of Howlett, having been probably removed in the erosion of the Sangamon valley.

Below this coal, where it outcrops west of the city, we find a bed of sandy shale and sandstone, from thirty to forty feet thick, that locally furnishes some building stone of fair quality, the thickly bedded portions being partly concretionary in structure, the concretions often attaining a diameter of five or six feet or more. They are exceedingly hard, but may be split into blocks of suitable size, and made a very durable building stone.

At Carpenter's mill, five miles north of Springfield, a fine exposure of the sandstone underlying this coal may be seen on the north bank of the Sangamon, where it forms a perpendicular cliff more than fifty feet in height. The upper and lower portions of the formations are thin bedded and shaly, but the middle portions, nearly twenty-five feet in thickness, is in tolerably heavy and evenly stratified beds, ranging from six inches to two feet or more in thickness. These layers seem to harden on exposure, and afford a very good building stone.

In a ravine, a little to the west of the mill, on the north side of the road, the coal No. 11, of the foregoing section, and overlaying argillaceous limestone, were found well up towards the top of the hill, and apparently above the sandstone exposure at the bridge. The limestone here contains the same species of fossils so abundant in the roof of this coal in the vicinity of Springfield.

The coal was not well exposed, but does not appear to be more than a few inches in thickness, and this exposure is probably on or near the most westerly outcrop of the seam on the north side of the river. Among the fossils common in the limestone and shales over this coal, the Lophophyllum proliferum is very abundant, and is associated with Astartella vera, Pleurotomaria sphaerulata, P. Grayvillensis, P. carbonaria, Bellerophon carbonaria, B. Montfortianus, B. percarinatus, B. Stevensianus, Leda bellarugosa, Nucula ventricoso, Polyphenopsis peracuta, P. nitidula, Soleniscus typicus, Lozonema rugosa, L. cerithiformis, Macrocheilus inhabilis, M. ponderosus, M. medialis, M. intercalaris, M. pulchella, M. ventricosus, Enomphalus rugosus, Productus longispinus, P. Nebraskaensis, P. Prattianus, Spirifer cameratus, S. Kentuckensis, Athyris, subtilita, etc.

The Rock creek limestone of Menard county, if it extends this far to the eastward, should outcrop on the Sangamon not very far below Carpenter's mill, as its place in the vertical section is between coals Nos. 7 and 8; but all these coal measure limestones are somewhat local in their development, and this bed has not been met with, so far as I know, in any of the coal shafts sunk in this vicinity.

The main coal No. 5, of the general section of the coal measures in the central and western portions of the State, lies about one hundred and seventy-five feet below coal No. 8, in the vicinity of Springfield, and two hundred to two hundred and ten below the general surface level. A boring for artesian water was made at Springfield in 1858, and was carried down to the depth of nearly twelve hundred feet without finding water that would rise to the surface, and the parties having the work in charge reported no coal below the small seam thirty or forty feet below the surface, though it was evident, from the character of the material brought up with the sand-pump, that they must have passed through from four or five hundred feet of coal measure strata. Subsequently, in a boring at Howlett, a six-foot seam of coal was found, at a depth of about two hundred feet. A shaft was immediately sunk, and extensive mining operations have been carried on there to the present time. The boring at Springfield not only passed through this seam, but all those underlaying it, of which two or three will probably be found of workable thickness, the men in charge of the work being apparently entirely unconscious of the true character of the strata through which their drill passed. If this work had been placed in the hands of competent men, and an accurate journal of the boring kept, we should now know exactly what our coal resources are, whereas nothing was known in regard to the development of the lower coals, except from the examinations of their outcrops along the Illinois river bluffs, until borings at Jacksonville and Chapin showed the existence of a seam at those points between three and four feet in thickness.

CHAPTER III.

PIONEER LIFE.

One of the most interesting phases of national or local history is that of the settlement of a new country. What was the original state in which the pioneer found the country, and how was it made to blossom as the rose?

Pioneer life in Sangamon county finds its parallel in almost every county in the State, and throughout the entire West. When Robert Pulliam and others of that noble band of pioneers settled here, they found an unbroken wilderness. Wild beasts and but little less wild savages, roamed at will over the prairies, through the forests, and along the waters of the "Sain-queemon" and its numerous tributaries. Forests were to be felled, cabins erected, mills built, and the river and creeks made to labor for the benefit of mankind. The beautiful prairies were to be robbed of their natural ornaments and the hand of art was to assist in their decoration. Who was to undertake this work? Are they qualified for the task? What will be the effect of their labors upon future generations?

The Sangamon county pioneers had many difficulties to contend with, not the least of which was the journey from civilization to their forest homes. The route lay for the most part through a rough country; swamps and marshes were crossed with great exertion and fatigue; rivers were forded with difficulty and danger; nights were passed on open prairies, with the sod for a couch and the heavens for a shelter; long, weary days and weeks of travel were endured, but finally "the promised land" was reached.

EARLY MANNERS AND CUSTOMS.

The young men and women of to-day have little conception of the mode of life among the early settlers of the country. One can hardly conceive how great a change has taken place in so short a time. In no respects are the habits and manners of the people similar to those of sixty years ago. The clothing, the dwellings, the diet, the social customs, have undergone a total revolution, as though a new race had taken possession of the land.

In a new country, far removed from the conveniences of civilization, where all are compelled to build their own houses, make their own clothing and procure for themselves the means of subsistence, it is to be expected that their dwellings and garments will be rude. These were matters controlled by surrounding circumstances and the means at their disposal. The earliest settlers constructed what were termed "three-faced camps," or, in other words, three walls, leaving one side open. They are described as follows: The walls were built about seven feet high, when poles were laid across at a distance of about three feet apart, and on these a roof of clapboards was laid, which were kept in place by weight poles placed on them. The clapboards were about four feet in length and from eight inches to twelve inches in width, split out of white oak timber. No floor was laid in the "camp." The structure required neither door, window, or chimney. The one side left out of the cabin answered all these purposes. In front of the open side was built a large log heap, which served for warmth in cold weather and for cooking purposes in all seasons. Of course there was an abundance of light, and, on either side of the fire, space to enter in and out. These "three-faced camps" were probably more easily constructed than the ordinary cabin, and was not the usual style of dwelling house.

The cabin was considered a material advance for comfort and home life. This was, in almost every case, built of logs, the spaces between the logs being filled in with split sticks of wood, called "chinks," and then daubed over, both inside and outside, with mortar made of clay. The floor, sometimes, was nothing more than earth tramped hard and smooth, but commonly made of "puncheons," or split logs, with the split side turned upward. The roof was made by gradually drawing in the top to the ridge-pole, and, on cross pieces, laying the "clap-boards," which, being several feet in length, instead of being nailed, were held in place by poles laid on them, called "weight poles," reaching the length of the cabin. For a fire-place, a space was cut out of the logs on one side of the room, usually about six feet in length, and three sides were built up of logs, making an offset in the wall. This was lined with stone, if convenient; if not, then earth. The flue, or upper part of the chimney, was built of small split sticks, two and a half or three feet in length, carried a little space above the roof, and plastered over with clay, and when finished was called a "cat-and-clay" chimney. The door space was also made by cutting an aperture in one side of the room of the required size, the door itself being made of clap-boards secured by wooden pins to two cross-pieces. The hinges were also of wood, while the fastening consisted of a wooden latch catching on a hook of the same material. To open the door from the outside, a strip of buckskin was tied to the latch and drawn through a hole a few inches above the latch-bar, so that on pulling the string the latch was lifted from the catch or hook, and the door was opened without further trouble. To lock the door, it was only necessary to pull the string through the hole to the inside. Here the family lived, and here the guest and wayfarer were made welcome. The living room was of good size, but to a large extent it was all—kitchen, bedroom, parlor and arsenal, with fitches of bacon and rings of dried pumpkin suspended from the rafters. In one corner were the loom and other implements used in the manufacture of clothing, and around the ample fireplace were collected the kitchen furniture. The clothing lined one side of the sleeping apartment, suspended from pegs driven in the logs. Hemp and flax were generally raised, and a few sheep kept. Out of these the clothing for the family and the sheets and coverlets were made by the females of the house. Over the door was placed the trusty rifle, and just back of it hung the powder horn and hunting pouch. In the well-to-do families, or when crowded on the ground floor, a loft was sometimes made to the cabin for a sleeping place and the storage of "traps" and articles not in common use. The loft was reached by a ladder secured to the wall. Generally the bedrooms were separated from the living-room by sheets and coverlets suspended from the rafters, but until the means of making these partition walls were ample, they lived and slept in the same room.

Familiarity with this mode of living did away with much of the discomfort, but as soon as the improvement could be made, there was added to the cabin an additional room, or a "double log cabin" being substantially a "three-faced camp," with a log room on each end and containing a loft. The furniture in the cabin corresponded with the house itself. The articles used in the kitchen were as few and simple as can be imagined. A "Dutch oven" or skillet, a long-handled frying pan, an iron pot or kettle, and sometimes a coffee-pot, constituted the utensils of the best furnished kitchen. A little later, when a stone wall formed the base of the chimney, a long iron "crane" swung in the chimney place, which on its "pot-hook" carried the boiling kettle or heavy iron pot. The cooking was all done on the fire-place and at the fire, and the style of cooking was as simple as the utensils. Indian, or corn meal, was the common flour, which was made into "pone" or "corn-dodger," or "hoe-cake," as the occasion or variety demanded. The "pone" and the "dodger" was baked in the Dutch oven, which was first set on a bed of glowing coals. When the oven was filled with the dough, the lid, already heated on the fire, was placed on the oven and covered with hot embers and ashes. When the bread was done it was taken from the oven and placed near the fire to keep warm while some other food was being prepared in the same oven for the forthcoming meal. The "hoe-cake" was prepared in the same way as the dodger—that is, a stiff dough was made of the meal and water, and, taking as much as could conveniently be held in both hands, it was molded into the desired shape by being tossed from hand to hand, then laid on a board or flat stone placed at an angle before the fire and patted down to the required thickness. In the fall and early winter, cooked pumpkin was added to the meal dough, giving a flavor and richness to the bread not attained by the modern methods. In the oven from which the bread was taken, the venison or ham was then fried, and, in the winter, lye hominy, made from the unbroken grains of corn, added to the frugal meal. The woods abounded in honey, and of this the early settlers had an abundance the year round. For some years after settlements were made, the corn meal formed the staple commodity for bread.

These simple cabins were inhabited by a kind and true-hearted people. They were strangers to mock-modesty, and the traveler seeking lodgings for the night, or desirous of spending a few days in the community, if willing to accept the rude offering, was always welcome, although how they were disposed of at night the reader may not easily imagine; for, as described, often a single room would be made to serve the purpose of kitchen, dining-room, sitting-room and parlor, and many families consisted of six or eight persons.

CHARACTER OF THE PIONEERS.

The character of the pioneers of Sangamon county falls properly within the range of the historian. They lived in a region of exuberance and fertility, where Nature had scattered her blessings with a liberal hand. The Sangamon river, with its numerous tributaries, the inexhaustible forest supply, the fertile prairie, and the many improvements constantly going forward, with the bright prospect for a glorious future in everything that renders life pleasant, combined to deeply impress their character, to give them a spirit of enterprise, an independence of feeling, and a joyousness of hope. They were a thorough admixture of many nations, characters, languages, conditions and opinions. There was scarcely a State in the Union that was not represented among the early settlers. All the various religious sects had their advocates. All now form one society. Says an early writer: "Men must cleave to their kind, and must be dependent upon each other. Pride and jealousy give way to the natural yearnings of the human heart for society. They begin to rub off the neutral prejudices; one takes a step and then the other; they meet half way and embrace; and the society thus newly organized and constituted is more liberal, enlarged, unprejudiced, and of course more affectionate, than a society of people of like birth and character, who bring all their early prejudices as a common stock, to be transmitted as an inheritance to posterity."

CLOTHING.

The clothing of the early pioneers was as plain and simple as their houses. Necessity compelled it to be in conformity to the strictest economy. The clothing taken to the new country was made to render a vast deal of service until a crop of flax or hemp could be grown, out of which to make the household apparel. The prairie wolves made it difficult to take sheep into the settlements, but after the sheep had been introduced and flax and hemp raised in sufficient quantities, it still remained an arduous task to spin, weave and make the wearing apparel for an entire family. In summer, nearly all persons, both male and female, went barefooted. Buckskin moccasins were much worn. Boys of twelve and fifteen years of age never thought of wearing anything on their feet, except during three or four months of the coldest weather in winter. Boots were unknown until a later generation. After flax was raised in sufficient quantities, and sheep could be protected from the wolves, a better and more comfortable style of clothing prevailed. Flannel and linsey were woven and made into garments for the women and children, and jeans for the men. The wool for the jeans was colored from the bark of the walnut, and from this came the term "butternut," still common throughout the West. The black and white wool mixed, varied the color, and gave the name "pepper-and-salt." As a matter of course every family did its own spinning, weaving and sewing, and for years all the wool had to be carded by hand on cards from four inches broad to eight and ten inches long. The picking of the wool and carding was work to which the little folks could help, and at the proper season all the little hands were enlisted in the business. Every household had its big and little spinning-wheels, winding-blades, reel, warping-bars and loom. The articles were indispensable in every family. In many of the households of Sangamon county, stowed away in empty garrets and out-of-the-way places, may still be found some of these almost forgotten relics.

The preparations for the family clothing usually began in the early fall, and the work was continued on into the winter months, when the whirr of the wheels and the regular stroke of the loom could be heard until a late hour of the night. No scene can well be imagined so abounding in contentment and domestic happiness. Strips of bark, of the shell-bark hickory, thrown from time to time in the ample fireplace, cast a ruddy, flickering light over the room. In one corner, within range of the reflected light, the father is cobbling a well-worn pair of shoes, or trying his skill at making new ones. Hard by, the young ones are shelling corn for the next grist. The oldest daughter whirls the large spinning-wheel, and with its hum and whirr trips to the far side of the room, drawing out the thread, while the mother, with the click of the shuttle and the measured thump of the loom, fills up the hours—the whole a scene of domestic industry and happiness rarely elsewhere to be found.

It is well for "Young America" to look back on those early days. It involved a life of toil, hardship, and the lack of many comforts, but it was the life that made men of character. Sangamon county to-day has no better men than the immediate descendants of those who built their cabins in the forest, and by patient endurance wrought out of the wilderness the landmarks for a prosperous commonwealth. One of these writes that "the boys were required to do their share of the hard labor of clearing up the farm, for much of the country now under the plow was at one time heavily timbered, or was covered with a dense thicket of hazel and young timber. Our visits were made with ox teams, and we walked, or rode on horseback, or in wagons to 'meeting.' The boys 'pulled,' 'broke' and 'hackled' flax, wore tow shirts, and indulged aristocratic feelings in fringed 'hunting-shirts' and 'coon-skin caps,' 'picked' and 'carded' wool by hand, and 'spooled' and 'quilled' yarn for the weaving till the back ached."

Industry such as this, supported by an economy and frugality from which there was then no escape, necessarily brought its own reward. The hard toil made men old before their time, but beneath their sturdy blows they saw not only the forest pass away, but the fields white with the grain. Change and alterations were to be expected, but the reality has distanced the wildest conjecture; and, stranger still, multitudes are still living who witnessed not only the face of nature undergoing a change about them, but the manners, customs and industries of a whole people almost wholly changed. Many an old pioneer sets by his fireside in his easy chair, with closed eyes, dreams of the scenes of the long ago.

"The voice of Nature's very self drops low.
As though she whispered of the long ago,
When down the wandering stream the rude canoe
Of some lone trapper glided into view,
And loitered down the watery path that led Thro' forest depths, that only knew the tread
Of savage beasts, and wild barbarians,
That skulked about with blood upon their hands
And murder in their hearts. The light of day Might barely pierce the gloominess that lay
Like some dark pall across the water's face,
And folded all the land in its embrace;
The panther's screaming, and the bear's low growl,
The snake's sharp rattle, and the wolf's wild howl,
The owl's grim chuckle, as it rose and fell
In alternation with the Indian's yell,
Made fitting prelude for the gory plays
That were enacted in the early days.

"Now, o'er the vision, like a mirage, falls
The old log cabin with its dingy walls,
And crippled chimney, with the crutch-like prop
Beneath, a sagging shoulder at the top.
The 'coon-skin, battened fast on either side,
The wisps of leaf tobacco, cut and dried;
The yellow strands of quartered apples hung
In rich festoons that tangle in among
The morning-glory vines that clamber o'er
The little clapboard roof above the door;
Again, thro' mists of memory arise
The simple scenes of home before the eyes;
The happy mother humming with her wheel,
The dear old melodies that used to steal
So drowsily upon the summer air,
The house dog hid his bone, forgot his care,
And nestled at her feet, to dream, perchance,
Some cooling dream of winter-time romance.
The square of sunshine through the open door
That notched its edge across the puncheon floor,
And made a golden coverlet whereon
The god of slumber had a picture drawn
Of babyhood, in all the loveliness
Of dimpled cheek, and limb, and linsey dress.
The bough-filled fireplace and the mantle wide,
Its fire-scorched ankles stretched on either side,
Where, perchance upon its shoulders 'neath the joists,
The old clock hiccoughed, harsh and husky-voiced;
Tomatoes, red and yellow, in a row,
Preserved not then for diet but for show;
The jars of jelly, with their dainty tops;
Bunches of pennyroyal and cordial drops,
The flask of camphor and vial of squills,
The box of buttons, garden seeds and pills.
And thus the pioneer and helpsome aged wife
Reflectively reviews the scenes of early life."

WEDDINGS.

The wedding was an attractive feature of pioneer life. There was no distinction of life and very little of fortune. On these accounts the first impressions of love generally resulted in marriage. The family establishment cost but little labor—nothing more. The marriage was always celebrated at the house of the bride, and she was generally left to choose the officiating clergyman. A wedding, however, engaged the attention of the whole neighborhood. It was anticipated by both old and young with eager expectation. In the morning of the wedding day the groom and his intimate friends assembled at the house of his father, and after due preparation, departed, en masse, for the "mansion" of his bride. The journey was sometimes made on horseback, sometimes on foot, and sometimes in farm wagons and carts. It was always a merry journey; and to insure merriment, the bottle was always taken along. On reaching the house of the bride, the marriage ceremony took place, and then dinner or supper was served. After the meal the dancing commenced, and generally lasted until the following morning. The figures of the dances were three and four-handed reels, or square sets and jigs. The commencement was always a square four, which was followed by what pioneers called "jigging;" that is, two of the four would single out for a jig, and were followed by the remaining couple. The jigs were often accompanied with what was called "cutting out" that is, when either of the parties became tired of the dance, on intimation, the place was supplied by some one of the company, without interruption of the dance. In this way the reel was often continued until the musician was exhausted. About nine or ten o'clock in the evening a deputation of young ladies stole off the bride and put her to bed. In doing this, they had to ascend a ladder from the kitchen to the upper floor, which was composed of loose boards. Here, in the pioneer bridal chamber, the young, simple-hearted girl was put to bed by her enthusiastic friends. This done, a deputation of young men escorted the groom to the same department, and placed him snugly by the side of his bride. The dance still continued, and if the seats were scarce, which was generally the case, says a local witness, every young man, when not engaged in the dance, was obliged to offer his lap as a seat for one of the girls; and the offer was sure to be accepted. During the night's festivities spirits were freely used, but seldom to excess. The infair was held on the following evening, where the same order of exercises was observed.

SHAKES.

Another feature of pioneer life which every old settler will vividly recall was the "chills and fever," "fever and ague," or "shakes," as it was variously called. It was a terror to new-comers, for in the fall of the year almost everybody was afflicted with it. It was no respecter of persons; everybody looked pale and sallow as though frost-bitten. It was not contagious, but derived from impure water and air, which was always developed in the opening up of a new country of rank soil like that of Sangamon county. The impurities continued to absorb from day to day, and from week to week, until the whole corporate body becomes saturated with it as with electricity, and then the shock came; and the shock was a regular shake, with a fixed beginning and ending, coming on in some cases each day, but generally on alternate days, with a regularity that was surprising. After the shakes came the fever, and this "last estate was worse than first;" it was a burning hot fever and lasted for hours. When you had the chill you couldn't get warm, and when you had the fever you couldn't get cool. It was exceedingly awkward in this respect—indeed it was. Nor would it stop for any contingency—not even a wedding in the family would stop it. It was imperative and tyrannical. When the appointed time came around, everything else had to be stopped to attend to its demands. It didn't even have any Sundays or holidays. After the fever went down you still didn't feel much better, you felt as though you had gone through some sort of a collision, threshing machine, or jarring machine, and came out not killed, but next thing to it. You felt weak, as though you had run too far after something, and then didn't catch it. You felt languid, stupid and sore, and was down in the mouth and heel and partially raveled out. Your back was out of fix, your head ached and your appetite crazy. Your eyes had too much white in them; your ears, especially after taking quinine, had too much roar in them, and your whole body and soul were entirely woe-begone, disconsolate, sad, poor and good for nothing. You didn't think much of yourself and didn't believe that other people did either; and you didn't care. You didn't quite make up your mind to commit suicide, but sometimes wished some accident would happen to knock either the malady or yourself out of existence. You imagined even the dogs looked at you with a sort of self-complacency. You thought the sun had a sort of sickly shine about it. About this time you came to the conclusion that you would not take the whole State as a gift; and if you had the strength and means you would pick up Hannah and the baby, and your traps, and go back "yander" to "Old Virginny," the "Jarseys," Maryland, or "Pennsylvania."

"And to-day, the swallows flitting
Round my cabin, see me sitting Moody within the sunshine,
Just inside my silent door,
Waiting for the 'ager, seeming
Like a man forever dreaming;
And the sunlight on me streaming
Throws no shadow on the floor;
For I am too thin and sallow
To make shadows on the floor—
Nary shadow any more!"

The foregoing is not a mere picture of the imagination. It is simply recounting in quaint phrase what actually occurred in hundreds of cases. Whole families would sometimes be sick at one time, and not one member scarcely able to wait upon another. Labor or exercise always aggravated the malady, and it took General Laziness a long time to thrash the enemy out. These were the days for swallowing all sorts of roots and "yarbs" and whisky straight, with some faint hope of relief. Finally, when the case wore out, the last remedy got the credit of the cure.

WOLF HUNTING.

In early days more mischief was done by wolves than by any other wild animal, and no small part of their mischief consisted in their almost constant barking at night, which always seemed menacing and frightful to the settlers. Like mosquitos, the noise they made appeared to be about as dreadful as the real depredations they committed. The most effectual, as well as the most exciting, method of ridding the country of these hateful pests, was that known as the "circular wolf hunt," by which all the men and boys would turn out on an appointed day, in a kind of circle comprising many square miles of territory, with horses and dogs, and then close up toward the center field of operation, gathering, not only wolves, but also deer and many smaller "varmint." Five, ten, or more wolves, by this means, would be killed in a single day. The men would be organized with as much system as a small army, everyone being posted in the meaning of every signal and the application of every rule. Guns were scarcely ever allowed to be brought on such occasions, as their use would be unavoidably dangerous. The dogs were depended upon for the final slaughter. The dogs, by the way, had all to be held in check by a cord in the hands of their keepers until the final signal was given to let them loose, when away they would all go to the center of battle, and a more exciting scene would follow than can easily be described.

BEE HUNTING.

This wild recreation was a peculiar one, and many sturdy backwoodsmen gloried in excelling in this art. He would carefully watch a bee as it filled itself with the product of some sweet flower or leaf bud, and notice particularly the direction taken by it as it struck a "bee-line" for its home, which, when found, would generally be high up in the hollow of some tree. The tree would be marked, and in the fall a party would go and cut down the tree and capture the honey as quick as they could before it wasted away through the broken walls in which it had been so carefully stowed by the busy little bee. Several gallons would often be taken from a single tree, and by a very little work, and pleasant at that, the early settlers could keep themselves in honey the year round. By the time the honey was a year old it would turn white and granulate, yet be as good and healthful as when fresh. This was called by some "candied" honey.

SNAKES.

In pioneer times snakes were numerous, such as the rattlesnake, viper, adder, bloodsnake, and many varieties of large blue and green snakes, milksnake, garter and watersnakes, and others. If, on meeting one of these, you would retreat, they would chase you very fiercely; but if you would turn and give them battle, they would immediately turn and crawl away with all possible speed, hide in the grass and weeds and wait for a "greener" customer. These really harmless snakes served to put people on their guard against the more dangerous and venomous kind. It was a common practice, in order to exterminate them, for the men to turn out in companies, with spades, mattocks and crowbars, attack the principal snake dens and slay large numbers of them. In early spring the snakes were somewhat torpid, and easily captured. Scores of rattlesnakes were sometimes frightened out of a single den, which, as soon as they showed their heads through the crevices of the rocks, were dispatched, and left to be devoured by the numerous wild hogs of that day. Some of the fattest of these snakes were taken to the house and oil extracted from them, and their glittering skins were saved as specific for rheumatism. Another method for the destruction was to fix a heavy stick over the door of their dens, with a long grapevine attached, so that one at a distance could plug the entrance to the den when the snakes were all out sunning themselves. Then a large company of citizens, on hand by appointment, could kill scores of the reptiles in a few minutes.

AGRICULTURE.

In the earlier settlements of this section, ponds, marshes and swamps abounded where to-day are found cultivated and fertile fields. The low and flat places were avoided for the higher grounds, not only on account of the wetness, but for sanitary reasons. Agricultural implements were necessarily rude, and the agriculture of a corresponding character. The plow used was called a "bar-share" plow, the iron point of which consisted of a bar of iron about two feet long, and a broad share of iron welded to it. At the extreme point was a coulter that passed through a beam six or seven feet long, to which was attached handles of corresponding length. The mold-board was a wooden one split out of winding timber, or hewed into a winding shape, in order to turn the soil over. In the spring time, when the ground was to be prepared for the seed, the father would take his post at the plow, and the daughter possession of the reins. This is a grand scene—one full of grace and beauty. The pioneer girl thinks but little of fine dress; knows less of the fashions; has probably heard of the opera, but does not understand its meaning; has been told of the piano, but has never seen one; wears a dress "buttoned up behind;" has on "leather boots," and "drives plow" for father. In the planting of corn, which was always done by hand, the girls always took a part, usually dropping the corn, but many of them covering it with the hand-hoe.

In the cultivation of wheat, the land was plowed the same as for corn, and harrowed with a wooden-toothed harrow, or smoothed by dragging over the ground a heavy brush, weighed down, if necessary, with a stick of timber. It was then sown broadcast by hand at the rate of about a bushel and a quarter to the acre, and harrowed in with the brush. The implement used to cut the wheat was either the sickle or the cradle. The sickle was almost identical with the "grass hook" in use, and the cradle was a scythe fastened to a frame of wood with long, bending teeth or strips of wood, for cutting and laying the grain in swaths. There were few farmers who did not know how to swing the scythe or cradle, and there was no more pleasant picture on a farm than a gang of workmen in the harvest field, nor a more hilarious crowd. Three cradlers would cut about ten acres a day. One binder was expected to keep up with the cradle. Barns for the storage of the unthreshed grain are comparatively a "modern invention," and as soon as the shock was supposed to be sufficiently cured, it was hauled to some place on the farm convenient for threshing, and there put in stack. The threshing was performed in one of two ways, by flail or tramping with horses, generally the latter. The flail was used in stormy weather, on the sheltered floor, or when the farm work was not pressing; the threshing by tramping commonly in clear weather, on a level and well tramped clay floor. The bundles were piled in a circle of about fifteen to twenty feet in diameter, and four to six horses ridden over the straw. One or two hands turned over and kept the straw in place. When sufficiently trampled, the straw was thrown into a rick or stack, and the wheat cleared by a "fanning-mill," or sometimes, before fanning-mills were introduced, by letting it fall from the height of ten or twelve feet, subjected to the action of the wind, when it was supposed to be ready for the mill or market.

RELIGION.

The religious element in the life of the pioneer was such as to attract the attention of those living in more favored places. The pioneer was no hypocrite. If he believed in horse-racing, whisky-drinking, card-playing, or anything of like character, he practiced them openly and above board. If he was of a religious turn of mind he was not ashamed to own it. He could truthfully sing

"I'm not ashamed to own my Lord,
Or blush to speak his name."

But the pioneer clung to the faith of his fathers, for a time, at least. If he was a Presbyterian he was not ashamed of it, but rather prided himself on being one of the elect. If a Methodist, he was one to the fullest extent. He prayed long and loud if the spirit moved him, and cared nothing for the empty forms of religion.

A traveling Presbyterian minister, visiting this region of country at a very early day, thus speaks of the sectarian feeling which then existed:

"In these new religions, too, of the most absolute independence, you see all the wanderings of human thought, every shade of faith, every degree of the most persevering attachments to preconceived opinions. You see, too, all degrees of pretension in religion, followed by unhappy manifestations of the hollowness of such pretensions. You meet, it is true, with more cheering circumstances, and we sometimes are able to see that which we strongly wish to see. At one point you meet with a respectable Methodist and begin to feel an attachment to the profession. He next meets you with harmony and co-operation on his lips, and the next thing which you hear is you are being charged of being a fierce Calvinist, and that you have preached that "hell is paved with infants' skulls." While, perhaps, the society with which you are connected hear from an opposite quarter, and from a pretended friend, that in such a sermon you departed from the dicta of the Great Master and are leading the people to the gulf of Armenianism. The Baptists are as exclusive as in the older regions. Even among our own brethren, it is well known, that there is some feeling of a questionable nature, some rivalry between the pupils, the doctors and schools of Andover and Princeton. The Cumberland Presbyterians, with all the freshness of a new sect, are not found lacking in this order of things. Lastly, there are the Catholics, abundantly more united in faith, in spirit, and in purpose than we are—who claim a kind of proscriptive right to the ground, on the pretext of prior possession. Add to these the followers of Elias Smith, and the multitudes of men who would be founders of new sects, and you will have some idea of the sectarian feelings that you will have to encounter."

But these sectarian feelings were not to last. Separated from the religious influences of the land of their birth, and seldom hearing the gospel message, they were literally starving for the "bread of life," and the worthy minister of whatever denomination that chanced to call received a cordial welcome. The best the early pioneers had to give was at their service. All they required was that the ministers be a true and faithful follower of Christ, and preach to them of a common salvation.

CHAPTER IV.

JUDICIAL.

When the Lord placed Adam and Eve in the garden of Eden he gave unto them a law, requiring implicit obedience, on pain of punishment for transgression. As the human race increased, other laws in addition to those given in the beginning became necessary. The formation of laws implies there shall be a judge and a place where justice shall be administered. In accordance with this fact our legislators, on the formation of the State Government, enacted certain laws, and ordained means by which those laws should be executed.

The first Constitution of the State declared that the judicial powers of the State should be vested in one Supreme Court, and such inferior courts as the General Assembly should from time to time ordain and establish. This Supreme Court consisted of a chief justice and three associates. They were appointed by joint ballot in both branches of the General Assembly, and commissioned by the Governor, and held their offices during good behavior, until the first session of the legislature in 1824. They were required to hold the circuit courts in the several counties in each month, and at such times as the General Assembly should by law prescribe. The State was accordingly divided into four districts, and by an act approved February 11, 1821, Sangamon County, together with St. Clair, Madison, Greene, Pike and Montgomery were constituted the First Judicial Circuit, and John Reynolds, Associate Justice, assigned to it.

The first term of the Sangamon County Circuit Court was held at the house of John Kelly, on Monday, May 7, 1821. There were present John Reynolds, judge; Charles R. Matheny, clerk; John Taylor, sheriff; Henry Starr, prosecuting attorney, pro tem.

The following list of grand jurors were empaneled and sworn: Daniel Parkinson, foreman; Claybourn James, Henry Brown, John Darneille, Archibald Turner, William Davis, Abraham Ritchey, Abraham Carlock, Levi Harbour, George Hayworth, William Eads, Thomas Knotts; James McCoy, James Tweddel, Aaron Hawley, Field James, Mason Fowler, Isaac Keyes and Elias Williams.

Charles R. Matheny presented his bond and security as clerk, which was approved by the court.

John Taylor presented his bond as sheriff, with security, which was approved by the court.

Suit was commenced by Samuel L. Irwin against Roland Shepherd, for trespass, and dismissed at plaintiff's cost.

Three indictments were found by the grand jury, two for assault and battery and one for riot, trials of which were deferred until the next term of court.

This completed the business of this term of court, and judge, lawyers and spectators all adjourned.

John Reynolds, who presided at this term of court, and who was chief justice of the State at the time, was afterwards Governor of the State, and is familiarly known as the "Old Ranger." He was a man of strong mind and strong will power, although inclined to yield somewhat to make himself popular with the people. In the history of the bar is given an anecdote showing to what extent he would go to keep the good will of another. Judge Reynolds was a scholarly man, understanding the Latin and Greek languages perfectly. He is the author of a history of Illinois.

An act of the legislature was passed and approved by the Governor February 17, 1823, by which Montgomery was detached from, and Morgan and Fulton added to, the First Judicial Circuit, and this was further changed December 29, 1824, by which the district was formed of Sangamon, Pike, Fulton, Morgan, Greene and Montgomery counties. At this time the State was divided into five circuits. John York Sawyer was appointed to the first circuit composed of the counties named.

John York Sawyer was a remarkable man, remarkable at least for weight, David Davis being a common sized man by his side. He was an ill-tempered man, too, notwithstanding his size. While he was on the circuit the law provided for whipping men for petit larceny. Sawyer, says Linder, was a terror to all such offenders, and was fond of snapping up the lawyers who defended them. A fellow was once tried before him for petit larceny and convicted. He was defended by Alfred W. Cavarly, who moved an arrest of judgment and a new trial, and begged his honor to allow him to go over to his office and get some authorities which he wished to read in support of his motion.

"Oh, certainly, certainly," said Sawyer to him, assuming one of the blandest looks possible, "The court will wait with the greatest pleasure on you, Mr. Cavarly."

Cavarly made one of his profoundest bows and retired. Scarcely had he left the court house when Sawyer said to the sheriff:

"Mr. Sheriff, take the prisoner out to yonder white oak tree (pointing to one through a window which was back of him, and about fifty yards off), strip him to the skin, and give him thirty-nine lashes on his back, well laid on."

The sheriff executed the sentence of the court with great speed. Sawyer turned around and looked out of the window while it was being executed, and in a loud voice, while the blood was streaming down the culprit's back, counted the number of strokes on his fingers—one, two, three, and so on up to thirty-nine. The sheriff washed the back of the prisoner, re clothed him, and brought him into court.

He was scarcely seated when Cavarly made his appearance with his arm full of law books, and with great confidence said to the court:

"May it please your Honor, I am now prepared to show beyond a doubt that my client has been wrongfully convicted, and is entitled to a new trial."

"Very well, Mr. Cavarly, go on; the court will hear you with great pleasure."

Sawyer had the malice to let Cavarly proceed and read authorities for some time, but at last interposed and said:

"Mr. Cavarly, you have satisfied the court, and if you desire it I shall grant you a new trial."

But at this point his client whispered in his ear:

"Don't take it, Mr. Cavarly, or they will whip me again."

The court went on to finish his remarks:

"But I will inform you that your client has been whipped, and received thirty-nine lashes on his bare back, well laid on, for I saw and counted them."

Cavarly exclaimed with great indignation:

"This is an outrage, and I protest against such conduct on the part of a court."

"Oh, Mr. Cavarly, you have a right to protest. Clerk, enter Mr. Cavarly's protest on the record;" and turning to Mr. Cavarly, said: "Now, Mr. Cavarly, bring on your corn merchant (meaning a client of Cavarly's, who was charged with stealing corn), and we will dispose of him as we have with your hog merchant"—the man who had been whipped.

Judge Sawyer has long since been dead.

A change was again made in the circuit by an act approved January 12, 1827, it now embracing Peoria, Fulton, Schuyler, Adams, Pike, Calhoun, Greene, Morgan and Sangamon; Samuel D. Lockwood being Judge of the Circuit.

In January, 1829, Sangamon county still formed part of the first circuit, together with the counties of Pike, Calhoun, Greene, Macoupin, Morgan, Macon, and Tazewell. Two years later McLean was added to the circuit. No further change was then made until 1835, when there was a general reorganization, this district remaining the same, with the exception that Pike county was taken from it. Stephen T. Logan was elected this year, and served with great credit to himself and the district for two years. On the 20th day of March, 1837, William Brown was commissioned, and served four months, when Jesse B. Thomas, Jr., was duly commissioned. Judge Thomas, of whom mention is made in the history of the Bar, resigned in 1839.

In 1839, a new Judicial Circuit, numbered the eighth, was formed, comprising the counties of Sangamon, McLean, Macon, Tazewell, Menard, Logan, Dane (now Christian) and Livingston. This circuit was formed by act of the legislature approved February 23, 1839. Stephen T. Logan, a few days subsequently, received a commission as judge of the circuit, but resigned the office in about three months, and Samuel H. Treat was commissioned to fill the vacancy. Judge Treat was elected and recommissioned January 30, 1840, and held the office up to the time of the adoption of the new constitution in 1848. A sketch of Judge Treat will be found in connection with the bar history.

By the constitution of 1848, the State was divided into nine judicial circuits, in each of which a judge was elected September, 1848. The legislature was authorized to increase the number of circuits as might be required. No change was made in the Eighth Circuit, of which Sangamon county was a part.

David Davis was the first judge elected in this circuit under the new constitution. Judge Davis is a native of Maryland. After graduating at a New England college, and having studied law with a noted barrister, he came to Illinois when quite a young man and settled in Pekin, where he remained about one year and then moved to Bloomington. Here he opened a law office, and by his sagacity, economy and industry, he soon won his way to respectable independence. In his Reminiscences of the Bar, General Linder has this to say of Judge Davis:

"For his promotion to the circuit judgeship, Mr. Davis was largely indebted to his old and tried friend, Abraham Lincoln, and to the eternal credit of Judge Davis, be it said, he never forgot it. When a member of the convention in 1860, that nominated the Republican candidate for President, Judge Davis had as large, if not a larger share in bringing about the nomination of Mr. Lincoln than any other member of that convention, and when Mr. Lincoln was elected, Davis was invited to accompany him to Washington as one of his suite. Mr. Davis is a large man—about six feet high, very corpulent, and weighing some three hundred and fifty pounds. He accepted Mr. Lincoln's invitation, and being somewhat conspicuous for his size, and for wearing a white silk hat, the aspirants for office perceived by the attentions paid him by Mr. Lincoln that he had no small influence with the President-elect, and they paid about as much court to the man with the white hat as to Mr. Lincoln himself.

"But I wish to go back to the time when he was circuit judge of the State of Illinois, and Mr. Lincoln and myself both practiced in his circuit—Mr. Lincoln in the whole of it, and I in the counties of Vermilion, Edgar and Shelby, and occasionally in Champaign. Judge Davis was a very impartial judge, and though not intending to show a preference for one of his lawyers over another, such was the marked difference he showed to Mr. Lincoln, that Lincoln threw the rest of us in the shade. But as Mr. Lincoln could not take both sides of a case, Anthony Thornton, myself and other prominent lawyers, were employed on the opposite side of cases in which Mr. Lincoln was engaged on one side or the other. Judge Davis always treated me with great kindness and consideration, and I wish to state here, before going further, lest the reader should think that my practice was confined to cases in which I was opposed to Mr. Lincoln, that in weighty and hotly contested cases we were often associated together, so that I cannot say that I was at all damaged by the friendship shown for him by his Honor, Judge Davis. I think it quite likely that I been placed in the same relation to Mr. Lincoln that Judge Davis was, I should have shown to him the same consideration as was shown him by his Honor, Judge Davis.

"Lincoln and myself generally put up at the same hotel, and frequently slept in the same room, and not unfrequently Lincoln and I occupied the same bed. Judge Davis was too large to take either of us for a bed-fellow.

"Among the most pleasant days of my life I recall those when we three traveled together from Danville to Paris, and from there to Shelbyville. The courts of those three places lasting on an average from two to three weeks each. Ah! what glorious fun we had sometimes!

"I will give a little incident here to show the eccentricity of Judge Davis, which occurred at the Paris Circuit Court. Judge Harlan, who was then judge on the circuit south of here, came up to Paris on some special business of his, and Judge Davis, observing him in the court house, invited him to come up and take a seat on the bench beside him, which Judge Harlan did; and while there a little appeal came up, in which there was only about three dollars in controversy, in which I was engaged. I read a decision of the Supreme Court which I thought, and which was decisive of the case. Judge Davis turned to Harlan and whispered in his ear, as I afterwards learned from Judge Harlan, 'Great God!' said he, 'for a lawyer of Linder's age and standing to read a decision of the Supreme Court in a little appeal case where there are only three dollars in dispute!' He nevertheless gave a decision in favor of my client.

"Another little circumstance I will relate, going further to show his eccentricity and his friendship for me. Some time in the year, I think of 1850, I went up to Springfield, either on a visit or on some business or other, when Judge Davis was holding his court there; and I had landed but about an hour when the prosecuting attorney, hearing that I was in town, came and employed me to assist him in the prosecution of a woman and her paramour for the murder of her husband by the administration of poison. As I entered the court room, Judge Davis being on the bench, and perceiving me to enter the room with my pipe in my mouth, said in an audible voice:

“It created quite a laugh over the house, and you may rest assured I was not so modest or self-denying as to refuse to take advantage of the permission thus given me to smoke my pipe during the progress of the trial.

“I have already stated that Davis, by invitation of Mr. Lincoln, went with him to Washington, and was present at his inauguration, and I was informed remained there for some considerable time. And although he held no cabinet office under Mr. Lincoln, yet it was pretty well known that Mr. Lincoln had great confidence in Judge Davis, and consulted him on public affairs frequently during those dark and perilous days just before and after the war commenced. I am inclined to think that Mr. Lincoln tendered him a place in his cabinet, but Judge Davis waited for a safer and more permanent place. His ambition was to reach the Supreme Bench of the United States, and after a while, a vacancy occurring, Judge Davis was appointed to fill the place, over the heads of such men as Salmon P. Chase and other formidable aspirants. His nomination was confirmed by the Senate of the United States. He has made a most excellent judge, and has delivered some opinions on constitutional questions which have given him a national reputation.

In 1877, Judge Davis was elected to the United States Senate for the term of six years. In the Senate he has occupied an independent position, though generally acting with the Democratic members of that body.

By an act approved February 3, 1853, the Eighth Circuit was composed of the following counties: Sangamon, Logan, McLean, Woodford, Tazewell, De Witt, Champaign and Vermilion. As thus constituted it remained unchanged until 1857. By an act approved February 11, 1857, Sangamon county was made part of the Eighteenth Circuit, together with the counties of Macoupin, Montgomery and Christian.

On the organization of this new circuit, Edward Y. Rice was elected and served as judge of the circuit until 1870. Judge Rice was elected to this office from Montgomery county, and served acceptably during the continuance of the circuit. He is a man of clear mind, a good judge of law, his judgment rarely being reversed. He was appreciated by the entire bar, not only of Sangamon county, but of the circuit.

In 1869, Sangamon county, together, with Macoupin, embraced the Thirtieth Judicial Circuit. Benjamin S. Edwards was commissioned judge of the circuit, and held the office about fifteen months and then resigned. While on the bench he was quite popular with bar and people. (See sketch in connection with the history of the bar.)

John A. McClernand was elected to fill the vacancy, and was commissioned July 12, 1870. He remained in the office until the expiration of the term. A sketch of Judge McClernand appears in connection with the bar history.

The General Assembly, by an act approved March 28, 1873, divided the State into twenty-six judicial circuits, Sangamon county, together with the counties of Macoupin, Shelby, Christian, Fayette and Montgomery, comprising the nineteenth. Charles S. Zane, of Springfield, was the first elected judge of this new circuit.

In 1877, the State was divided into thirteen judicial circuits, with three judges in each circuit. Horatio M. Vandever, of Taylorville, Charles S. Zane, of Springfield, and William R. Welch, of Carlinville, were the three elected for the Fifth Judicial Circuit, embracing the counties of Sangamon, Christian, Macoupin, Shelby, Montgomery.

Horatio M. Vandever was raised in Sangamon county, but removed to Christian county when a young man, and there studied law and was admitted to the bar. He was elected judge of the Twentieth Judicial Circuit in 1873, and retained as one of the three judges of the newly organized Fifth Circuit. Judge Vandever was highly esteemed by the bar, and made an excellent judge. Before being elected to this office he served a term in the legislature very acceptably. He declined a re-election on the expiration of his term, and is now engaged in banking and in the practice of law in Taylorville.

William R. Welch is from Carlinville, and is recognized by the bar and people as above the average ability as a judge.

Jesse J. Phillips was elected in 1879, and is a citizen of Hillsboro. He has had but a short experience as judge, but has served very acceptably. During the war he was recognized as a brave and gallant officer, the Colonel in command of one of our Illinois regiments, and was wounded two or three times during the service.

PROBATE AND COUNTY COURTS.

Agreeable to an act of the legislature, approved February 10, 1821, a Court of Probate was established in this county and James Latham was duly commissioned Probate Judge, and held the first term of court June 4, 1831. The only business transacted this day was to issue letters of administration to Randolph Wills on the estate of Daniel Martin, deceased.

Court met and adjourned three times, after its first meeting, without transacting any business, until August 26, 1831, when the filing and recording the will of Peter Lanterman occupied the attention of the court one entire day. The following is a copy of the first will given in the records of the court:

"Before the witnesses now present, Louis Bennett, in perfect memory, does give to the daughters of Kakanoqui, Josett Kakanoqui, and Lizett Kakanoqui, two thousand livres each, and six hundred livres for prayers for his father; also, six hundred livres for him, if for prayers, and thirty dollars for prayers, promised, and one hundred dollars for Kakanoqui, the rest of his money to be given to his brothers and sisters of Louis Bennett. After duly hearing read over before the witnesses now present, and signing the same will, he does voluntarily appoint Joseph D. Portecheron and Louis Pencouneau, Sr., as exequutors of his will.

James Latham, the first Probate Judge of Sangamon county, was born in Loudon county, Virginia, October 25, 1768. He emigrated when a young man to Kentucky, and was there married to Mary Briggs in 1792. In 1819, with his family, he removed to Illinois, and settled at Elkhart Grove, then a part of Sangamon, but now of Logan county. As already intimated, on the organization of the county he was appointed Probate Judge. He held the office but a few months and then resigned, having received the appointment of Superintendent of the Indians around Fort Clark. Soon after receiving this appointment he removed his family to that place, and died there December 4, 1826.

Zachariah Peter was appointed to fill the vacancy occasioned by Judge Latham's resignation, and served about one year. Zachariah Peter was a Virginian by birth, but was raised in Kentucky, where he was married to Nancy Spaulding. In September, 1818, Mr. Peter arrived in Sangamon county, and finding an empty cabin in what is now Ball township, he moved his family into it, remaining there until the following spring, when he erected a cabin for himself about three miles north. Mr. Peter was one of the three commissioners appointed to locate the temporary seat of justice for Sangamon county, and filled several important county offices, serving for several years as one of the board of County Commissioners. He died in Springfield, August 5, 1864.

Charles R. Matheny succeeded to the office of Probate Judge in 1822, and held the office for three years. Charles R. Matheny was born in Loudon county, Virginia, March 6, 1786. When a young man he went on a visit to a brother in Kentucky, and was there licensed to preach by the proper authorities in the Methodist Episcopal Church. In 1805 he was appointed by that body as missionary to a portion of the Illinois, but then known as the Indiana Territory. He settled in what is now St. Clair county, and continued for some years to preach the gospel. While engaged in ministerial duties, he read law and was admitted to the bar. In 1817 he was appointed Prosecuting Attorney for the Territory. In 1821, he was induced by the tender of the office of County Clerk, County Auditor and Circuit Clerk, and other prospective advantages, to come to Sangamon county, arriving at Springfield in the spring of 1821. In Springfield and throughout the county he was very popular, and received many favors from the people. He was for several years president of the Board of Trustees of the village of Springfield, and held the office of County Clerk until his death, which occurred October 10, 1839.

James Adams, of whom mention is made in the history of the bar, was the next to fill the office of Probate Judge, his commission bearing date August, 1825. Judge Adams held the office until 1843.

Thomas Moffett was elected in 1843, and served until 1849.

By the Constitution of 1848, counties not organized under the Township Organization Law were governed by a Board of Justices, consisting of a County Judge and two associates. The County Judge performed under this law all the duties formerly devolving upon the Probate Judge. Under this act, Thomas Moffett was elected to the office of County Judge, and served four years. (See sketch of Judge Moffett in bar history.)

John Wickliffe Taylor was elected to succeed Judge Moffett, and commenced his official life in December, 1853. Judge Taylor was a native of Kentucky, and after his marriage, in 1833, he moved to Springfield, Illinois, where he remained one year, and then settled on a farm in Cartwright township, where he was living at the time of his election.

William D. Power was elected as the successor of Judge Taylor, in 1857. Judge Power was born in Bath county, Kentucky, May 2, 1821, and was brought by his parents to Sangamon county the same year. Here he grew to manhood, and so lived as to merit the esteem of all who knew him. In 1861 he was re-elected County Judge, and died in office March 2, 1863.

Norman M. Broadwell was elected to fill the vacancy caused by the death of Judge Power. He served out the term. (See sketch in bar history.)

William Prescott was the successor of Judge Broadwell, and served from 1865 to 1869. (See sketch in bar history.)

A. N. J. Crook was the next to fill the office of County Judge. He was elected in 1869, and served four years. He is a member of the bar of Sangamon county, and a further notice of him appears in that connection.

James H. Matheny was first elected county judge in 1873, and re-elected in 1877. He has made an extremely popular judge. (See sketch in connection with the history of the bar.)

When the county adopted the township organization law the office of Associate Justice was abolished, and the legislative duties performed by the County Judge and associates were vested in a Board of Supervisors. The County Judge was still retained in office as Judge of Probate.

By the Constitution of 1870 county courts were created having original jurisdiction in all matters of probate, and made a court of record. By an act of the legislature it has been given common law jurisdiction to the amount of $1,000. A. N. J. Crook was the first County Judge under the new law.

CHAPTER V.

THE BAR OF SANGAMON COUNTY.

The Bar of Sangamon county has ever been a subject of pride among her citizens. Some of the best legal minds, fairest logicians and finest orators of the age have practiced before her courts, many of whom have claimed a residence in the county. In reviewing the history of the Bar, it must be born, in mind that as the prosperity and well-being of every community depends upon the wise interpretation, as well as upon the judicious framing of its laws, it must follow that a record of the members of the Bar must form no unimportant part in the county's history. Upon a few principles of natural justice is erected the whole superstructure of civil law, tending to relieve the wants and meet the desires of all alike. The business of the lawyer is not to make the laws, but to apply them to the daily affairs of men. But the interests of men are diversified, and where so many interests and counter interests are to be protected and adjusted, to the lawyer and the judge are presented many interesting and complex problems.

Change is everywhere imminent. The laws of yesterday do not meet the wants and necessities of the people of to-day, for the old relations do not exist. New and satisfactory laws must be established. The discoveries in the arts and sciences, the invention of new contrivances for labor, the enlargement of industrial pursuits, and the increase and development of commerce are without precedence, and the science of law must keep pace with them all, nay, it must even forecast the event, and so frame its laws as will most adequately subserve the wants and provide for the necessities of the new conditions. Hence the lawyer is a man of to-day. The exigencies he must meet are those of his own time. His capital is his ability and individuality. He cannot bequeath to his successors the characteristics that distinguished him, and at his going, as a general thing, the very evidences of his work disappears. Anthony Thornton,

President of the State Bar Association, in 1878, in an address before the association, thus speaks of the lawyer: "In the American State the great and good lawyer must always be prominent, for he is one of the forces which move and control society. Public confidence has generally been reposed in the legal profession. It has ever been the defender of popular rights, the champion of freedom, regulated by law, the firm support of good government. In times of danger it has stood like a rock and breasted the mad passions of the hour, and firmly resisted tumult and faction. No political preferment—no mere place—can add to the power or increase the honor which belong to the pure and educated lawyer. The fame of Mansfield and Marshall and Story can never die. 'Time's iron feet can print no ruin-trace' upon their character. Their learning and luminous exposition of our jurisprudence will always light our pathway. It is our duty to preserve the prestige of the profession. The past, at least, is secure; the present and future summon us to action. With the progress of society, and the increase of population, wealth and trade, varied interests arise, and novel questions, requiring more thought, confront us. A disregard of the law has been developed, crime meets us unabashed, and corruption stands unmasked in the high places of the land. It is no fancy picture that the law has, to some extent, lost its authority, and it is only the shade of that which once was great. Hence, new duties are imposed, and a firmer courage is required. * * * The exaltation of the profession is a duty enjoined upon us. It is a debt which only death can discharge. Lord Bacon has said, 'every man is a debtor to his profession; from the which, as men of course do seek to receive countenance and profit, so ought they of duty to endeavor, themselves, by way of amends, to be a help and ornament thereto.' Every lawyer is a debtor to his profession. If worthy, it gives him an honorable character and high position. The lawyer should prize and love his profession. He should value its past renown, and cherish the memory of great men whose gigantic shadows walk by us still. He should love it for the intrinsic worth and innate truth of the fundamental truths which adorn it."

In compiling a history of the Bar one is astonished at the small amount of material for a memoir of those who have been so intimately connected with and exerted such influence upon the country's welfare and progress. Aside from the few who have become great, whose names are emblazoned on history's page, but little is known of many who at one time were very prominent in the legal profession in the county. But the names of Lincoln, Douglas, Shields, Baker, Logan, Trumbull, Hardin, Breese, Lockwood, Linder and scores of others mentioned in these pages will always find a place in their country's history, and Sangamon county has reason to be proud, not only of so many distinguished sons, but of the many others who have practiced in her courts.

FIRST DECADE.

Sangamon county was organized in 1821, and in the decade following, the names of Henry Starr, John Reynolds, Sidney McRoberts, Alfred Cavarly, William Thomas, Benjamin Mills, William A. Hamilton, William Mendel, James Adams, Thomas M. Neale, James M. Strode, Jonathan H. Pugh, Thomas Moffett, John T. Stuart, S. D. Lockwood, Judge Smith, Alfred Coles, Mr. Rogers, James Turney, John L. Bogardus, David Prickett and George Forquer appeared upon the dockets of the court—an array of distinguished names which would be an honor even to the Bar of to-day, many of whom have since become distinguished, and few of whom are now living.

James Adams is the pioneer attorney of Sangamon county, having settled in Springfield in 1821, shortly after the county was organized. Mr. Adams was born in Hartford, Connecticut, January 26, 1803, from which place he removed to Oswego county, New York, in 1809, and from thence to Sangamon county as already stated. For several years he had quite an extensive practice, being careful and painstaking in working up his cases and in his clients' interests. In 1823 he was appointed justice of the peace, and was elected successively for many years. He took part in the Winnebago and Black Hawk wars. After an exciting personal canvass, he was elected Probate Judge in 1841, and died in office on August 11, 1843.

Jonathan H. Pugh was the second attorney to make Sangamon county his home. He arrived in Springfield early in the year 1823, and at once secured a good practice for that day. In the first decade of the Bar of this county, his name probably appears oftener on the docket than any other attorney. Mr. Pugh was from Bath county, Kentucky, and was a man of brilliant talents, a good lawyer for that time, and one whose wit never failed him on any occasion. Before a jury he was almost invincible. In society he was a prime favorite, having remarkably fine conversational powers. Before coming to Sangamon he located for a time in Bond county, and was there elected to the legislature. He also served Sangamon county in the Assembly after his removal here. In 1831 he was nominated for Congress, and made the race in opposition to ex-Governor Duncan. At this time the question of internal improvements was being agitated, especially the building of a canal from Lake Michigan to the Illinois river. Governor Duncan was a strong advocate of the canal, while Mr. Pugh advocated the building of a railroad, and was probably the first man in the State to advocate this measure. His views upon this question were doubtless one cause of his defeat. In 1833, while in the prime of life, Mr. Pugh "laid down life's burden and passed over to the other side."

Thomas M. Neale was born in Fauquier county, Virginia, in 1796. When a mere child, he was taken by his parents to Bowling Green, Kentucky. On the breaking out of the war of 1812, he enlisted and served his country faithfully as a common soldier. He studied law and was admitted to the bar in Bowling Green. In the fall of 1824 Mr. Neale arrived in Springfield, and at once commenced the practice of law. For some three or four years his practice was good. In the campaign against the Winnebago Indians in 1827, he was the colonel in command of all the infantry companies. After the Black Hawk war, Col. Neale was elected surveyor of the county, and one of his first acts was the appointment of Abraham Lincoln his deputy. He was also a justice of the peace for many years, and as such uniting many couple in marriage, some times receiving as his fee only a saddle of venison. Mr. Neale died August 7, 1840.

James M. Strode was from Kentucky, and made his first appearance before the Sangamon County Courts in 1823. He was then a young man of fair talents, rather showy in dress and manners, a good story teller, and for many years was quite prominent in the courts of the State. Leaving Springfield he settled in Galena, where he died.

William S. Hamilton was a son of the noted Alexander Hamilton, of New York. He first figured in the courts of this county in 1825, though he was probably here the previous year. He was a man of great intellectual powers, but was unsteady in his habits. He served the county one year in the legislature.

Thomas Moffett was from Bath county, Kentucky, and came to Springfield in 1826, where he engaged in teaching school and devoting his leisure hours to the study of law. He was admitted to the Bar in 1828, and was the first in the county to receive a license to practice. Mr. Moffett was orderly sergeant of a company in the Winnebago war, and captain of a company in the Black Hawk war. He served two years as County Commissioner, and from 1843 served as Judge of the Probate Court. Under the constitution of 1848 he was elected County Judge for four years. While not taking high rank as a lawyer, Mr. Moffett was a man of excellent judgment, and made an excellent justice of the peace, Probate Judge and County Judge. He died in 1877, at a very advanced age. He was many years a ruling elder in the Second Presbyterian Church.

William Mendel was a queer genius, not much of a lawyer, and good for little else, unless it should be for being very witty. He occasionally failed to behave himself in court with that decorum demanded of the profession, and consequently was punished therefor by the presiding judge. He once appeared before Judge Sawyer and behaved himself in an unbecoming manner. The judge sentenced him to jail for the night. The next morning on going to the court house a calf was discovered in the judge's stand and a lot of geese in the jury-box, with Mendall addressing them in an impassioned manner. The judge took no notice of the indignity.

Samuel McRoberts was one of the best lawyers that followed the circuit and making Springfield a point. He was afterwards Circuit Judge, and also U. S. Senator from this State. He died before the expiration of his term. He was an excellent man to be with on the circuit, serving to beguile the weary hours in traveling from place to place. U. F. Linder, whose reminiscences are often quoted in this work, says he could give the heartiest laugh when amused, of any man he ever saw. He relates the following incident that transpired on one occasion: "Nearly all the lawyers of Judge Harlan's circuit met at the Edgar County Circuit Court, among the rest, Judge McRoberts and myself. In those days we nearly all roomed together. There was a man by the name of Lodge, who was a bricklayer by trade, but who had arisen to be superintendent of a large farm. Lodge was in the habit of seeking every opportunity to talk with the judge and lawyers, and would generally seize and run away with the conversation. One day he came in where we were all talking, and with great pomposity and egotism told us that he had a water-melon-patch adjoining the road from Danville to Paris; that he was one day sitting on his piazza, which overlooked this melon-patch. While sitting there he saw a gentleman coming along in his buggy, and when he got opposite the melon-patch he jumped out, got over the fence, pulled one of his finest melons, of which he had several thousand, and deliberately commenced eating it. He said he concluded he would go down and have a talk with the gentleman. He edified and regaled us with a fine moral lecture which he delivered to the stranger, and said he told him that if he had come and asked for the melon he would have given it to him; and said that he ended by walking up to him and deliberately knocking the melon out of his hand. He said the man seemed greatly mortified, and said to him: 'Sir, I am a gentleman; my name is Bishop, a commission merchant at Evansville, Indiana. In my native State, where we raise vast quantities of melons, it is not thought to be a serious matter or a crime for a man to help himself to a melon by the wayside, and if you feel very much concerned about it here is the pay for it,' pulling out his purse. Lodge refused, as he told us, and went on to deliver a lecture to Mr. Bishop on the rights of equality of men, saying that he did not consider that it conferred an honor on him, that a commission merchant or anyone else should take one of his melons without leave. Here McRoberts burst out in one of his great 'horse laughs,' which, to appreciate, should be heard:

"'Ha! ha! ha!' says he, 'that reminds me of a story I once heard of William the Fourth, when he was Prince of Wales. He was traveling in cog, through Canada, and at Montreal he strayed into a tailor shop, where the tailor and his wife were both sitting on the counter at work; the tailor with crossed legs pressing a seam with his hot goose, and his wife sewing away at some garment with nimble fingers. Neither seemed to pay much attention to the disguised royal stranger, when William, stepping up to where the woman was sitting, turning his head, asked the tailor if that was his wife. 'She is a very pretty woman,' said the Prince, and pulling her head down toward him, he deliberately kissed her, and turning to the tailor very patronizingly said, 'Now, sir, you will have the honor of telling your children that your wife was kissed by the King of England. I am William, the Prince of Wales, and heir-apparent to the throne.' The tailor laid down his goose, put on his slippers, jumped off the counter, and catching William by the shoulders pushed him to the door and gave him two or three lusty kicks on the seat of honor, and said, 'Now, sir, you will have the honor of telling your subjects that in one of your Majesty's Provinces you had your posterior kicked by a tailor.' Lodge looked like he could have crawled through an auger hole, and said: 'Judge McRoberts, I hope you don't mean to say there is the same disparity between Bishop and myself as existed between the Prince and the tailor!' Whereupon we all burst into a most uproarious fit of laughter, when Lodge left, and never visited us again."

Alfred W. Cavarly is a man well known by the elder members of the Bar. He lived in Greene county and rode the circuit of which Sangamon formed a part for many years. He was considered a good lawyer, though a little egotistic. He always rode a good horse in his travels. On one occasion he interposed a general demurrer to one of Mills' pleadings, and sought thus to take advantage of some matter which could only be reached by special demurrer. When Cavarly discovered that he could only reach the defect by special demurrer, he insisted that his was a special demurrer because he had underscored part of it. Judge Lockwood decided against him. At dinner the same day at which the Judge and members of the Bar were present, Cavarly sent his plate to Mills to be furnished with what he thought was a cut of venison. Mills sent him a piece which Cavarly discovered was beef, and he remarked, "Brother Mills, I wanted venison, and you sent me beef." "Oh," said Mills, "underscore it, Brother Cavarly, and that will make it venison."

Benjamin Mills was one of the ablest, most learned and accomplished lawyers of the early Bar of this State. He was from Massachusetts, highly educated, and a man of a rare style of oratory, through which there ran a rich vein of wit and irony. It was a talent he often indulged in in conversation. He rode the circuit in company with several others who have since become prominent, and had few equals to contend with. As illustrative of his wit it is related that one day when he was in his cups at his hotel, he was sitting about half asleep, when Cavarly stepped up to where he was sitting and laid his hand on Mills' bald head and remarked: "Friend Mills, you have quite a prairie on your head." "Yes, Cavarly," he said, "and do you know the difference between you and me?" "By no means, Brother Mills," said he, in quite a patronizing manner. "Well, I'll tell you," said Mills, "my prairie is on my head, but yours is inside your head."

Mills was the son of a New England Presbyterian minister, and came to Illinois at an early day, when there was a law authorizing a justice of the peace, if he heard a man swear, even upon the streets, to go to his office and enter up a fine of one dollar against him. Ben was a justice of the peace, and was one day taking his glass with another justice of the peace at his hotel in Greenville, Illinois, when he happened to let slip about a half dozen oaths. His brother justice said nothing about it at the time. This was in the morning. They met again at the same place in the evening and were taking another social glass together, when his friend remarked:

"Brother Mills, you swore several oaths this morning, and you know the law makes it my duty to enter a fine against you of a dollar for each oath."

"I know it, my brother," said Mills, "and thought of it as I went to my office, and being a justice of the peace myself, I entered upon my docket a fine of one dollar for each oath I swore."

"Oh, well," said his friend, "that will do. Come, Brother Mills, let us have another glass." And when they were about to drink it, Mills remarked: "But you know, my brother, that the policy of the law is reformation and not vengeance, and feeling that object has been thoroughly accomplished in my case, by the fine, I am now considering the question of remitting it." After their glass and a hearty laugh they parted.

Mr. Mills was a powerful prosecutor. At Edwardsville, a lawyer named Winchester, killed a man named Smith, or at least was charged with the crime. Mills was his prosecutor. Felix Grundy, of Tennessee, then one of the greatest criminal lawyers in the southwest, was sent for to defend Winchester. The prosecution is said to have been one of the ablest, most fearful and terrible ever heard, and it required all the talent and oratory of Grundy, assisted by the presence and countenance of many of the leading attorneys and men of the place to prevent a conviction.

Mr. Mills died about 1850.

John Reynolds is well known to every student of the history of Illinois, having been Governor of the State, member of Congress, and Judge of the Supreme Court of Illinois. He was a ripe scholar, a man of great natural ability, yet withal modest, seeming more disposed to conceal than to blazon forth his accomplishments to the world. An amusing story is told of the Governor which occurred while holding a term of the circuit court at Edwardsville. At that term a man named Green was tried before him on the charge of murder, and was convicted. Reynolds, who was always seeking popularity, desired the ill will of no one, even of a murderer, and after the verdict of guilty had been read by the clerk in open court, turned to Green, his face all beaming with sympathy, said:

"Mr. Green, I am truly sorry for you; the jury have found you guilty of murder, and I suppose you know you have got to be hung."

"Yes, your Honor," said Green.

"Mr. Green, I want you to understand that this is none of my work, but of a jury of your own selection. I would take it as a favor of you if you would communicate this fact to your friends and relatives. The law makes it my duty to pass sentence upon you and carry out the verdict of the jury. It is a mere matter of form, Mr. Green, so far as I am concerned, and your death can in no way be imputed to me. Mr. Green, when would you like to be hung?"

"Your Honor," said Green, "if I had any choice in the matter, I should not like to be hung at all; but as it seems I have not, I have no preference of one time over another."

Reynolds then turned to the clerk and said:

"Mr. Conway, look at the almanac and see if the fourth Friday in December comes on Sunday."

Conway, being a man of considerable humor, gravely turned to the almanac, and then looking up, said:

"I find, your Honor, to my utter astonishment, that that day comes upon Friday!"

"So it does, so it does," said Reynolds. Turning to Green, he said:

"Mr. Green, the sentence of the court is that on the fourth Friday in December, between the hours of ten o'clock in the forenoon and four o'clock in the afternoon, the sheriff of Madison county will take you from the jail to the place of execution, and there, Mr. Green, I am sorry to say, he will hang you till you are dead, dead, dead, and may the Lord have mercy upon your soul. And don't you forget it, Mr. Green, that it is not my work, but that of the jury which tried you."

James Turney's name appears upon the records of the Sangamon Circuit Court for several years, beginning in 1824. He was a Tennessean by birth, but at this time lived in Carrollton. He was a man of fine personal appearance, of great natural, with but little acquired ability. When Attorney-General of the State, it is said, that such was the reputation which had preceded him when traveling the circuits, that many men indicted, came into court and confessed guilty rather than stand a trial with him as prosecutor. He was a natural orator, and always commanded the most profound attention. No one could fail to recognize in a moment, when hearing him speak, that he was a man of considerable genius and talent. He served the State as Attorney-General and as Commissioner of the Illinois and Michigan Canal. He was also State Senator from Greene county.

Henry Starr, at a very early day, left his native State of New Hampshire and settled in Kentucky, where he taught school and studied law. After being admitted to the Bar, he removed to Edwardsville, Illinois, from which place he made his semi-annual trips around the circuit, his name appearing on the docket of Sangamon Circuit Court in 1822. He remained in the State but a few years when he removed to Cincinnati, and soon was recognized as a leading lawyer of that metropolis.

George Forquer, a half-brother of ex-Governor Ford, was born in Uniontown, Pennsylvania, in 1794. With his mother and half-brother he moved to Monroe county, Illinois, at an early day, from which place he was elected a member of a legislature. In 1825 he was appointed by Governor Coles, Secretary of State, and went to Vandalia in the discharge of the duties of that office. In December, 1828, he resigned the position, and in January following was appointed Attorney-General by Governor Edwards. Resigning this latter office the same year, he removed to Springfield. He afterwards represented Sangamon county in the State Senate, and was at one time register of the land office in Springfield. He was considered by his contemporaries a fair lawyer and had a good business. He died September 12, 1838.

Stephen J. Logan

A sketch of John T. Stuart, who had his first case in the April term, 1829, of the Circuit Court, and who is at present actively engaged in business in Springfield, appears in connection with the seventh decade.

As illustrative of the way the lawyers followed the circuit, the following reminiscence by Judge William Thomas, of Jacksonville, is here given:

"My Kentucky law license is dated July 5, 1823 (granted before I was twenty-one). My Illinois license is dated October, 1826. The first court that I attended in Illinois was held in this place, November, 1826; John York Sawyer was Circuit Judge. The attorneys in attendance were, John Reynolds, Belleville; James Turney, Attorney General, and Alfred W. Cavarly, of Carrollton; William H. Brown, Benjamin Mills and George Forquer, of Vandalia; David Prickett, Edwardsville; Murray McConnell, John Turney and Benjamin Cox, of this place; Jonathan H. Pugh, Thomas M. Neale and James M. Strode, of Springfield. The business of the court was finished in less than a week, and the next and last court held by Judge Sawyer was in Springfield in the same month. With two exceptions, McConnell and Cox, the same attorneys were in attendance at Springfield, with the addition of William S. Hamilton, General James Adams, Thomas Moffett, of Springfield, and John L. Bogardus, of Peoria.

"The First Judicial Circuit at that time was composed of the counties of Greene, Morgan, Sangamon, Peoria, Fulton, Schuyler, Adams, Pike and Calhoun. A week was allowed to each term of the court in Greene, Morgan and Sangamon, and half a week in each of the other counties. From December, 1826, to March, 1827, I was employed as village schoolmaster in this place. In the spring of 1827, I attended all the courts in this circuit. S. J. Lockwood, of the Supreme Court, was required to hold the courts in this circuit—Greene, Morgan and Sangamon, with the resident attorneys—Reynolds, Turney, Pugh, Strode and Cavarly from other counties being in attendance. From Sangamon we went to Peoria, Bogardus resided there and kept the tavern. There was another attorney there who resided on the lake some distance above Peoria, his name I have forgotten. The Attorney General being absent, I was appointed to represent the people. Jacob Funk and one Ogee, having been indicted for an affray, to the "terror of the people," confessed guilty, were fined a small sum, and each paid my fee of $5, with which I paid my traveling expenses around the circuit. The attorneys present at this court from other counties were, John Turney, James M. Strode, Jonathan H. Pugh and General James Adams.

"From Peoria the court went to Fulton county, Pugh, Turney, Adams and myself being the only attorneys, besides a resident attorney whose name I have forgotten. Judge Phelps entertained the judge and Bar, and refused pay. Here I was employed in an appeal case, which I gained, and received $5 for my fee. John Turney was appointed to represent the people. There was no criminal case for trial. From there we went to Schuyler county, our horses swimming Spoon river, and we crossed in a canoe. There we found at the county seat but two families—Hart Fellows, clerk, and Terry, recorder. Pugh was appointed to prosecute, but there was no criminal case on the docket—the grand jury found no bills—and after the trial of a few appeal cases the court adjourned on the second day.

"From that county we went to Quincy, traveling through the prairie in a day, distance sixty miles, with no roads. I think there was no resident attorney at Quincy. We met there General Hanson, J. W. Whitney and J. I. Ross, of Atlas, Pike county. Here I was appointed to prosecute. There was but one criminal case tried, the party was convicted, and paid my fee of $5. From that county we went to Pike. There we met the Attorney General and Mr. Cavarly from Carrollton, and Colonel Jenkins from Calhoun county. Captain Leonard Ross, then sheriff of the county, entertained the court and Bar, refusing pay. He was one of nature's noblemen, from Massachusetts.

"Three days were occupied with the business of the court, and then we went to Gilead, county seat of Calhoun county, where I was employed to defend a doctor, indicted for murder—a case of supposed malpractice, but, in fact, a case of ignorance and malice. In employing me he said that $20 was all he had, that he was in feeble health, had a sick family, and was in destitute circumstances. I agreed to defend him for the $20, being satisfied of his innocence and of his extreme poverty. Upon the trial of the case and the charge of the court, the jury found him not guilty. More than twenty years after I met this doctor at Springfield, a member of the legislature. He was still in feeble health, remembered and recognized me, but I did not him, until he made himself known. There the circuit ended.

"The resident and non-resident attorneys who practiced in this circuit, say in May, 1827, were, John Reynolds, Belleville; James Turney and Alfred W. Cavarly, Carrollton; Benjamin Mills, Vandalia; Samuel McRoberts, Edwardsville; Murray McConnell, John Turney, Benjamin Cox and William Thomas, Jacksonville; Jonathan H. Pugh, William S. Hamilton, James M. Strode, Thomas M. Neale, General James Adams and Thomas Moffett, Springfield; John L. Bogardus, Peoria; General N. Hanson, James W. Whitney and John I. Ross, Pike county; Colonel Jenkins, of Calhoun, brother of Lieutenant Governor Jenkins. Of all these attorneys I am the sole survivor."

SECOND DECADE.

In the second decade, from 1831 to 1841, an array of names appear, some of whom have made a reputation that is world-wide. For character, learning and ability the Bar during this decade has never been surpassed either in Sangamon county or in any county in the State, and perhaps not in the Union. At what Bar will be found the superior, or even the equal of Abraham Lincoln, Stephen A. Douglas, James Shields, Stephen T. Logan, John T. Stuart, Edward Jones, Dan Stone, Samuel H. Treat, Ninian W. Edwards, E. D. Baker, Cyrus Walker, Jesse B. Thomas, and A. T. Bledsoe, all of whom engaged in practice and often appeared before the courts of Sangamon county during this time? Not alone as attorneys, but as statesmen, the greater number of the foregoing were prominent in after years. James C. Conkling, who was cotemporary with those named says this of law and lawyers at that time:

"Forty years ago, business was not so great in extent as to occupy the full time of the lawyer. Suits were not so numerous, or so important, as to afford a support for himself and family. He engaged in political life as an employment, and solicited office to improve his slender income. A much larger number of the prominent members of the legal profession then became members of the State Legislature or of Congress than at present. The people demanded their political services, and they were happy and anxious to accommodate the people. A political contest gave them notoriety among the masses, and afforded them an opportunity to display their abilities. A reputation for eloquence and skill in debate was a recommendation as lawyers in the practice of their profession. Hence we find the names of Reynolds, Edwards, Cook, Casey, Breese, Browning, Hardin, Baker, Williams, Shields, Douglas, Trumbull, Lincoln, McClernand and numerous others almost as frequently, in the political annals of our State, as upon the records of our courts. As lawyers they were eminent; as statesmen many of them became illustrious."

In addition to those named, the records of the courts show the following named as practicing here between the years 1831 to 1841: Edward J. Phillips, Henry E. Dummer, William L. May, Josephus Hewitt, Charles Emerson, David Prickett, Jesse B. Thomas, D. B. Campbell, Justin Butterfield, Antrim Campbell, John D. Urquhart, John C. Doremus, James C. Conkling, Charles R. Wells, Schuyler Strong, B. S. Edwards, and W. J. Gatewood, a list of which the Bar of any county might be proud.

During the latter part of this decade, the United States Circuit Court and the Supreme Court of Illinois were removed from Vandalia to Springfield. Isaac N. Arnold, in an address delivered before the Illinois State Bar Association, at Springfield, January 7, 1881, says:

"I wish, with the graphic power, of Sir Walter Scott, I could call up a picture of the United States Circuit Court and the Supreme Court of Illinois, and the lawyers then practicing before them, as they were in 1839, and on during the following years. If we could, in fancy, enter the United States Circuit Court room in this city, in June, 1839, we should be impressed with the majestic figure, imposing presence and dignified bearing of the presiding judge, John McLean, a Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States. His person and face were often compared to Washington's—whom he is said to have strikingly resembled."

"Nathaniel Pope, the District Judge, was shorter and stouter in person, more blunt and sturdy in manner, and not so familiar with the law books, the cases, and literature of the law, but of a most clear, vigorous and logical mind. If we enter their court, then held, if I am not mistaken, in one of the churches in this city, we should find Ferris Foreman, then United States District Attorney, prosecuting the case of "The United States vs. Gratiot," then a historic name in Missouri and the Northwest, in a case arising under a lease, by the Government, of a portion of the lead mines of Galena. We should hear the late Judge Breese making a very learned argument for the defense. If we lingered until the next case was called, we should hear the sharp, clear, ringing voice of Stephen T. Logan opening his case. If we remained until the trial ended, we should concur in the remark that this small, red-haired man, inferior in person, but with an eye whose keenness indicated his sharp and incisive intellect; this little man, take him all in all, was then the best nisi prius lawyer in the State, and it would be difficult to find his superior anywhere. Among the leading practitioners in the court in Springfield in 1839, were Logan, Lincoln, Baker, Trumbull, Butterfield & Collins, Spring & Goodrich, Cowles & Krum, Davis, Hardin, Browning, and Archy Williams."

"To a contemporary of those early members of the Bar, the roll of attorneys admitted in those days bring up sad and pleasant memories. On that roll, in 1836, you find the name of Thomas Drummond, now a venerable Judge of the Northern District of our State; David Davis, late Judge, and now Senator; Archy Williams and Anthony Thornton. In 1837 I find the names of Abraham Lincoln, William A. Richardson, Lyman Trumbull, Mahlon D. Ogden, Joseph Gillespie; and in 1838, Justin Butterfield, James A. McDougall, Hugh T. Dickey, Schuyler Strong, John J. Hardin, Judge E. Peck, J. Young Scammon, and others, and from that time on, the names become more numerous."

Continuing his reminiscences, Mr. Arnold said:

"In those early days it was my habit, and that, also, of those practicing in the United States Court, to come to Springfield twice each year, to attend the semi-annual terms of court held in June and December. We made our trips in Frink & Walker's coaches, and I have known the December trip to take five days and nights, dragging drearily through the mud and sleet, and there was an amount of discomfort, vexation and annoyance about it sufficient to exhaust the patience of the most amiable. I think I have noticed that some of my impulsive brethren of the Chicago Bar have become less profane since the rail-cars have been substituted for the stage-coaches. But the June journey was as agreeable as the December trip was repulsive. A four-in-hand with splendid horses, the best of Troy coaches, good company, the exhilaration of great speed over an elastic road, much of it a turf of grass, often crushing under our wheels the most beautiful wild flowers, every grove fragrant with blossoms, framed in the richest green, our roads not fenced in by narrow lanes, but with freedom to choose our route; here and there a picturesque log-cabin, covered with vines; the boys and girls on their way to the log-schools, and the lusty farmer digging his fortune out of the rich earth. Everything fresh and new, full of young life and enthusiasm, these June trips to Springfield would, I think, compare favorably even with those we made to-day in a luxurious Pullman car. But there were exceptions to these enjoyments; sometimes a torrent of rain would in a few hours so swell the streams that the log bridges and banks would be entirely submerged, and a stream which a few hours before was nearly dry, became a foaming torrent. Fording, at such times, was never agreeable, and sometimes a little dangerous.

FORDING SALT CREEK.

"I recall a ludicrous incident on our way to Springfield, I think, in June, 1842. We had a coach, crowded with passengers, most of us lawyers, on our way to the United States Court. In passing from Peoria to Springfield, we attempted to ford one of these streams which had been lately raised so that its banks were nearly a quarter of a mile apart. When we had driven half across the horses left the track, got into a bad slough, and were stalled. All efforts to extricate the coach failed, and, at length, the driver gave up the attempt in despair; said he must take off the horses and go to the next station for help; those who chose might mount a horse and ride ashore; or, if they preferred, might wade ashore or stay in the coach until he returned, or wait until another coach, which was behind, should come up; we might wait for it, provided we were not carried down the stream by the current. Some decided to try their fortunes on a stage horse; others stripped off trousers, boots and stockings, and taking their coat-tails under their arms, started to wade ashore. Old Dr. Maxwell was of our party, a very stout gentleman, with short legs, and weighing near three hundred pounds. The doctor sat by the window of the coach, grimly watching the various groups, and turning his eyes now to the equestrians, and now to those buffeting the current on foot, and envying some of the long-legged gentlemen who were struggling towards the shore. Seeing the doctor unusually grave, a friend called to him:

"What is the matter, doctor?" "Why don't you come on?"

"I don't like the aspect," said he. "The diagnosis is threatening. My legs are too short to wade, and there is not a horse in the team that can carry my weight through this current. Sink or swim; survive or perish; I shall stick to the ship."

"Well," replied an irreverent and saucy young lawyer, "if you are washed away and cast ashore by the current, I should like to have the opinion of Judge Dickey (not the present Chief Justice) whether you would not be flotsam and jetsam, and belong, medicine and all, to the sovereign people of Illinois?"

"Fortunately, our driver soon returned and rescued our genial doctor.

"I must not omit to mention the old-fashioned, generous hospitality of Springfield—hospitality proverbial to this day throughout the State. Among others, I recall, with a sad pleasure, the dinners and evening parties given by Mrs. Lincoln. In her modest and simple home, everything orderly and refined, there was always, on the part of both host and hostess, a cordial and hearty Western welcome, which put every guest perfectly at ease. Mrs. Lincoln's table was famed for the excellence of many rare Kentucky dishes, and in season, it was loaded with venison, wild turkeys, prairie chickens, quail and other game, which was then abundant. Yet it was her genial manners and ever-kind welcome, and Mr. Lincoln's wit and humor, anecdote and unrivalled conversation, which formed the chief attraction. We read much of "merrie England," but I doubt if there was ever anything more "merrie" than Springfield in those days. As, to-day, I walk your streets, and visit the capital, and your court rooms, as I enter the old home of Lincoln, for the first time since 1860, memories of the past come thronging back; I see his tall form, his merry laugh breaks upon my ear; I seem to hear the voice of Douglas, of Baker, of Hardin, and of Logan!

"How are we startled in the wind's low tones
By voices that are gone."

"Nor, in recalling the past, must I forget the hospitable home of Judge Treat, who, to-day, as then, in his ample library, may well say:

"That place that does contain,
My books, the best companions, is to me
A glorious court, where hourly I converse
With the old sages and philosophers."

At this time the Supreme Court of the State was composed of four judges, three of whom were Whigs, and the fourth a Democrat. When Governor Carlin came into office in 1838, he claimed the right to appoint a new secretary before any vacancy existed. He nominated John A. McClernand; but the Senate, by a vote of twenty-two to eighteen, declared that the executive did not possess the power to nominate a secretary, except in case of vacancy, and they therefore rejected the nomination. After the adjournment of the legislature he undertook to appoint McClernand as secretary, who thereupon demanded possession of the office, but was refused. McClernand then filed an information, in the nature of a quo warranto, before Judge Breese, in the Circuit Court of Fayette county, who decided in his favor. Field took an appeal to the Supreme Court, where the decision was reversed. Aside from the political questions involved, the case was of considerable importance. Able counsel appeared on each side. For the appellant, were Cyrus Walker, Justin Butterfield and Levi Davis. For the appellee, Stephen A. Douglas, James Shields and Wickliffe Kitchell, the Attorney-General. Wilson and Lockwood, the Whig judges, concurred, and Smith dissented. Brown being connected with the relator, declined to sit in the cause. The court decided that the Governor did not possess the power to remove the Secretary of State at his pleasure; that when that officer was once appointed, he continued in office during good behavior, or until the legislature limited the term or authorized some public functionary to remove him. The decision caused great excitement in political circles against the "Whig Court," because it prevented the Democrats from occupying one of the principal offices of the government; and it had a considerable influence in causing the reorganization of that tribunal.

Edward J. Phillips, one of the first to commence here the practice of law in the second decade, was a man of fine personal appearance, above the average in scholarship, and a fine business man. He continued the practice of his profession but a short time, and then secured a position in the State bank, and as an officer of that institution was exceedingly popular as he was also in social life.

Edward Jones commenced the practice of law in Springfield as a partner of George Forquer. Edward Jones was born at Georgetown, D. C., May 8, 1811. He commenced his education at a classical academy in his native town, and made good progress in his studies, but having a strong predilection for military life, he entered a select military school at the seat of the National Government. After completing his academic studies, he commenced reading law in the office of John Marbury, and afterwards attended the Virginia Law School at Winchester. He was admitted to practice at the Bar in March, 1830, just two months before he was nineteen years of age. Being of an active and energetic temperament, he turned his face to the great West, and, in the following May, settled in Illinois, fixing his residence at Springfield.

During the troubles of the frontier growing out of the Black Hawk war, he exhibited his natural fondness for military life, by serving in the campaigns of 1831 and 1832.

In the spring of 1834, Judge Lockwood tendered him the appointment of Clerk of the Circuit Court of Tazewell county, and he removed to Pekin, the county seat of that county. After holding the office about three years and a half, he resigned and resumed the practice of law. This he continued to do honorably and successfully until the call for volunteers in the Mexican war in June, 1846, aroused his patriotic feelings. He at once raised a company, which became Company F, of Colonel Baker's regiment. He first served with his regiment under General Taylor and then under General Scott. He was engaged in the storming of Vera Cruz and the memorable battle of Cerro Gordo. The term of service of his regiment having expired, he was reluctantly compelled to return home. The remaining volunteers of that regiment have a vivid recollection of his bravery, fortitude, generosity and kindness, as well as military skill.

For some years after his return from Mexico, and until his health failed him, he was a successful practitioner. Mr. Jones had the reputation, which he richly deserved, as one of the finest men in his profession. He had a purely legal mind, and this natural aptitude he had diligently improved by his professional studies. His knowledge of the principals and practice of law was so intimate and thorough that he could give an extemporaneous opinion upon any case submitted to him, and it was very seldom that an after consultation of authorities made a change of opinion necessary. His fame as a special pleader was wide-spread. He was considered a Fabius in defense—being remarkably successful in delaying the contest till the most propitious moment.

Edward Jones was eminently social in his nature, and was surrounded by hosts of friends who prized his society to the last. Even after his health had so far failed him as to render him unfit for his professional duties, his friends still crowded their business upon him. His attachment to the community in which he lived was ardent and unchanging. Whoever traduced it might expect to meet him as its defender.

Edward Jones died December 20, 1857, and was buried in Pekin, Tazewell county. The estimation in which he was held by the Bar in that place was embodied in a series of resolutions, one of which said: "We have found him a noble and powerful advocate, scorning to do anything unprofessional—eloquent, profound in argument, unanswerable in reasoning, and ever successful in the fierce conflict of intellect with intellect."

Henry E. Dummer was a man of superior talents, a fine lawyer and scholar, and exceedingly refined in manner. He was a native of Maine, and had drifted West in 1832. In the spring of this year he was in Cincinnati, and noticing the advertisement of a boat going up the Sangamon river, determined to take passage to the new country. Arriving here in due time, he soon formed a partnership with John T. Stuart, this relation continuing but a short time. After dissolution of the co-partnership, Mr. Dummer went to Jacksonville, where he remained a short time, and then drifted on to Beardstown. In this latter city he married, settled down and became eminently successful in the practice of his profession. From Beardstown he returned to Jacksonville and became a member of the firm of Dummer, Brown & Kirby. He died about 1877.

Stephen T. Logan.—This celebrated lawyer and jurist, who long stood at the head of the Illinois Bar, was born in Franklin county, Kentucky, on February 24, 1800, and was descended from a good family of Scotch-Irish origin. He was the eldest, and, we believe, the only son of David Logan—a man of strong sense and sterling integrity, who died about the year 1821. His grandfather, Colonel John Logan, was one of the leading pioneers of Kentucky, who figured prominently in the Indian wars of the period, was a member of the Constitutional Convention of 1799, and held, during several years, the important office of State Treasurer. His mother, Mary Trigg, was the daughter of Colonel Stephen Trigg (a native of Virginia), who was killed at the memorable battle of the Blue Licks, in August, 1782.

When Stephen Trigg Logan was two years old, his parents removed to Lincoln county, where his mother died a few years later, leaving him a half orphan at a tender age. He received his early education in Frankfort, Kentucky, where he was also employed as a clerk in the office of the Secretary of that Commonwealth, under Martin D. Hardin, father to Colonel John J. Hardin, of Illinois. In 1817 young Logan went to Glasgow, the seat of justice of Barren county, and studied law under the tuition of his uncle, Judge Christopher Tompkins. About two years afterward, and before attaining his majority, he was admitted to the Bar, but did not immediately commence practice.

On June 25, 1823, Mr. Logan was married to America T. Bush, daughter of William Bush, Esq., of Glasgow, by whom he had eight children—four sons and four daughters—only two of whom survive, namely: Sarah (Mrs. Lamon), and Jennie (Mrs. Coleman). About the time of his marriage he was appointed Commonwealth's Attorney for the Glasgow Circuit, and discharged the responsible duties of his position with marked fidelity and ability.

In May, 1832, he removed with his family to Illinois, and settled at Springfield, where he ever afterward resided. Here he first formed a co-partnership with the Hon. William S. May, and resumed the active practice of his profession in the spring of 1833. Subsequently, at different times, he was associated with E. D. Baker, Abraham Lincoln, and Milton Hay.

In 1835 Logan was elected to the office of Circuit Judge, and remained on the bench two years, when he resigned and resumed legal practice. In 1839 he was again elected judge, but declined to serve. In 1842 he was elected a representative from Sangamon county in the Illinois Legislature, and re-elected in 1844 and 1846, serving throughout with great credit and success. In 1847 he was a leading member of the convention which formed the State Constitution, popularly known as the Constitution of 1848. During the latter year he became a candidate for Congress in the Springfield district, in opposition to the late Hon. T. L. Harris. In 1854 Judge Logan was again returned to the legislature; and in 1860 he was a delegate from the State at large to the Chicago Republican Convention, which nominated Mr. Lincoln for the Presidency. In February 1861, he was one of the five Commissioners from Illinois to the National Peace Congress at Washington city, and distinguished himself by his eloquence and patriotism in that historic assembly.

Subsequent to 1861, Judge Logan, having acquired both fame and fortune, withdrew from political and professional life, and passed the evening of his days in dignified retirement. His death occurred after a brief illness, at his residence in Springfield, on July 17, 1880, in the 81st year of his age. His obsequies were appropriately celebrated (the religious services being conducted by the Reverend J. B. Allen of the Christian Church), and his mortal remains were followed to their last resting place in Oak Ridge Cemetery, by a large concourse of sorrowing friends and legal associates, including many of the most distinguished men of the State.

From a number of able and eloquent memorial addresses, delivered by representative members of the Bar and judiciary on the occasion of his decease, we have selected that of Joseph Wallace, Esq., made before the Common Council of Springfield, which presents, perhaps, the most elaborate and comprehensive analysis of Logan's character:

Mr. W. said:—"Sir, an old and eminent citizen, a great lawyer, one whose name fills a large space in the earlier judicial and legislative annals of our State, has gone from the Sangamon County Bar to the Bar of God. This regretful event was not wholly unexpected by his family and most intimate friends, and yet it is difficult to realize that he is indeed no more. In the language of the lamented E. D. Baker, 'It is not fit that such a man should pass unheralded to the tomb; it is not fit that such a life should steal unnoticed to its close; it is not fit that such a death should call forth no public lamentation.' Nor is it so. The public press of our own and other cities have already published eloquent and appreciative notices of the distinguished dead; the members of our Bar have met in solemn conclave and placed upon record their high estimate of his public and private worth, and now we, the members of this Council, representing the Capital City of Illinois, wherein he made his home for nearly fifty years, and with whose history and growth he was prominently identified, would add our brief yet sincere tribute to his memory.

"I shall not enter here upon any recital of the events of Stephen T. Logan's long and honorable life, which opened February 24, 1800, and closed July 17, 1880; but I may be permitted to offer a hasty review of his personal and professional character, and to cast a flower on his bier, even though it has to-day been borne in sad array through the portals of the tomb.

"Whenever called upon to serve his fellow citizens in any public capacity, he responded to that call in a manner well calculated to reflect honor upon himself and conserve the public weal; but at no time in his history was he a professed politician or office seeker. He never wrote out his speeches for publication, and interspersed them at intervals with the words 'cheers' and 'applause.' He never acquired the modern art of manipulating 'primaries' and 'caucuses.' He had 'no hired retainers, no paid letter-writers, no array of college companions to quote, commend and herald his fame to the world.' He had little taste and less aptitude for the 'out of doors management, the electioneering legerdemain, and the wearisome correspondence with local great men'—all of which, at this day, are deemed requisite to political preferment and success. Nevertheless, his name and his deeds are inscribed in legible characters upon the official records of two States, and the inscriptions will not altogether fade.

"The controlling attachment of Judge Logan, however, was centered in the law; his mind was pre-eminently a legal one, and his political ambition was rendered subordinate to his love for this science. His active forensic career extended over a period of nearly half a century, the larger part of which was passed in the State of Illinois, and in this city. But those who saw him only as 'an old man broken by the storms of state,' can form no just idea of his appearance when, in the plenitude of his physical and intellectual powers, he stood forth the facile princeps, the acknowledged leader of the Illinois Bar.

"A celebrated English critic (Hazlitt) has said, that 'great natural advantages are seldom combined with great acquired ones, because they render the labor requisite to attain the last, superfluous and irksome.' This remark is not inapplicable to Logan, since he made no pretensions to scholarship in any pedantic sense of the term. He never collected a library worthy of the name, and garnished it with rare and costly works. His reading was neither very varied nor classical; his researches were chiefly in the line of his profession, 'but therein they were thorough.' His superior mental endowments enabled him to comprehend on a cursory examination what would require ordinary minds protracted labor to master. His intellect was not only capacious and vigorous, but it was emphatically quick, keen and subtle, and having been early accustomed to habits of close investigation, he could seize upon the knottiest problems of law and unravel them with the greatest facility. Under his magic touch 'all doubt and difficulty were at once dispelled, and the naked truth stood forth plainly and palpably defined.'

"In a court of justice, and especially a nisi prius court, Logan seemed most at home. Indeed, there was something exhilarating to him in the very atmosphere of the place. Here his exceptional talents were displayed in their best light, and here he might be studied to the best advantage. Entertaining and instructive it was to observe him before a jury engaged in the argument of some important cause. Resting one foot upon a chair, he begins with a few commonplace remarks, uttered in a clear and conversational tone. He then takes up the leading facts and strong points of his case, states them with singular perspicuity and force, dwells on them at length, and presents them from every standpoint favorable to his client. As he progresses he warms to his work. His small frame insensibly assumes a more erect and impressive attitude; his gestures become more frequent; his shrill voice is pitched to a higher key; his gray eyes glow with animation; every muscle is at play and every energy of his nature is aroused, while words, arguments, illustrations, appeals flow in torrents from his lips. At the conclusion of his speech he sinks into his seat in a profuse perspiration and well nigh exhausted. He leaves little else to be said on his side of the case, for he has covered the whole ground.

"Some French writer has observed that 'nothing is beautiful but what is natural.' This may well apply to Logan's style of speaking, which was formed after no model except his own, yet was beautiful because it was natural. He was accounted an eloquent speaker, though his eloquence was of a peculiar kind and difficult to describe. He seemed to have adopted Chief Justice Marshall's maxim, and 'always aimed at strength.' His forte was reassuring, but it was reason imbued with intense animation; and he drove his juries to conviction as much by the resistless energy of his style as by the lucidity and compactness of his logic. His temperament was strongly emotional; and in the defense of persons arraigned for high crimes and misdemeanors, he sometimes touched with a master-hand those secret springs of feeling and passion that lie in the recesses of every human breast. Whenever he addressed the court upon any questions of law, pleading or practice, he was heard with eager attention by his brethren of the Bar, because he threw a flood of light upon every legal principle he discussed.

"It might be objected to Logan's forensic efforts, particularly his jury efforts, that they were too replete with iteration, though this is a fault common to most lawyers, and arises partly from the nature of the calling itself. Moreover, juries, as a rule, are not composed of a trained order of intellects, and hence it seems necessary for the skillful advocate to repeat over and re-combine the same facts and arguments in a variety of forms, so as to impress them indelibly upon the minds of those addressed, and thus secure the desired verdict. One secret of his uniform success as a practitioner was due to the fact that, like Choate, he exerted himself to the utmost in almost every suit in which he was employed. No matter what the tribunal, the party or the fee, he put forth his whole strength, summoning to his aid the resources of his legal learning, his logic, his wit and knowledge of men, and struggled as for life for the mastery.

"It is a quality of superior and dominating minds to rely upon themselves, and to take the lead in whatsoever enterprise they may engage. Such was true of Logan. It mattered not what was the character and standing of the counsel associated with him in a given lawsuit, he occupied the foreground, and on him rested the chief burden of the controversy. To his clients he was faithful to a degree that knew no bounds, except the bounds of honor. He identified himself for the time with them, made their cause his cause, and their interests his own. It would be hard to determine in what particular branch of jurisprudence he was most proficient—whether as a criminal, a common law, or a chancery lawyer—for he seemed alike at home in all, and in all he shone without a peer. But few men in this country have ever brought to the profession of the Bar so many qualifications to ensure success as he. 'Logan is the best natural lawyer I ever knew,' said the late Judge McLean, of the U. S. Circuit Court, himself a jurist of the soundest judgment and ripest experience; and such is the concurring testimony of all his immediate contemporaries.

"His demeanor at the Bar was neither opinionative nor arrogant, but was characterized by a proper respect for the rulings of the court, and by an obliging disposition toward his professional associates. Still, his temper was naturally choleric, and quick to resent invidious remarks and unprofessional conduct on the part of opposing counsel. At such times they were certain to feel the sting of his retorts, keen and pungent as the rapier's thrust.

"The life of the lawyer in full practice is anything but a life of ease. It is rather one of excitement and anxiety, of patient investigation and unremitting toil, spent in the perusal of authorities, the preparation of pleas and briefs, and in the trial or adjustment of vexatious and complicated causes. Hence, in time he becomes worn out with the corroding cares of his clients; and when the silver thread of life is at last sundered forever, only a scanty and fragmentary record remains of his history. 'Probably in no department of life,' says an able writer, 'is there displayed so much talent which leaves no lasting record. The shrewd management and ready wit, the keen retort, the deep learning, and the impassioned eloquence of the accomplished lawyer, all come in play and tell strongly on the result, but they do their work and are seen no more; felt and admired at the time, they go to make up the contemporaneous estimate living at the place, but not to be reproduced for other times and other admirers.' How next to impossible, then, in a mere skeleton sketch like the present, to recall and portray those 'nice shades of character and talent, of thought and feeling, of look and gesture, of wit and pathos, that went to form the sum total of Stephen Trigg Logan's greatness and fame as a lawyer.

"During the first year of the troubled administration of the late President Lincoln, a vacancy occurred on the Supreme Bench of the United States, to be filled by a Western jurist. Whereupon, the special friends of Judge Logan recommended him as eminently qualified for the place; but the President, for reasons satisfactory to himself, ignored the claims of his old-time friend and law partner, and appointed another to the judgeship. Some have thought that Logan would not have accepted the office if it had been tendered him, but this is improbable. Conscious of the possession of superior abilities, it was but natural for him to be ambitious, and to aspire to some commanding height, whence he could make his influence felt and his power known to the whole country. Had he been raised to a seat in that august tribunal, he would doubtless have shone as a star of the first magnitude in our judicial constellation, and his recorded opinions have enriched the judicial literature of the land. But the sister Fates decreed for him a less conspicuous, though scarcely less useful destiny.

"In private life Logan was one of the most exemplary of men. Simple in his tastes, regular in his habits, unpretentious in his manners, and careless of his attire, he lived, moved and acted as if he were one of the least influential and observed of mankind. He was punctual and exact in all his business transactions. His maxim was to 'owe no man anything,' and to pay as he went—a most excellent Scriptural rule, but one more honored in the breach than the observance. He was also a man of unusually strong local and domestic attachments, and, while given to hospitality, preferred the quiet of his own fireside, and the society of his own family to that of all others; and, as a corollary to this, he was one of the kindest of husbands and most indulgent of fathers.

"In conclusion it may be proper to say, that in his riper and declining years he experienced many severe afflictions. He outlived the major portion of his immediate family and kindred. He lost, in succession, all four of his sons, whom he had doubtless hoped would have perpetuated his name and fame to other generations. He saw his loved companion, the mother of his children, borne from his house of mourning 'to the house appointed for all living;' he followed two of his amiable daughters in sorrow to the tomb; but amid all these domestic trials, Logan was Logan still; and, at length, worn out by the trials and cares and conflicts of this sublunary life, he bowed his withered head in submission to the will of his Creator, and slept with his fathers. No more shall we see his slight form and sharply chiseled features on the busy thoroughfares; no more shall we meet him in the bustling courts of law, so long the theatre of his intellectual struggles and triumphs; and nevermore shall the temples of justice reverberate with the tones of his shrill, clear voice; for that heart once so fiery, and that tongue once so impassioned, now lie pulseless and still in death.

"Thus one after another these relics of the past, these tottering monuments of a former and perhaps better generation, are going home to the silent land—"to that shore from whose sands is never heard the echo of retreating footsteps." 'Thus,' says Irving, 'man passes away; his name gradually perishes from record and recollection; his history is a tale that is told, and his very monument becomes a ruin.' But, sir, I will

'No farther seek his merits to disclose,
'Nor draw his frailties from their dread abode;
There they alike in trembling hopes repose,
The bosom of his Father and his God.'

Hon. David Prickett, prominently identified with the early history of Illinois and Sangamon county, was born in Franklin county, Georgia, September 21, 1800. In early childhood he went with his parents to Kentucky, and a few years later to Edwardsville, Illinois, then a prominent town of this State. He graduated from the law department of Transylvania University, in Lexington, Kentucky, and was admitted to practice at Edwardsville, Illinois, November 15, 1821. Mr. Prickett served as the first Supreme Court Reporter of Illinois, was for a time Judge of Probate Court of Madison county; was elected a member of the State Legislature in 1826, when the Capitol was at Vandalia. He served as aide-de-camp to General John D. Whiteside in the Black Hawk war in 1831; was elected State Attorney in 1837 for the First Judicial Circuit of Illinois, composed of Pike, Calhoun, Greene, Morgan, Sangamon, Tazewell, McLean, Macon and Macoupin counties. He served as Treasurer of the Board of Canal Commissioners during the construction of the Michigan and LaSalle canal in 1840; in 1842 was appointed Director, in behalf of the State, of the State Bank of Illinois; was Clerk of the House of Representatives ten sessions; and was serving as Assistant Clerk of the House of Representatives at the time of his death, March 1, 1847. He dealt considerably in real estate, especially city property, and was joint proprietor in laying out additions to several cities in Illinois. Mr. Prickett married Charlotte, daughter of Thomas and Christiana Griffith, of Tazewell county, on January 24, 1834. She was born March 9, 1806. Their marital union resulted in five children, Christiana G., Thomas G., Gibson R., Hannah O., living, and Susan, deceased. Mrs. Prickett died November 2, 1876. Her father, Dr. Thomas Griffith, was one of the original proprietors of Pekin, Tazewell county.

William L. May is a Kentuckian by birth, removing from that State to Edwardsville, Illinois, from thence to Jacksonville, and from there to Springfield, in 1829, having received the appointment of Receiver of the Land Office in the latter place. Here in 1833 he formed a partnership with Stephen T. Logan. Mr. May was much more of a politician than a lawyer, and was a man of good address and a capital stump-speaker. In 1834 he was elected to Congress, and again in 1836. In 1838 he failed of receiving the nomination, which went to Stephen A. Douglas. In the course of time Mr. May removed to Peoria, and from thence to California, where he died.

Dan. Stone became a member of the Bar of Sangamon county in 1833. He was a native of Vermont and a graduate of Middlebury College, in his native State. He afterwards went to Cincinnati, studied law with his uncle, Ethan Stone, and practiced in that city for several years, and during that time was a member of the legislature, and also a member of the city council. On his removal to Springfield he at once took rank with the best lawyers. He was elected a member of the legislature in 1836, and was one of the famous "long nine" members of that body from this county. While a member of the legislature he received the appointment of Judge of the Circuit Court, and was assigned to duty in the northern part of the State and moved to Galena. In 1838 he rendered a decision with reference to the vote of an alien, which so displeased the party in power that the courts were reorganized by the legislature, and Judge Stone legislated out of office. He soon after left the State, and a few years later died in Essex county, New Jersey.

Josephus Hewett came to Springfield about 1830, at which time he was a Christian preacher, an eloquent "defender of the faith once delivered to the Saints." He read law with Judge Logan, and was admitted to the Bar about 1834. In 1835 he formed a partnership with Cyrus Walker, of Macomb, Mr. Hewett remaining in Springfield and Mr. Walker in Macomb, but practicing together in the various courts of the State. Mr. Hewett became one of the most noted lawyers of that day, and is spoken of by the older members of the profession as a man of strong mind and very eloquent in his pleadings. He removed from Springfield to Mississippi, where he died since the war.

David B. Campbell came to Springfield in 1838, from New Jersey, his native State. He was a fair lawyer and a good prosecutor, serving as Prosecuting Attorney from 1848 to 1856, dying in office in the latter year. He was a fair-minded man, and while Prosecuting Attorney would never prosecute one charged with crime unless thoroughly convinced of his guilt.

Dave Campbell was quite a joker, and a good story is told of him and one Benedict, of which he is responsible, it appearing in his "Reminiscences" as follows:

The hotels, in those days, I remember, being scarce of beds, used frequently to put two of us lawyers in one bed; and it frequently fell to the lot of Campbell and Benedict to occupy the bed between them. One day I heard Campbell say to Benedict, with a smirk on his face:

"Benedict, you must get the landlord to furnish you a bed to yourself."

"Well, suppose he hasn't got one," said Benedict.

"Then you must sleep on the floor, or get the landlord to furnish you a berth up in his hay-mow."

"What is your objections to sleeping with me, General David Campbell?"

"Confound you," replied Campbell, "I never did sleep with you, but I have lain with you. To sleep with you would be impossible. You snore like a cyclops, and your breath smells so of mean whisky that I would as soon breathe the air of a charnel house and live in reach of its eternal stench."

"Well," said Benedict, "General Campbell, I will show you that you shall sleep with me, and if either of us has to sleep on the floor or go to the hay-mow, it will be you and not me."

"Well, well," responded Campbell, with a sinister smile on his face, "we will see about it."

So that night Dave Campbell went to bed earlier than usual, and so about twelve o'clock at night along comes Benedict, pretty much "how-come-you-so." Addressing himself to Campbell, who feigned to be half asleep, he said:

"Hello, there! Dave, lay over to the back of the bed, and give me room in front."

Before going to bed that evening Dave had armed his heel by buckling on it one of his spurs. When Benedict got undressed, even to the taking off of his drawers, he jumped into bed and began to fondle on Campbell. Dave quietly drew up his heel that had the spur on and planted it about six inches above Benedict's knee, and gave it a turn downwards, crying, "Get up there! get up there!" as though he was speaking to his horse. Benedict gave a sudden leap and landed about the middle of the floor, crying out in great agony:

"Jesus! the fellow has got the nightmare or delirium tremens, and has taken me for his blamed old horse."

Judge Davis and Lincoln, who were sleeping in the same room, could stand this no longer. They burst out into the most uproarious laughter.

Antrim Campbell, a brother of David, was born in New Jersey in 1814. He came to Springfield in 1838, and entered upon the practice of his profession. In 1849, he was appointed Master in Chancery for the Circuit Court of Sangamon county, and resigned the same in 1861, when he received the appointment of Master in Chancery for the United States Circuit Court for the Southern District of Illinois. While never taking high rank as an attorney, he was recognized as a good Master in Chancery and an excellent business man. He died August 11, 1868.

A. T. Bledsoe was a worthy member of the Sangamon County Bar during the last year of its Second Decade and extending nearly through the third. He came to Springfield from Greene county in 1840. While a young man he graduated from West Point, and shortly after resigned his position in the army, studied for the ministry, was ordained a minister in the Episcopalian Church. Becoming dissatisfied, he resigned his charge, studied law and was admitted to the Bar before coming to Springfield. On his arrival here he formed a partnership with Jesse B. Thomas, which continued about a year, when he became a partner of E. D. Baker. Major Stuart says that for real logic he was the strongest man at this Bar at that time. But contentment was not with him a cardinal virtue. He could remain in one position but a short time. He was an author of several scientific works, which were well received by the learned. Mr. Bledsoe about 1850 drifted South, was President of a college in Mississippi for a time, and at the breaking out of the war was professor of mathematics in a college at Charlottesville, Virginia. Espousing the Southern side, he was made Assistant Secretary of War, but becoming convinced that the Southern Confederacy was about to collapse, shortly before the close of the war, it is said that he applied to his old friend Abraham Lincoln, President of the United States, for a pass through the lines, receiving which he came within the Union lines and soon embarked for Europe, where he remained until the close of the war. Returning, he visited his old friends in Springfield, then again went South, and has since died.

Charles R. Willis was from Connecticut, was well educated, but done little business in law. Soon after coming to Springfield he engaged in the real estate business, in which he accumulated a large fortune. He died many years ago.

Schuyler Strong was from New York, and well advanced in years before coming to Springfield. In his native State he was regarded as no ordinary lawyer, and was recognized as the peer of any when he arrived here. If it had not been for one previous fault, so common, success would have crowned his every effort. He died about 1845.

Ninian W. Edwards is the son of Ninian Edwards, the first and only Territorial Governor of Illinois. He was born April 15, 1809, near Frankfort, Kentucky. His father at that time was Chief Justice of the Court of Appeals of Kentucky, but, receiving the appointment of Governor of the Territory of Illinois, he removed with his family in June following, to Kaskaskia, its capital. When the proper age, Ninian W. was sent to Transylvania University, and graduated in the law department of that institution in 1833. Previous to his graduation, and in 1832, he was married to Miss Elizabeth P. Todd, in Lexington, Kentucky. Returning home after his graduation, he commenced the practice of law. In 1834, he was appointed by Governor Reynolds, Attorney General of the State, and was shortly afterwards elected by the legislature. The law requiring the Attorney General to reside at the capital, and Mr. Edwards not liking a residence in Vandalia, he resigned the office in February, 1835, and shortly afterwards removed to Springfield. In 1836, Mr. Edwards was elected one of the Representatives in the legislature, and was also one of the "Long Nine," and is now, in 1881, the only one living of the number. From 1836 to 1852, Mr. Edwards served in the legislature, either in the Senate or House of Representatives, being a very efficient member. He was also a member of the Constitutional Convention which formed the constitution of 1848. In 1852 he was appointed Attorney before the Board of Commissioners to investigate the claims of canal contractors against the State, amounting to over $1,500,000. In 1854 he received the appointment of State Superintendent of Public Instruction by Governor Matteson, and was the first incumbent of that office. He was retained in this office by the legislature until 1857. Mr. Edwards has always been a champion of free schools, and drafted the law in regard to them which was first adopted in the State. In 1862, he was appointed by President Lincoln, United States Commissary. Aside from his official duties, Mr. Edwards has found time to prepare a history of the State of Illinois, including the Life and Times of Governor Edwards, written on the invitation of the Illinois State Historical Society. It is a valuable work, and is regarded as a standard on the subject on which it treats. As a lawyer, Mr. Edwards ranked high while an active member of the Bar, and even at this day on some subjects his views are often sought by the fraternity.

Cyrus Walker was a Kentuckian by birth; studied law and was admitted to the Bar in his native State, where he became very prominent, especially as a criminal lawyer. On account of his defense of a murderer, and his acquittal, whom the people generally thought should have been hung, Kentucky became uncomfortably warm for him, so that he came to Illinois and settled in Macomb, in 1833. He was a man of strong mind, an excellent lawyer, and withal very conscientious. In 1835 he was a partner of Josephus Hewitt, and in 1839 with James C. Conkling. His business was very extensive for many years in the various courts of Illinois. He died near Macomb, in 1876.

In 1837, Abraham Lincoln was admitted to the Bar, and for the first time wrote in connection with his name, "Attorney and Counselor-at-Law." While living in Salem, he had borrowed books from the law library of John T. Stuart, which he read and returned as the opportunity occurred. When convinced that he could stand an examination, he presented himself for that purpose, and was duly licensed to practice his profession. He immediately formed a partnership with Mr. Stuart, which relation continued about two years. During this same year, Stephen A. Douglas became a citizen of Springfield, having received the appointment of Register in the Land Office. He soon afterwards formed a partnership with John D. Urquhart for the practice of law, and here commenced the rivalry of these two great men—Abraham Lincoln and Stephen A. Douglas—men whom the world delights to honor. In the address already quoted, by Isaac N. Arnold, he says:

"When, forty years ago, the Bar used to meet here at the capitol, in the Supreme and United States Courts, and ride the circuit in our different sections of the State, Lincoln and Douglas did not occupy a position of such overshadowing importance as they do to-day. They did not beat us in our cases when law and justice were with us, and we did not realize that they were so greatly our superiors. But these two men have passed into history, and justly, as our great representative men. These are the two most prominent figures, not only in the history of Illinois, but of the Mississippi Valley, and their prominence, certainly that of Mr. Lincoln, will be increased as time passes on. I will, therefore, endeavor to give such rough and imperfect outlines of them as lawyers, and advocates, and public speakers, as I can. We, who knew them personally, who tried causes with them and against them, ought, I think, to aid those who shall come after us, to understand them, and to determine what manner of men they were. In the first place, no two men could be found more unlike, physically and intellectually, in manners and in appearance, than they.

"Lincoln was a very tall, spare man, six feet four inches in height, and would be instantly recognized as belonging to that type of tall, large-boned men produced in the northern part of the Mississippi Valley, and exhibiting its peculiar characteristics in the most marked degree in Tennessee, Kentucky and Illinois.

"In any court room in the United States he would have been instantly picked out as a Western man. His stature, figure, dress, manner, voice and accent indicated that he was of the Northwest.

"In manner he was always cordial and frank, and although not without dignity, he made every person feel quite at his ease. I think the first impression a stranger would get of him, whether in conversation or by hearing him speak, was, that this is a kind, frank, sincere, genuine man, of transparent truthfulness and integrity; and before Lincoln had uttered many words, he would be impressed with his clear good sense, his remarkably simple, homely, but expressive Saxon language, and next his wonderful wit and humor. Lincoln was more familiar with the Bible than with any other book in the language, and this was apparent, both from his style and illustrations, so often taken from that Book. He verified the maxim, that it is better to know thoroughly a few good books than to read many.

"Douglas was little more than five feet high, with a strong, broad chest, and strongly marked features; his manners, also, were cordial, frank and hearty. The poorest and humblest found him friendly. He was, in his earlier years, hale fellow well met with the rudest and poorest man in the court room.

"Those of you who practiced law with him, or tried causes before him when on the bench, will remember that it was not unusual to see him come off the bench, or leave his chair at the Bar, and take a seat on the knee of a friend, and with one arm thrown familiarly around his friend's neck, have a friendly talk, or a legal or political consultation. Such familiarity would have shocked our English cousins, and disgusted our Boston brothers, and it has, I think, disappeared. In contrast with this familiarity of Douglas, I remember an anecdote illustrating Colonel Benton's ideas of his own personal dignity. A distinguished member of Congress, who was a great admirer of Benton, one day approached and slapped him familiarly and rudely on the shoulder. The Senator haughtily drew himself up, and said, 'That is a familiarity, sir, I never permit my friends, much less a comparative stranger. Sir, it must not be repeated.'

"Lincoln and Douglas were, as we know, both self-educated, and each the builder of his own fortune. Each became, very early, the recognized leader of the political party to which he belonged. Douglas was bold, unflinching, impetuous, denunciatory and determined. He possessed, in an eminent degree, the qualities which create personal popularity, and he was the idol of his friends. Both Lincoln and Douglas were strong jury-lawyers. Lincoln, on the whole, was the strongest jury-lawyer we ever had in Illinois. Both were distinguished for their ability in seizing and bringing out, distinctly and clearly, the real points in a case. Both were very happy in the examination of witnesses; I think Lincoln the stronger of the two in cross-examination. He could compel a witness to tell the truth when he meant to lie.

He could make a jury laugh, and, generally, weep, at his pleasure. Lincoln on the right side, and especially when injustice or fraud were to be exposed, was the strongest advocate. On the wrong side, or on the defense, where the accused was really guilty, the client with Douglas for his advocate would be more fortunate than with Lincoln.

"Lincoln studied his cases thoroughly and exhaustively. Douglas had a wonderful faculty of extracting from his associates, from experts and others, by conversation, all they knew of a subject he was to discuss, and then making it so thoroughly his that all seemed to have originated with himself. He so perfectly assimilated the ideas and knowledge of others that all seemed to be his own, and all that went into his mind came out improved.

"The ablest argument I ever heard him make was in the case of Daniel Brainerd vs. The Canal Trustees, argued at Ottawa, June, 1850, reported in 12 Ill. Reports, 488. The question involved the extent of the right of pre-emption by settlers upon canal lands, within the city of Chicago. The judges were Treat, Trumbull and Caton. Judges Treat and Trumbull concurred in deciding the case against Douglas, Judge Caton dissenting. He made, in this case, one of the ablest arguments I ever heard at any Bar.

"In 1841, Mr. Douglas, being then not quite twenty-eight years old, was elected one of the Judges of the Supreme Court. He was not a profound lawyer, but with his clear common sense and incisive mind, after a case was well argued, he always knew how to decide it. He held the position of Judge for about two years, and was then, after a very active canvass, elected to Congress by a small majority over O. H. Browning. From this time until his death, in the early summer of 1861, he remained in Congress, serving in the House until 1846, when he was elected to the Senate, of which he continued a member to the time of his death. His ablest speech in the House was made on the 7th of January, 1844, on a bill to refund to General Jackson the fine imposed upon him by Judge Hall, during the defense of New Orleans. In this masterly argument he took the then bold and novel ground that the fine was imposed in violation of law. It is a curious fact that, in this speech, Douglas claimed for General Jackson many of the war-powers exercised by President Lincoln and his generals during the rebellion, and for which the President was so bitterly denounced by his political opponents. This speech gave him a national reputation. After the death of the hero of New Orleans a pamphlet copy of this speech was found among his papers, with an endorsement in Jackson's hand-writing, and signed by him, in these words: "This speech constitutes my defense. May it aside as an inheritance for my grand-children."

"Mr. Lincoln remained in active practice at the Bar until his nomination for the Presidency in 1860. His reputation as a lawyer and advocate was rising higher and higher. He had a large practice on the circuit all over the central part of this State, and he was employed in most of the important cases in the Federal and Supreme Courts. He went on special retainers all over Illinois, and occasionally to St. Louis, Cincinnati, and Indiana. His law arguments addressed to the judges were always clear, vigorous, and logical; seeking to convince rather by the application of principle than by the citation of authorities and cases. On the whole, I always thought him relatively stronger before a jury than with the court. He was a quick and accurate reader of character, and understood, almost intuitively, the jury, witnesses, parties, and judges, and how best to address, convince, and influence them. He had a power of conciliating and impressing everyone in his favor. A stranger coming into court, not knowing him, or anything about his case, listening to Lincoln a few moments, would find himself involuntarily on his side, and wishing him success. His manner was so candid, so direct, the spectator was impressed that he was seeking only truth and justice. He excelled all I ever heard in the statement of his case. However complicated, he would disentangle it, and present the turning point in a way so simple and clear that all could understand. Indeed, his statement often rendered argument unnecessary, and often the court would stop him and say, "If that is the case, we will hear the other side." He had in the highest possible degree the art of persuasion and the power of conviction. His illustrations were often quaint and homely, but always clear and apt, and generally conclusive. He never misstated evidence, but stated clearly, and met fairly and squarely his opponent's case. His wit and humor and inexhaustible stores of anecdote, always to the point, added immensely to his power as a jury advocate.

The last case Mr. Lincoln ever tried was that of Jones vs. Johnson, tried in April and May, 1860, in the United States Circuit Court, at Chicago. The case involved the title to land of very great value, the accretion on the shores of Lake Michigan. During the trial, Judge Drummond and all the counsel on both sides, including Mr. Lincoln, dined together at my house. Douglas and Lincoln were at the time both candidates for the nomination for President. There were active and ardent political friends of each at the table, and when the sentiment was proposed, "May Illinois furnish the next President," it was, as you imagine, drank with enthusiasm by the friends of both Lincoln and Douglas.

Jesse B. Thomas, Jr., was a nephew of the eminent statesman of that name, a former United States Senator, and well known in the early day. He was an attorney of more than ordinary ability, and succeeded Ninian W. Edwards as Attorney General of the State in 1885. In 1837 he was appointed Circuit Judge, but resigned after the expiration of two years. He was at one time a partner of David Prickett, in Springfield, and afterwards of William L. May. He finally went to Chicago and died there.

E. D. Baker came to Springfield in 1835, from Greene county, Illinois. He was born in London, England, February 24, 1811, and emigrated with his parents to America shortly after the close of our late war with England, and after remaining for a time in Philadelphia he came west and settled in Indiana, and from thence to Illinois. He early manifested a strong passion for books, reading with avidity everything on which he could lay his hands, particularly history, biography and poetry. Possessing a rare aptitude for acquiring information, a ready and highly retentive memory, his mind soon became stored with the rich treasures of literary lore, from which, in after years, he drew copiously as from a perennial fount. At Carrollton, Greene county, Mr. Baker studied law in the office of A. W. Cavarly, serving at the same time as deputy in the office of the County Clerk. As soon as he gained a superficial knowledge of the science of law, spurred on by necessity, he procured a license and commenced practice. Owing, however, to his youth, limited legal attainments and the absence of influential friends, during the first years of his professional life, he met with indifferent success.

While in Carrollton, Mr. Baker was married to Mrs. Mary A. Lee. Soon after marriage he united with the Christian Church, and being naturally of an impulsive and enthusiastic temperament, he was very zealous in the discharge of his religious duties, became an able exhorter, and began to entertain serious thoughts of engaging in regular ministerial work. As time passed, his mind becoming occupied with politics, he finally ceased his connection with the religious body. While an active member of the church, he first discovered that boldness of thought, that opulence of expression, that graceful and persuasive manner of speaking, for which he became so justly celebrated in after life.

Shortly after coming to Springfield, Mr. Baker associated himself in the practice of law with Josephus Hewett. Subsequently, he entered into partnership with Stephen T. Logan, and for a short time with Albert T. Bledsoe. It was here that Baker first applied himself seriously to the duties of his profession, and here he won his first laurels as an advocate. Surrounded by the great men already mentioned as comprising the Sangamon County Bar during this Decade, Baker was compelled to struggle for that eminence in his profession which he rapidly attained. Although disinclined to close, continuous study, and often negligent in the preparation of his cases, he had sufficiently mastered the principles and intricacies of the law, as to meet the ordinary requirements of practice, and his native genius supplied any deficiency. His confident, self-possessed air amidst the bustle of a court of law, his quickness of perception, ready wit, fertility in resources and ardent eloquence, enabled him to achieve the victory in spite of the most determined opposition from older or more experienced antagonists. In jury cases he was especially successful, for in these he was less fettered by the legal forms and technicalities which ordinarily curb the reins of youthful imagination. Indeed, a jury to him was but a miniature popular assembly, before which he could pour out his argument and invective at will, or indulge in those exquisite touches of pathos, which failed not to awaken the sympathy and move the hearts of his auditors. Enterprising and ambitious, Mr. Baker early directed his attention to politics as opening the shortest road to preferment. In 1837 he was elected to the General Assembly from Sangamon county to fill the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of Dan Stone. In the following year he was re-elected. In the campaign of 1840 he took an active part in the support of General Harrison. In 1844 he was elected to Congress, and was a member of that body when the war with Mexico broke out. Returning home from Washington, he raised a regiment and was commissioned colonel. In this war he earned a reputation as a brave and gallant commander.

On his return from Mexico he removed to Galena and was there re-elected to Congress. He took his seat the second time in December, 1849. He bore an active if not a conspicuous part in the debates upon those grave National issues, which formed so prominent a feature in the first session of the 31st Congress. He favored some, but not all the compromise measures passed at that session. The annexed paragraph, taken from a speech made by him on these historic questions, was prophetic of his future fate:

"I have only to say that if the time should come when dissension rules the hour, and discord reigns supreme, I shall be ready to give the best blood in my veins to my country's cause. I shall be prepared to meet all antagonists, with lance in rest, to do battle in every land, in defense of the constitution of the country, which I have sworn to support to the last extremity, against disunionists and all its enemies, whether North or South—to meet them everywhere, at all times, with speech or hand, with word or blow, until thought or being shall be mine no longer."

In 1852 Colonel Baker emigrated with his family to California. Establishing himself in San Francisco, he once more commenced the practice of law. His fame as an advocate and orator had preceded him, so that he soon found himself in the midst of an extensive business. Almost at one bound, and with apparently little effort, he rose to the summit of his profession, and to a share in the best practice of the courts of that youthful commercial metropolis. Here it was that he achieved his highest reputation as a lawyer, and perhaps his most brilliant renown as an orator.

While living in California, he early identified himself with the Free Soil movement. When Senator Broderick, the chief of the Douglas Democracy in that State was killed in a duel with Judge Terry, it was Colonel Baker that was called upon to deliver the funeral oration, and right royally did he perform that sad duty. The oration has seldom, if ever, been surpassed. Space forbids even a quotation in this place.

Shortly after the unhappy death of Broderick, Colonel Baker removed to Oregon. Here he was soon after elected to the United States Senate. Returning to San Francisco, on his way to the East, he was the recipient of a public ovation. In his speech upon the occasion, he said:

"As for me, I dare not, will not, be false to freedom. Where the feet of my youth were planted, there by freedom my feet shall ever stand. I will walk beneath her banner. I will glory in her strength. I have seen her in history struck down on a hundred fields of battle. I have seen her friends fly from her, her foes gather around her. I have seen her bound to a stake. I have seen them give her ashes to the winds. But when they turned to exult, I have seen her again meet them face to face, resplendent in comp'ete steel, brandishing in her strong, right hand a flaming sword, red with insufferable light. I take courage. The people gather around her. The genius of America will yet lead her sons to freedom."

In December, 1860, while en route to Washington, Colonel Baker paid a hasty visit to Springfield, where he was honored with a public reception. On behalf of the citizens, J. C. Conkling, in a neat and tasty speech, formally welcomed him to the scenes of his early labors and triumphs. The Senator elect responded in characteristic style. He expressed the liveliest gratitude at the heartiness and enthusiasm with which he had been received by his old friends, without distinction of party; referring in touching language to his previous history; alluded to the wonderful growth and prosperity of Illinois, and of the great West; and spoke with solicitude of our National difficulties and the impending civil war.

On taking his seat in the Senate, Colonel Baker entered industriously upon the discharge of the responsible duties of his station, and ranked from the outset among the foremost orators and debaters in that dignified body. His addresses on the 2d and 3d days of January, 1861, in reply to Judah P. Benjamin, of Louisiana, was one of the most eloquent delivered during that storm period.

On the 20th day of April, a few days after the fall of Fort Sumter, Colonel Baker spoke in New York City to one of the largest assemblages ever enchained by the eloquence of a single man. In closing his address, he dedicated himself anew to the service of his country in these grandly eloquent words, which were greeted with tremendous applause:

"And if, from the far Pacific, a voice feebler than the feeblest murmur on its shores, may be heard to give you courage and hope in this contest, that voice is yours to-day. And if a man whose hair is gray, who is well nigh worn out in the battle and toil of life, may pledge himself on such an occasion, and to such an audience, let me say, as my last word, that as when amid sheeted fire and flame, I saw and led the hosts of New York, as they charged in contest upon a foreign soil for the honor of your flag, so, again, if Providence shall will it, this feeble hand shall draw a sword never yet dishonored—not to fight for distant honor in a foreign land—but to fight for country, for government, for Constitution, for law, for right, for freedom, for humanity; and in the hope that the banner of our country may advance, and wheresoever that banner waves, there may glory pursue and freedom be established."

Colonel Baker at once raised a regiment, known as the California regiment, and entered the service. At Ball's Bluff, on the 20th day of October, 1861, he fell in battle, pierced by eight leaden messengers freighted with death, from the guns of the advancing foe. Thus heroically the grand and gifted Baker fell.

John D. Urquhart was from Virginia, and came to Springfield about 1832. He was well read in the law and in the general literature of the day. He was a gentleman of the old school, with too much refinement to adapt himself to Western methods, and therefore achieved no success as a lawyer at the Bar of Sangamon county.

John C. Doremus was from New Jersey, and first practiced in the courts of this county in 1838. In 1840 he formed a partnership with Schuyler Strong, which continued but a few months. He never attained any distinction as a lawyer, and early in 1840 went South, studied theology, and became minister in the Presbyterian Church and received the degree of D.D. He died some years ago.

THIRD DECADE.

The Third Decade shows in addition to the greater number of those of the Second, the names of Silas W. Robbins, Charles R. Welles, Benjamin West, James Shields, William A. Minshall, Justice Butterfield, Justice Butterfield, Jr., Levi Davis, A. K. Smede, James H. Matheny, David Logan, E. B. Herndon, A. Parker, William I. Ferguson, William Walker, William H. Herndon, Vincent Ridgely, U. F. Linder, Josiah Lamborn, Archibald Williams, O. H. Browning, Israel Crosby, Lyman Trumbull.

What Bar in all the Union can show a greater array of distinguished names than the foregoing, in addition to the best of the Second Decade who still continued to practice before the courts of the county. For great learning, for oratorical ability, and for unsurpassed statesmanship, the Bar during this Decade has never been surpassed. From its ranks were furnished a President of the United States, a distinguished candidate for the Presidency whose memory will always be kept green by lovers of the Union, several United States Senators, one Cabinet Officer, several members of Congress, several distinguished officers in the United States Army—all of whom were honorable men reflecting great credit upon the profession of law and upon the Bar of Sangamon county.

A large and interesting volume could be written of the Bar of this Decade, but in this volume space forbids more than such individual mention as will show the character of those composing it.

General Shields.*—Among the men who have conferred lasting celebrity upon the Capital City of Illinois, by making it the place of their temporary or permanent abode, one of the most remarkable and distinguished was the late General Shields—the man of two nationalities, the veteran of two wars, and the Senator from three States.

James Shields was born at a place called Dunganon, county of Tyrone, Ireland, in the year 1819. Of his family and early domestic history, little or nothing is certainly known; though he appears to have enjoyed fair educational advantages. With that inbred and irrepressible spirit of adventure, which formed the ruling characteristic of his life, he emigrated to the United States while still in his minority, and, probably, first landed at New Orleans. This was in 1826, or thereabouts; and in no long time afterward, we find him located in Randolph county, Illinois, engaged in the vocation of teaching. Subsequently, he read law, was admitted to the Bar in 1832, and began the practice of that profession in Kaskaskia—the ancient "seat of empire" of Illinois under the French Dominion.

Gifted from the outset with a talent for public speaking, and all the elements of personal popularity, we next find our young adventurer at Vandalia (then the State Capital), representing the county of Randolph in the lower branch of the General Assembly. Here, during the memorable session of 1836-37, he first met Lincoln, Douglas, Hardin, and other rising politicians of the period, with whom he was afterwards to become so prominently associated.

In March, 1841, Mr. Shields was made Auditor of the State of Illinois, and took up his residence in Springfield, to which place the seat of government had been removed from Vandalia by act of the legislature. This was the era of general financial depression, of depreciated paper money, and of slow recovery from panic; and Shields is said to have run the Auditor's office almost entirely on scrip. It was during his incumbency of this office that he became involved in the personal difficulty with Abraham Lincoln, which led to his challenging the latter to mortal combat. Lincoln accepted the challenge, and under the advice of his friend and second, Dr. Merriman, selected cavalry broad swords as the weapons with which to fight. Such a choice necessarily gave to Lincoln, who was much the tallest and longest armed man of the two, greatly the advantage. But our chivalrous son of the Emerald Isle was not disposed to shrink from the encounter, whatever might be the advantage of his antagonist in point of stature, or in the choice of weapons. The parties accordingly repaired to Alton, accompanied by their respective seconds, intending to fight the duel on the narrow tongue of land between the confluence of the Mississippi and the Missouri rivers. But through the timely intervention of common friends, the difficulty was at last amicably adjusted, without the shedding of human gore.

On August 16, 1843, Shields was commissioned by Governor Ford one of the associated justices of the Supreme Court of Illinois, but did not long retain his seat upon the bench; and, in April, 1845, the ermine for the office of Commissioner of the General Land Office, which post he held for nearly two years.

The outbreak of hostilities with Mexico, in 1846, afforded the long-wished-for opportunity of gratifying his martial tastes and ambition, and constituted the turning point, so to speak, in his checkered career. Having announced his intention of taking part in the war, he was, upon the recommendation of the Illinois delegation in Congress, commissioned Brigadier General by President Polk. Taking the field under General Scott, Shields led the Illinois brigade in the victorious march on the City of Mexico. In the battle of Cerro Gordo, on April 18, 1847, he was seriously wounded by a ball which passed through one of his lungs. For a while, it was doubtful if he could survive; but he did recover so as to resume his former command, and served till the end of the campaign. At the sanguinary battle of Cherubusco, fought on the 20th of August, in the vicinity of the City of Mexico, General Shields led the Illinois and New England brigades, and the Palmetto regiment, in the attack upon the Mexican reserve, and drove the enemy from their entrenched position back into the capital. He also fought at the storming of Chapultepec, where he is said to have been again wounded. For his gallantry in these several engagements, he was brevetted a Major-General. Upon the conclusion of the war, he was honorably mustered out of service, and returned home to receive the plaudits and rewards of his countrymen for his valorous and patriotic services.

Declining the appointment of Governor for the Territory of Oregon, General Shields, during the winter of 1848-49, was elected by the Illinois Legislature to a seat in the United States Senate, which he held for the full term of six years from the 4th of March, 1849. His career in the Senate, though not so brilliant as it had been on the "tented field," was creditable to himself and to the party that elected him. During this term, he voted for the Compromise measures of 1850, and also for the Nebraska Bill.

In 1855, he was a candidate for re-election, but his Democratic friends in the legislature found it necessary to concentrate their strength upon Governor Matteson, in order to defeat the candidacy of Mr. Lincoln, and the latter, seeing that he could not succeed, finally withdrew in favor of Lyman Trumbull, who was thereupon elected by the fusion majority.

Soon after this defeat (about the first he had sustained), General Shields transferred his residence to the State of Minnesota, by the legislature of which he was sent to the United States Senate to fill a vacancy, and occupied his seat from May 12, 1858, to March 3, 1859. He then went to California, where he remained for a year or two. What were his motives in going to the Pacific coast, or his occupation while there, do not clearly appear.

When the long threatened civil war broke out, General Shields' martial spirit was again fully aroused, and having tendered his services to President Lincoln they were accepted, and he was made a Brigadier, his commission dating August 19, 1861. Early in 1862, he was assigned to the command of a division of General Bank's army, operating in the Shenandoah Valley, Va., and commanded at the battles of Port Republic and Winchester. Some time in 1863, General Shields, owing in part to disability consequent upon the wounds he had received in former campaigns, and partly to his having been overlooked in the matter of promotion by the military authorities at Washington, resigned his commission in the army, and settled upon a small farm in Carroll county, Missouri. About this time, he appears to have married a woman of Irish parentage; but the union was not productive of any addition to his slender fortune. His experience as a tiller of the soil was not particularly encouraging. In the course of a public lecture in one of our eastern cities, he referred to himself as one of the "poorest farmers in Carroll county," and he doubtless told the simple truth.

During the stormy administration of President Johnson, Shields was elected to Congress from one of the Missouri districts, but was not allowed to take his seat by the party then dominant in the House of Representatives. In 1877, he was elected a member of the Missouri Legislature, and about the same time was appointed Adjutant General of that State.

In 1878 he was brought forward in connection with the office of doorkeeper of the National House of Representatives; and the Democratic majority of that body (as a mark of respect for his distinguished services, and to relieve his necessities) voted to increase his pension to one hundred dollars per month.

During the winter of 1878-79, General Shields was elected by the Missouri Legislature to complete the unexpired portion of the late Senator Boggy's term in the United States Senate. The term was quite short, (not exceeding six weeks), but it conferred upon him the rare honor of having been a Senator from three States; an honor such as, perhaps, was never before vouchsafed to any citizen of our republic. In these latter years of his life, he traveled more or less extensively through the country, lecturing on his "Reminiscences of the Mexican war," and also upon his "recollections" of the eminent statesmen with whom he had associated in the Senate in antebellum days.

At length, however, after a singularly eventful and romantic career of nearly three score and ten years, General Shields was called to meet his last enemy—death. On the night of the first of June, 1879, he died suddenly and peacefully in Ottumwa, Iowa, while on a visit to relatives in that city. It was the opinion of those best qualified to judge, that his old wound in the chest, received in the Mexican war, was the primary cause of his unexpected decease. His remains were subsequently removed to his home at Carrollton, Missouri, where they were interred with appropriate civic and military honors.

James Shields, strictly speaking, was neither a great nor a learned man, yet his abilities were far above the average, and no one ever made a better display than himself, of those talents with which the Creator had endowed him. He was, in a certain sense, his own ancestor, and not for him was intended the Latin maxims, avito vivet honora.

In stature he was of the middle size, trim built, raw-boned, and dark complected, with black hair and eyes, and prominent, yet regular, features. His carriage was at all times erect and soldier-like, while his manners were pleasing and "taking" in the extreme. As a speaker, he was graceful, fluent, witty and eloquent, and his fine voice had just enough of the Irish brogue to give it flavor and richness of tone. No more captivating speaker, for the masses, ever mounted the stump in Illinois, unless it may have been the lamented Colonel Baker.

Shields was also a vain man—especially of his martial record—but his vanity was of the innocent and amiable kind, and never took the form of offensive and overbearing egotism. He could hardly be called a man of business (being as improvident as Oliver Goldsmith), and was not unfrequently indebted to his personal or political friends for pecuniary aid. Careless of his private affairs, he went up and down the land, like a knight errant of old, seeking renown, and finding it, in diverse ways, and in widely dissimilar spheres of human endeavor.

In party politics, he was a life-long Democrat, but he ever so bore himself, amid the fiercest partisan contests, as to command the respect, if not admiration, of his political foes. His amor patriæ was unbounded, and no truer patriot ever raised his voice in the American Senate, or unsheathed his sword upon the blood-stained field of battle. His influence over his fellow-citizens of Celtic birth was great and durable, and was always wielded for good, since in all matters of public policy he was discreet in council, and never permitted his feelings or imagination to transcend his judgment.

As a politician, jurist, warrior, orator, and Senator, he possessed many useful, many noble, and many brilliant qualities; and, despite the transitory nature of that which we call fame, his name and exploits will not soon be forgotten by his admiring countrymen. But the valiant and generous hearted Shields is in his grave; after life's fitful fever, "he sleeps well." He has "passed into that still country where the heaviest-laden wayfarer at length lays down his load."

"Long shall we seek his likeness—long in vain—
And turn to all of him which may remain,
Sighing that Nature formed but one such man,
And broke the die in moulding—"

Silas W. Robbins immigrated from Massachusetts to Kentucky as early as 1825, and succeeded admirably as an attorney in that commonwealth, serving some years as a Judge of one of the courts. There being a strong prejudice in that State against Yankees, he left about 1841 and came to Illinois and settled in Springfield, forming one of that strong force of attorneys composing the Bar of that period. He was an excellent lawyer, and soon succeeded in obtaining a lucrative practice, which continued until his retirement in 1852. Judge Robbins was a man of high temper and of a very beligerent disposition, never seeming happy or contented without a "wee bit of a row" on his hands. He could brook no restraints, and would be imposed on by no one, large or small. In 1855 he removed to a farm a short distance from Springfield, and there died about 1870.

Justin Butterfield was a citizen of Chicago, and often appeared in the Springfield courts. He was one of the most learned, talented and distinguished members of the Bar during this Decade. A case in which Mr. Butterfield participated is thus described by Isaac N. Arnold:

"In December, 1842, Governor Ford, on the application of the Executive of Missouri, issued a warrant for the arrest of Joseph Smith, the Apostle of Mormonism, then residing at Nauvoo, in this State, as a fugitive from justice. He was charged with having instigated the attempt, by some Mormons, to assassinate Governor Bogg, of Missouri. Mr. Butterfield, in behalf of Smith, sued out, from Judge Pope, a writ of habeas corpus, and Smith was brought before the United States District Court. On the hearing it clearly appeared that he had not been in Missouri, nor out of Illinois, within the time in which the crime had been committed, and if he had any connection with the offense the acts were done in Illinois. Was he, then, a fugitive from justice? It was pretty clear that, if allowed to be taken into Missouri, means would have been found to condemn and execute him. The Attorney-General of Illinois, Mr. Lamborn, appeared to sustain the warrant. Mr. Butterfield, aided by B. S. Edwards, appeared for Smith, and moved for his discharge. The Prophet (so-called) was attended by his twelve Apostles and a large number of his followers, and the case attracted great interest. The court-room was thronged with prominent members of the Bar and public men. Judge Pope was a gallant gentleman of the old school, and loved nothing better than to be in the midst of youth and beauty. Seats were crowded on the Judge's platform, on both sides and behind the Judge, and an array of brilliant and beautiful ladies almost encircled the court. Mr. Butterfield, dressed a la Webster, in blue dress-coat and metal buttons, with buff vest, rose with dignity and amidst the most profound silence. Pausing, and running his eyes admiringly from the central figure of Judge Pope, along the rows of lovely women on each side of him, he said:

"May it please the Court:

"I appear before you to-day under circumstances most novel and peculiar. I am to address the 'Pope' (bowing to the Judge) surrounded by angels (bowing still lower to the ladies), in the presence of the Holy Apostles, in behalf of the Prophet of the Lord."

"Among the most lovely and attractive of these 'angels' were the daughters of Judge Pope, a daughter of Mr. Butterfield, Mrs. Lincoln, Miss Dunlap, afterwards Mrs. General John A. McClernand, and others, some of whom still live, and the tradition of their youthful beauty is verified by their lovely daughters and grandchildren.

"But the chief actors in that drama, on the issue of which hung, not only the life of Smith, the Prophet, but of his followers, and perhaps the peace of two States, the dramatis personae have all, or nearly all passed away. The genial and learned Judge, the prisoner and his able counselor, so full of wit and humor, the eloquent Attorney-General, the Governors of both States, the Marshal and Clerk, and nearly all of the distinguished lawyers and public men—have each paid the debt of nature."

Mr. Butterfield was a native of the State of New York, and at the breaking out of the war of 1812, he was in some office in that State, and opposing the war it destroyed his popularity. When the war broke out between this country and Mexico, some person asked him if he was opposed to it. "No," said he, "I oppose no wars. I opposed one war and it ruined me, and henceforth I am for war, pestilence and famine."

During the contest between Harrison and Van Buren in 1840, some Federal office-holder met Butterfield in debate. The latter charged the hard times that then afflicted the country to the course pursued by the Administration. The office-holder replied, denying that there was hard times, and declared that he never saw better times in his life. Butterfield, in his rejoinder, used the following language: "Fellow-citizens, I believe, in my soul, that if it rained fire and brimstone, as it did at Sodom and Gomorrah, these locofocos would exclaim, 'What a refreshing shower!'"

Mr. Butterfield was perfectly familiar with the Scriptures and used Scriptural quotations and illustrations with great effect. While he was District Attorney, Ben Bond was United States Marshal, and as two of his brothers were deputies, and were quite annoying to him, his patience at one time being tried beyond endurance. He remarked to some one: "I would to God that not only Thou, but also all that hear me this day, were both almost and altogether, such as I am, except these Bonds."

David A. Smith, of Jacksonville, who had in some way incurred the displeasure of Butterfield, was sitting one day in the United States Court room, sleeping, the sun shining upon his bald, slick head. Some one directed Butterfield's attention to him, when he instantly exclaimed, in his gruff voice: "The light shineth upon darkness, but the darkness comprehended it not."

The best Scriptural illustration made by Butterfield was when he was defending the constitutionality of the Shawneetown Bank. The Constitution of Illinois of 1818, provided that there should be no bank except the State Bank and its branches, and also the banks that were then in existence. The Shawneetown Bank was chartered before that time, but in 1835 its charter was extended. A writ of quo warranto was sued out against the bank, and in the argument it was contended by counsel who sued out the writ, that the extension of the charter was in fact the creation of a new bank. Butterfield was restive while this line of argument was being pursued, and he arose to reply with an expression of contempt upon his face. He said he would like to be informed by the gentlemen, if they had met with it in their reading, which he very much doubted, however, whether when the Lord lengthened out the life of Hezekiah fifteen years he had made a new man, or was he the same old Hezekiah!

Of Justin Butterfield, Jr., but little can be said. He came to Springfield in 1842, a young man of great promise, formed a partnership with B. S. Edwards, which continued about one year. He returned to Chicago on the dissolution of the co-partnership, and soon afterwards died.

U. F. Linder was a native of Kentucky, and born within ten miles of the place where Abraham Lincoln first saw the light of day. He came to Illinois in 1835, and settled in Coles county, but, like all other lawyers of that day, traveled the circuit. He was one of the most eminent lawyers of this Decade, and the party securing his legal services was fortunate indeed. As an orator he had few equals. He was quick in repartee, and few cared to encounter him in debate. He was withal a trifle vain, but just enough to spur him on to action.

Josiah Lamborn was one of the best lawyers that figured in the courts of Sangamon county.

Linder says of him: "Intellectually, I know no man of his day who was his superior. He was considered by all the lawyers who knew him as a man of the tersest logic. He could see the point in a case as clear as any man I ever knew, and could elucidate it as ably, never using a word too much or one too few. He was exceedingly happy in his conceptions, and always traveled the shortest route to reach his conclusions. He was a terror to his legal opponents, especially to those diffusive, wordy lawyers who had more words than arguments. I heard Judge Smith, of the Supreme Court, say that he knew of no lawyer who was his equal in strength and force of argument." Lamborn was a native of Kentucky, and received a liberal education. He possessed high social qualities, and his conversational powers were of the very highest order. As a prosecutor he was a terror to criminals. He was inclined to be vindictive, and very resentful of any slight offered him by an opposing attorney. On one occasion he was prosecuting a man for murder in Christian county. E. D. Baker was defending. In the course of the trial Lamborn asked Baker to yield some point. Baker refusing, he turned to him and said, "Baker, I'll hang your man." In his speech at the close of the testimony, Baker made one of his most powerful pleas, exciting the jury, spectators, and even the judge to tears. He closed with a brilliant peroration, such as he only could make. When he sat down it was about time to adjourn for supper, and Lamborn asked an adjournment until after supper, before beginning his closing speech for the prosecution. His request was granted. After supper he went to the sheriff and told him he only desired one candle to be placed in the court room, and that in a position that would place the jury in the shade. If the Judge said anything about the matter, the sheriff was to inform him that all was done at Lamborn's request. At the hour for court to convene the court room was filled to hear the prosecutor's speech. Lamborn, who was slightly lame, hobbled into the room, slowly and painfully, coughing meanwhile as if half gone with consumption, thus exciting the pity of both the jury and spectators. On the call to order he passed in front of the jury, who could but dimly witness his movements, and, placing his lame foot upon a chair, in a hollow sepulchre tone of voice said: "Whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed." He then stopped for some moments, while a cold chill passed over every individual in the audience. Slowly and painfully, apparently, he resumed his speech, taking up and reviewing the points in the case, and with so much effect that at its close the jury, after being out but a few moments, brought in a verdict of guilty, and the man was condemned to be hung.

Lamborn was once prosecuting an old and gray-haired man for stealing hogs. Stephen T. Logan was defending him, and made a powerful plea in his behalf, describing the accused as a man with hair blossoming for the eternal world, with one foot in the grave and the other tottering upon the brink. The illustration was so apt that it had a wonderful effect upon the jury which was quickly dispelled when Lamborn rose to reply. "Yes, gentlemen of the jury," said he, "his hair is whitening for that place which burns with liquid fire; one foot is in the grave, and the other is in his neighbor's hog pen."

Levi Davis came to Springfield in 1839 as Auditor of the State and served until 1841, when he commenced the practice of law, having been admitted to the Bar before his appointment as Auditor. He was a good lawyer, a fine business man, courteous and affable to all whom he met. He removed from here to Alton, where he now resides.

A. K. Smede was a young but highly educated man from Mississippi who practiced law here between 1843 and 1845. He never met with much success and returned to his native State.

David Logan, while a youth, came with his father to Springfield, here studied law and was admitted to the Bar in 1843. He was the son of Judge Logan and inherited many of the brilliant qualities of his father. He was a man of very superior talents. He practiced law in this circuit until 1847, when he went to Oregon where he took high rank as a criminal lawyer, obtaining a large and lucrative practice. It is related that after he had become well established in Oregon his father was desirous of his returning home, and as an inducement wrote him that if he would come he would take him into partnership. The young man answered the letter, thanking his father very kindly for his generous offer, and closed by inviting him to Oregon, and as an inducement offered to take him into partnership. In 1860 on the election of United States Senator, he secured the majority of the Republican members of the legislature in his interest, but the party not having a majority, the Republicans united with the Douglas Democrats and elected E. D. Baker, the Democrats of that wing feeling favorably disposed to Colonel Baker for his gallant defense of Broderick. Mr. Logan died in Oregon in 1874.

William I. Ferguson was a Pennsylvanian by birth, and came to Springfield when a mere child, afterwards studied law and was admitted to the Bar in 1843. He was a very brilliant young man, and a first-class forensic lawyer. After his admission to the Bar, he soon secured a good practice, and for some time held the office of attorney for the city of Springfield. About the year 1850 he went to Memphis, Tennessee, where he remained one year, and then returned to Springfield and resumed the practice of law. Becoming dissatisfied he emigrated to Texas in 1853, from which place he drifted on to California. In politics Mr. Ferguson was originally a Whig, and afterwards became a Democrat. In California he took an active part in politics and was elected to the State Senate, and was a candidate for the United States Senate in 1855, but failed of an election. In the exciting canvass growing out of the differences between the Administration and Stephen A. Douglas in 1858, Senator Broderick was the leader of the Douglas faction, and Mr. Ferguson was a staunch adherent and defender of Broderick and Douglas. In his defense of the latter he incurred the displeasure of a man named Johnson, who challenged him to fight a duel. The challenge was accepted and Ferguson was slain. Colonel Baker delivered a funeral oration over his dead body, which was only equalled, a few months later, by delivering the oration on the death of Senator Broderick, who fell in the same cowardly and disgraceful manner.

Archibald Williams, of Quincy, was frequently in attendance on the Springfield courts at this time, and his honest, homely features once seen were never forgotten. He was one of the most profound lawyers that ever practiced in the courts of the State. Linder, in his "Reminiscences of the Bar," has this to say of Williams:

"He was a member of the Illinois Legislature in 1836 and 1837, and of the same House with Lincoln, Douglas and myself. He was over six feet high, and as angular and ungainly in his form as Mr. Lincoln himself; and for homeliness of face and feature surpassed Mr. Lincoln. I think I never saw but one man uglier than Archie, and that was Patrick H. Darbey, of Kentucky, also a very great lawyer, who once had a brace of pistols presented to him by a traveler he met upon the road, both being on horseback, who suddenly stopped, and asked Darbey to stop also, and said to the latter gentleman: "Here is a brace of pistols which belong to you." "How do you make that out?" said Darbey. "They were given to me a long time ago by a stranger, who requested me to keep them until I met an uglier man than myself, and I have carried them for over twenty years; and I had begun to think they would go to my heirs when I died, but you are the rightful owner of the pistols. I give them to you as they were given to me, to be kept until you meet an uglier man than you are, and then you will present them to him; but you will die the owner of the property, for I am confident there is not an uglier man than you in the world, and the Lord did his everlasting best when he created you."

"Darbey accepted the pistols, and I never heard of them passing out of his hands. I know not what might have occurred had he and Archie Williams ever met. If there had been a jury trial of the right of property between them, I think it altogether likely it might have resulted in a 'hung jury.'

"Archie Williams sat near Mr. Lincoln in the southeast corner of the old State House in Vandalia, on his left, and I remember one day of a friend of mine asking me 'who in the world those two ugly men were.' Archie and Mr. Lincoln were great friends. I recollect Mr. Lincoln asking me on one occasion if I didn't think Archie Williams was one of the strongest-minded, clearest headed men in Illinois. I don't know what reply I made at the time, but I know Mr. Lincoln said that he thought him the strongest-minded and clearest headed man he ever saw."

Archie Williams has long since passed to his reward, but he has left a noble record, and one of which his descendants will always be proud. He made the race for Congress in 1854 as a Free Soil candidate, but failed of election. When Lincoln was elected, he appointed him one of the Federal Judges of Kansas.

O. H. Browning is another Quincy lawyer that was often seen before the courts of Sangamon County. He came to this State from Kentucky. As a lawyer and a statesman he obtained a high and enviable distinction. He was often employed in the largest cases before the Supreme Court of the State and the United States Courts. He was appointed to fill the vacancy in the United States Senate, caused by the death of Senator Douglas, and served as Secretary of the Interior under President Johnson.

William A. Minshall, of Schuyler county, first figures in this Bar in 1841. He was a very able lawyer and at one time was Judge of the Circuit of which Schuyler county formed a part. Linder says of him:

"Minshall, I believe, was a native of Ohio, and studied law with Judge McLean. In his early days he was given to dissipation. He courted a most beautiful woman, and on proposing marriage to her, she promptly rejected him, on the strength of which he got most gloriously drunk, and in his crazy mood put on seven clean shirts, and in that condition went over to see her again, letting her know that it was impossible for him to live without her. The young lady, being far from indifferent to the suit of Minshall, finally concluded that she would try and make a man of him, so she said to him: 'Mr. Minshall, I will never marry a drunkard, and if I had a husband and he should become one, I would leave him on the instant, if I loved him as I loved my life, but I have come to the conclusion I will marry you on one condition: If you will reform your habits, and give me satisfactory proof of the same, and make a solemn vow that you will never drink again. So, now, you go home and divest yourself of all those shirts but one, and come back in a month from now, and we will consummate this agreement.' Minshall gladly took her at her word, and after a month's probation he returned, took the vow, and they were married, and he religiously lived up to his pledge to the day of his death; and I know of no happier couple than they were in the whole circle of my acquaintance. He had a reputation of being one of the kindest."

Benjamin West came to Sangamon county in 1841, and settled in the village of Rochester. He was a man of fair talents, and was a good lawyer. In 1846 he was elected to the legislature, and died before the expiration of his term.

Israel Crosby figured here during this Decade, but did more in the real estate business than in law.

William Walker studied law, and was here admitted to the Bar. He soon afterwards went to Camden, and from thence to Havana, Mason county. From the latter place he emigrated to Missouri, where he was afterwards elected Circuit Judge. He was regarded as above the average in ability.

Elliott B. Herndon was born on Silver creek, Madison county, Illinois, in 1820. In company with his parents, he came to Sangamon county in the spring of 1821. His parents first settled about four miles northeast of Springfield, and in 1823 erected a cabin on the lot where Mr.

Herndon now resides, where they lived the remainder of their lives. Elliott B. read law in Springfield, and was admitted to the Bar in the winter of 1842-3, and was one of the three first young men admitted in the county. He at once commenced an active practice, which continued until 1868, when he retired, but resumed practice in 1873, continuing until 1878, when he permanently retired. Joseph Wallace, in a local paper issued February, 1880, thus speaks of Mr. Herndon:

"At present he belongs to the retired list of our barristers, and enjoys his otium cum dignitate; but still appears in court in special cases, and his opinion is often sought upon difficult and abstruse questions of law. He has always been recognized as the possessor of one of the soundest legal minds at our Bar, and if he had been prompted more by the spur of necessity, would have risen to yet higher rank as a lawyer.

"Though not a classical scholar, Mr. Herndon is a person of wide reading and multifarious knowledge. He is fond of philosophizing, that is, of penetrating beneath the surface of things to ascertain their hidden origin and bearing. To illustrate, he tells us that he read through Don Quixote three times; first, for the story or stories; secondly, for the humor and pathos; and, thirdly, for the deep philosophy and insight into human nature contained in that incomparable production. He is also an earnest admirer of Shakespeare's inimitable creations, but does not approve of the lengths to which some ingenious commentators go in searching after new and far-fetched interpretations to the text of that author, such as the great bard himself never dreamed of. Among his other acquirements, Mr. Herndon is no bad judge of horses and dogs, and he is (or at least affects to be) skilled in gardening and horticulture."

Politically, Mr. Herndon is a Democrat "of the strictest sect of our religion." For many years he was engaged in the promulgation of Democratic doctrines, both from the stump and through the press. From 1857 to 1860 he edited the Illinois State Democrat, J. J. Clarkson, proprietor, a paper started to contend for Democratic doctrine, "pure and undefiled," in opposition to what he regarded as heresies in the Douglas wing of that party.

Mr. Herndon has held several very important offices, both elective and appointed. He has served as City and County Attorney, United States Attorney for the Southern District of Illinois. In 1858 he was appointed Disbursing Agent by the General Government for Illinois.

In 1876 Mr. Herndon was married to Jerusha Palmer, in Springfield, Illinois. In the same article already quoted Mr. Wallace further speaks of Mr. Herndon:

"Physically and intellectually he is quite unlike his brother, William H.—the one inheriting the characteristics of the mother, while the other more nearly resembles the father. In person, Elliot B. is of medium height, broad shouldered and heavy set, with a tendency, of late years, to obesity. His cranium is massive and finely developed, and his face square rather than oval. His style of speaking is deliberate and sententious, his gestures few, and his voice keen and penetrating rather than ore rotundo.

"In manner or demeanor, he is not always the same, being subject to moods. Sometimes he is taciturn and morose; at other times talkative, jovial and full of anecdote, yet always more or less sarcastic. Upon the whole, he is a man of marked ability, of striking individuality, of pronounced likes and dislikes, and of sterling integrity—in a word, he is one whose place at the Bar and in general society, if once made vacant, could hardly be supplied."

FOURTH DECADE.

As Springfield and Sangamon county increased in population, and as the business before the Supreme Court of the State and the United States District Courts increased, the resident members of the Bar became more numerous. It will therefore be seen that between the years of 1851 and 1861, the distinctive local Bar was quite large. Many who had been following the Circuit had ceased their attendance, and only appeared before the courts here on special occasions. The greater number of those heretofore mentioned as making a residence in Springfield, yet remained at the beginning of this Decade, and few left during the time. The Bar was therefore a strong one. Among those who figured during this time whose names have not already been given are John A. McClelland, L. B. Adams, N. M. Broadwell, D. A. Brown, W. J. Black, W. J. Conkling, Primm & Gibson, J. E. Rosette, J. B. White, G. W. Shutt, Thomas Lewis, J. France, D. McWilliams, Charles W. Keyes, Shelby M. Cullom, L. Rosette, A. McWilliams, J. R. Thompson, Charles S. Zane, William Campbell, J. D. Bail, G. W. Besore, Christopher C. Brown, John E. Denny, Milton Hay, L. F. McCrillis, J. W. Moffett, Charles B. Brown, S. C. Gibson, T. S. Mather, J. R. Mather, H. G. Reynolds, E. L. Gross, L. C. Boynton, A. B. Ives, C. M. Morrison, Joseph Wallace, Speed Butler, E. F. Leonard, William Prescott.

Among the number comprising the Bar of this Decade will be noticed the names of some who have since become distinguished as statesmen and others whose names have become so familiar to every reader of history as among the brave men who responded to their country's call when traitors sought to destroy the Union, and who became as adept in the art of war as in the intricacies of the law. Sangamon County furnished the Commander-in-Chief of all the armies, one of whom the Bar of the county may well be proud, one of its brightest ornaments, the great and noble Abraham Lincoln. From the Bar of Sangamon County went General John A. McClelland, a brave and skillful General who rose to the rank of a Division Commander, Colonel James H. Matheny, Colonel L. F. McCrillis and others. Of the Bar of this period much can be said and only that which is good.

Thomas Lewis,—everybody that lived in Springfield during this Decade knew Tom,—was a character in his way. Originally a shoemaker by trade, he accumulated some money, engaged in banking, and then studied law; was admitted to the Bar, and practiced for a time, though he secured but little business. To crown all he became a newspaper man and was editor and publisher of the Illinois Atlas until its incorporation with the Political Crisis, in 1871. He now resides in Cairo.

J. France was a man well advanced in years when he came to Springfield. He was a fair lawyer and had a good practice for a time.

D. McWilliams was a young man and had been admitted to the Bar but a short time when he came here. He succeeded in securing a fair practice, but after a time he left and is now residing in Piatt, and is one of the leading members of the Bar of that county.

A. McWilliams, came here from Bloomington where he was regarded as a very talented lawyer, and had fine success in all his professional engagements. The same success attended him here, and had it not been for an unfortunate temper he would have left a highly honorable and proud record. He was States Attorney one term. He died in 1862, near St. Louis.

C. M. Morrison was one of the most talented young men that have practiced in the court of Sangamon County. He was from Kentucky and came to Springfield about 1856. He very soon secured a lucrative practice and was for several years Prosecuting Attorney for this district. As a prosecutor he had few superiors. He had a frail body but a strong mind. He died in the prime of life.

William Prescott was from Wales, read law in Springfield and was admitted to the Bar about 1860. When the war broke out he laid down his law books and took up the sword. He served as Captain in one of the companies of the 130th regiment. While in the service, he was captured and held a prisoner of war for fourteen months. On his return to this county he was elected County Judge and was the immediate predecessor of Judge Matheny. He removed to Chicago about 1879.

L. F. McCrillis came to this county from Calhoun. While a resident of the latter county he served a term in the legislature. He was regarded as a good lawyer. On the breaking out of the war he offered his services to the Governor and was commissioned Colonel of one of the Illinois regiments, and served with credit in the defense of his country. After the war closed he returned to Springfield and shortly after made a business trip to Washington, and while in that city he died very suddenly.

H. G. Reynolds was better known as a Mason than an attorney. He was for some years publisher of the Masonic Trowel, an account of which is given under the head of "The Press."

A. W. Hayes was here but a short time, and obtained no special standing as an attorney. He now resides in Kansas.

S. S. Whitehurst was a fair lawyer and a good business man. He was clerk of the Circuit Court for some years. He is now dead.

Lawrence Weldon was a good lawyer, and was from Bloomington.

L. M. Phillips came from Southern Illinois, and remained but a few years, and then returned to his old home. He was a fair lawyer, and secured a good practice while here.

C. D. Harvey was a good bankrupt lawyer, and had a good practice in the bankrupt courts. He only remained a short time, when he removed to California, and now resides there.

Primm & Gibson were young and vigorous men, who turned their attention principally to the land business. They are both now dead.

William Campbell was Irish by birth, inheriting the social qualities of that fun-loving race. He was strong before a jury, having the natural eloquence of the Irish. He died some years ago.

J. D. Bail was more of a poet than a lawyer, and in the profession was scarcely known.

FIFTH DECADE.

Whatever may be said of the Bar of Sangamon county, it cannot be said that it has ever deteriorated. It has always maintained a high standard of excellence. While it may be true that through political influence some of those of one Decade may have become more noted, yet as regards standing before the courts, it will be seen no comparison can be made that would detract from the good name of either. The Fifth Decade, embracing the years 1861 to 1871, shows a list of names alike creditable to the period and to the excellent standing of the Sangamon County Bar.

Some of the familiar names of the previous Decade have disappeared, of which it might be said that some bearing them have removed to other points, some have retired from active practice, while others still are now practicing before a higher court and before the Bar of Almighty God. Among the new members of the Bar of Sangamon county during this Decade were William M. Springer, J. K. W. Bradley, W. P. Olden, A. N. J. Crook, James E. Dowling, A. W. Hayes, Richard Wolcott, L. H.

Bradley, J. A. Chesnut, J. C. Crowley, William Fowler, James M. Mason, James W. Patton, Lawrence Weldon, L. M. Phillips, George C. Marcy, William E. Shutt, A. Orendorff.

SIXTH DECADE.

During this Decade the Bar of Sangamon County was increased in number by the following named: D. T. Littler, J. A. Kennedy, L. F. Hamilton, James C. Robinson, A. L. Knapp, Bernard Stuve, Bluford Wilson, Loren Hasson, Robert Allen, Thomas C. Austin, John F. Barrow, S. D. Scholes, W. P. Emery, Charles H. Rice, Charles D. Harvey, Robert H. Hazlett, Robert L. McGuire, John M. Palmer, John Mayo Palmer, Alonzo W. Wood, Charles W. Brown, Clinton L. Conkling, Enoch Harpole, W. L. Gross, E. D. Matheny, J. C. Lanphier, Henry H. Rogers, George A. Sanders, J. C. Snigg, Ezra W. White, Charles P. Kane, Henry Kane.

SEVENTH DECADE.

The year 1881 is the beginning of the Seventh Decade, and only of this year can anything be said as a matter of history, of the Bar of Sangamon. The following named firms now constitute the resident Bar of the county: L. B. Adams, John F. Barrow, Bradley & Bradley, N. M. Broadwell, Frank W. Burnett, James C. Conkling, W. J. Conkling, Collins & Sprague, A. N. J. Crook, J. E. Dowling, Ninian W. Edwards, W. P. Emery, Joseph A. Gill, H. S. Greene, Gross & Conkling, John H. Gunn, Milton Hay, Ralph W. Haynes, Hazlett & Kane, Herndon & Colby, W. F. Houston, Frank H. Jones, James A. Kennedy, J. R. H. King, David T. Littler, Webber E. Loomis, Jas. H. Matheny, Jas. H. Matheny, Jr., McClelland & Keyes, McGuire, Hamilton & Salzenstein, Murray & Turner, Orendorff & Creighton, Palmers, Robinson & Shutt, Patton & Lanphier, Rice & Trapp, Robertson & Maxwell, John E. Rosette, Louis Rosette, Sanders & Williams, Scholes & Mather, J. B. Scott, Fred E. Smith, John C. Snigg, Sterling & Grout, H. A. Stevens, Stuart, Edwards & Brown, T. J. Thompson, William A. Vincent, La Rue Vredenburg, Joseph Wallace, E. W. White, Bluford Wilson, Wines & Wickersham, Richmond Wolcott, Rogers & Kane.

In reviewing the history of the Bar of to-day, it must be born in mind that the historian is speaking of those who are yet living and in active practice, and therefore he labors under an embarrassment that does not exist when writing of parties that have passed away. Words of praise, by envious ones, are apt to be construed into words of flattery, for which reason many things are left unsaid which are rightfully due the parties of whom the historian is writing. In the following sketches care has been taken against such use of terms as will lead to even a thought of flattery, or stating an untruth, with the idea that it will please the one of whom it is written, even if it does not offend others. But whatever is written is the opinion of the historian, who reserves the right to speak as he may think best of each individual. The members are introduced in chronological order, as they appeared at the courts, so far as it is really known.

John T. Stuart, the senior member of the firm of Stuart, Edwards & Brown, was born November 10, 1807, in Fayette county, about seven miles east of Lexington, Kentucky. He comes of good old Scotch-Irish stock and has inherited many of the peculiarities and fine qualities of that hardy race. Robert Stuart, the father of the subject of this sketch was born in Rockbridge county, Virginia, and early in life adopted the profession of the Christian ministry. He removed from Virginia to Lexington, Kentucky, and became a professor of languages in Transylvania University. While a professor in this institution, he was there married to Hannah Todd, daughter of General Levi Todd.

During the earlier years of his life John T. Stuart remained with his parents upon a farm, attending the common schools in winter and assisting his parents in the summer in cultivating the soil. While yet young he entered Centre College, at Danville, Kentucky, pursuing a regular classical course, and graduating from that institution when but nineteen years of age. Immediately upon graduating, Mr. Stuart entered the law office of Judge Breck, in Richmond, Kentucky, and for two years pursued his studies under that eminent barrister. Having heard much of the "beautiful country of the Sangamo," and having relatives living in that favored region, he determined to emigrate there. Starting on horseback, he first made his way to Frankfort, Kentucky, and by the Supreme Court of that State was licensed as an "Attorney and Counselor at Law." In ten days he arrived in Springfield, weary and worn. A heavy rain had fallen the morning of his arrival which had given to the houses of the village, which were generally of logs daubed with mud, a dreary look, making him feel a little blue. His mind reverted to the pleasant home which he had left, surrounded by all the comforts of a civilized life, and he could but wonder what the future would have in store for him, and whether the joys of the future would compensate for the pleasures left behind.

At this time Mr. Stuart had barely attained his majority, and in looks and actions had retained much of the boy about him. He was kindly received by the generous, open-hearted people, then living in Springfield, but he tells a good story upon himself which goes to show man's judgment is not always infallible. Billy Fagin, a shrewd, witty Irishman, as all Irishmen are, met him a few days after his arrival, and as common in that day, began to question him as to his past and future. He was asked where he was from, what he was here for, and what were his expectations. The questions were all answered as well as possible, considering the surprise manifested at being thus quizzed by an entire stranger. "Now," says Mr. Fagin, "would you like to know my opinion of you?" Mr. Stuart replied that he would not object to knowing it. "Well," says he, "it is my opinion you may be a pretty fine man, but you stand a mighty poor show of meeting with success as a lawyer." Mr. Stuart laughed, but said nothing in reply.

The attorneys Mr. Stuart found at the Bar on his arrival, were James Adams, Thomas M. Neale, James Strode, Thomas Moffett and Jonathan H. Pugh, men of mark then, but all of whom have since died and have almost been forgotten, they being overshadowed by that brilliant galaxy of lawyers that came a few years after.

Hon. Joseph Gillespie was asked to give his opinion of Mr. Stuart as an attorney. The following was his reply:

"Colonel John T. Stuart may be emphatically denominated the Nestor of the Bar of Springfield, Illinois, a body of men without superiors, if equals, in any State in the Union. We believe there is but one man now living in Illinois, who ante-dates him as a practitioner, and that man is William Thomas, of Jacksonville. John T. Stuart is a native of Kentucky, from whence he emigrated to Illinois in 1828, and located in the future capital. After the manner of the Kentucky school, he was thoroughly grounded in the history and elementary principles of the law, whereby he was enabled to elucidate and apply it to the cases which might arise on the circuit, with the aid of such authorities as one could carry in his head and saddle-bags. John T. Stuart is pre-eminently a man of reason, and if he be tried by the maxim, 'By their works shall ye know them,' he will come out all right. He was the tutor of one of the greatest men who ever lived, Abraham Lincoln, who imbibed his precepts, principles and methods. An important part of Lincoln's great character was the work of John T. Stuart. The leading traits of the subject may be summed up in the attributes of sterling integrity, great forecast, and strong will. In the management of professional business, he seeks first to understand his own side of the case, and next to penetrate the designs of his adversary, in which he never fails. He keeps his own batteries effectually masked, while those of the opposite side are closely scrutinized. He knows their calibre and position completely. It was this quality which made him so eminently successful as a politician. Such was his adroitness and sagacity that his adversaries could never comprehend how he could obtain a knowledge of their plans; therefore they dubbed him "Jerry Sly." No one, however, ever suspected him of even the slightest breach of faith or dishonorable dealing. He was fastidiously sincere in all his professions and engagements. There was no trouble in discerning the attitude of John T. Stuart, but in regard to his plans, either political or professional, he was perfectly inscrutable. Whatever you had a right to know he would communicate with the greatest cheerfulness; but whatever he had a right to conceal, no man could find out. Stuart always believed in the efficacy of labor, and worked his cases well. He was eminently conscientious with his clients, and never allowed them, if he could prevent it, to go to law for a profitable wrong or an unprofitable right. He has done more than any other man in the State to discourage frivolous litigation. He has always taken a great interest in assisting young men, aiding them by his counsel in the management of their cases, and by inspiring them with confidence and laudable ambition. His veneration for the profession of the law is very great, and anything like unworthy conduct, tending to lower it in the estimation of honorable men, calls out his prompt and decided animadversion. There is not a particle of envy in his composition. He deals out equal and impartial justice to all men. He scorns everything like ostentation or display, and desires to gain his cases upon their merits, and not otherwise.

His character for honesty and fair dealing gave him a power few hold upon courts and juries, and made him almost invincible. He has passed now into the sere and yellow leaf, and, of course, seldom engages in the active duties of the profession; but his old clients and friends cannot be induced to dispense with his counsel and advice, and he has not yet been permitted to doff the harness he has so long and honorably worn. It would, perhaps, be enough to establish the fame of John T. Stuart upon a solid and enduring basis, to say, as can be truthfully said of him, that throughout all those long years he practiced with and was the recognized peer of such men as Stephen T. Logan, Abraham Lincoln, Milton Hay, John M. Palmer, and a host of others whose lives will adorn the pages of our judicial history so long as talent and worth shall be appreciated."

In politics, Mr. Stuart is a disciple of Henry Clay, and therefore a Whig of the old school. He loved the old Whig party as he loved his life, and has scarcely yet realized that the party is dead. In 1832, when but twenty-five years of age, he was elected for the first time a member of the legislature, and re-elected in 1834. In the House he made a useful member, ever at his post, and ever looking forward to advance the interests of his constituents. In those days the question of internal improvements was the leading issue before the people, and Mr. Stuart strongly advocated every measure, that in his opinion, would tend to develop the industries of the country. It may be well to remark here, that in these views Mr. Stuart has always been consistent, there hardly being a measure proposed for the advancement of public interests but what has found in him a strong advocate. More enterprises of a public character will be found in which he has figured than any other man in the county.

In 1836, Mr. Stuart was nominated by his party for Representative in Congress, and made the race against William L. May, of Springfield. In this race Mr. Stuart was beaten, as he really expected to be, he making the race with a view of solidifying his party, which was in a large minority in the district, and doubtless with the hope that it would benefit him in future campaigns. In 1838, he was again nominated in opposition to Stephen A. Douglas, who was even then developing the powers which afterwards made him so famous, and the leader of a great party. In this campaign Mr. Stuart was successful, and therefore became a member of the Twenty-fifth Congress. In 1840, he was again a candidate, and again elected. In Congress, Mr. Stuart made no special effort to become prominent, being content to be recognized as one of the working members of that body, but that he was not without influence is illustrated in the fact that he secured the passage of an appropriation for a harbor at Chicago, the first appropriation, it is thought, ever passed for that purpose. The member from Detroit, Michigan, and Mr. Stuart were the only western members securing an appropriation that session.

In 1842, Mr. Stuart declined a re-election to Congress and again resumed the active practice of law; but in 1848, he was prevailed upon to accept the nomination for State Senator in the district composed of the counties of Sangamon, Mason and Menard. He served the term of four years for which he was elected, with marked ability, but from that time until 1862 he was virtually out of politics, though a firm supporter of Millard Fillmore, in 1856, and John Bell, in 1860, for the Presidency. Fillmore and Bell were both old Whigs, and while representing other parties and running upon other issues, he yet believed them to be sufficiently imbued with the Whig leaven as to merit his earnest support.

Mr. Stuart is by nature a conservative man and a believer in the Constitution of our fathers. While being progressive in matters affecting business interests, in political affairs he has been favorable to no change that would violently affect the convictions of a lifetime. During the dark days of the war, it was always his earnest hope that President Lincoln would pursue a conservative course. He believed in subduing the rebellion, and in a vigorous prosecution of the war, but desired nothing should be done by the Union authorities that would disarrange the existing order of things—the war must be carried on in a Constitutional way; that institution must be kept inviolate by all who had sworn to protect it. In 1862, Mr. Stuart announced himself a candidate for Congress in a circular addressed "To the Voters of the Eighth Congressional District," in the following terms:

"FELLOW CITIZENS: I announce myself a candidate to represent you in the next Congress. If any apology is needed for my mode of doing so, I offer it in the following facts: My political life dates back to a time anterior to party conventions, to a time when it was the practice of myself and others to come before you for your suffrages self-nominated. I am only doing now what I have repeatedly done before, when I announced myself a candidate for your suffrages, three times for Congress and as often for the legislature. Again, I ever, during its existence, belonged to the Whig party. Since the dissolution of that party, I have attached myself to no other; I, therefore, can appeal to no party convention, and nothing is left to me but to declare myself a candidate independent of any party organization, and free to serve my country in such manner as duty to her interests may dictate. Frankness further requires me to say, that I become a candidate not because any friends have pressed me to do so, but because my own inclinations have so prompted, stimulated by the hope that the contingency has now arisen, or soon will arise, when I may be of service to our beloved country in her hour of trial, and aid in preserving that glorious Union which our fathers formed. I aim thus to discharge the obligations which I owe to the country, in the circumstances in which it is placed. Whether you will consider it to be your duty to vote for or against me, is a question for you to decide. Your confidence would be a source of great gratification to me.

"I am for 'the Union, the Constitution and the enforcement of the laws.' This creed expresses my views in the briefest manner. It is appropriate to the circumstances of the country. I believe in it as a whole, and in every part, without qualification or condition, and to it I pledge myself with every faculty of my nature. I believe the Union which our fathers formed was designed by them to be perpetual. It owes its origin to a patriotism, statesmanship and wise forecast, of which the world furnishes few, if any, parallels; it has been most beneficent in its results; it has secured to us, as a nation, in a most remarkable degree, the blessings of civil liberty, domestic tranquility and safety from foreign aggression. In that Union has been our strength. The advantages flowing from that Union, coupled with our great natural gifts, has secured to us a growth, as a nation, without a parallel in the history of the world. With this Union preserved we might hope to transmit all these blessings and continued prosperity, to the remotest generations of our posterity. With the Union dissevered our hopes can linger on no such glorious vision. After so sad a catastrophe the future presents our once united and happy country, divided into two, perhaps many parts, discordant, warring, drenched in fraternal blood, and finally seeking the strong arm of the despot to save her from anarchy. Such has been the fate of other republics. God grant that such may not be ours, or that of our children.

Need I add that I regard it to be my duty, as it is that of every other citizen, to maintain and preserve it. How is that Union to be maintained and preserved? I answer, by the use, if necessary, of all the ample powers vested by the Constitution in the General Government. Our Union is based upon a written Constitution, embodying the contract by which the people formed a perpetual Union and erected a government limited in power as to the subject matter for its exercise, but supreme wherever given. It is only by virtue of that Constitution that the General Government can claim and enforce the obedience of all the parts and sections of the Union, to such laws and acts as are made and done in pursuance of that Constitution. These powers are ample, if wisely used. Indeed, we have a strong government. That Constitution provides no mode of dissolving the Union. It has no sanction for secession. When, therefore, the people of the South make the effort, by force, to free themselves from the obligations which they owe under the Constitution to the Union, they become rebels and traitors, seeking by revolution to destroy the Union, and it is the right and becomes the duty of the General Government, to put down that rebellion and stay that revolution by the use, for that purpose, of all its constitutional powers. Were it to resort to any other powers, or to means outside of the Constitution, the Government would itself inaugurate a revolution. The Southern revolution threatens us with anarchy; such a revolution by the Government, would lead to a military despotism. I refrain from the discussion of past questions, the tendency of which would be to irritate, and shed no light upon any future duty.

"Whatever may have been our differences of opinion upon such past questions, the one great question which now presses upon us ought to admit of no differences of opinion. In the deadly struggle now existing between the Government and armed rebellion there can be no other alternative left to all such as would preserve the Union, maintain the Constitution, and enforce the laws, but to fight it out to the bitter end—fight, not to gratify a long pent-up hatred and desire for revenge—fight, not as a means of accomplishing some object which cannot be done under the Constitution, but fight to conquer a peace—such a peace as will preserve the integrity of the Union and the majesty of the Constitution and the law—such a peace as will degrade no section of the Union.

"In conclusion, therefore, if I should become your representative, I would feel it to be my duty, so far as that position would give me the power, to place at the disposal of the Executive, all the resources of the Government, required to enable him to exercise his constitutional powers and perform his duty under the Constitution, or to add to the comfort or efficiency of our gallant soldiers while fighting the battles of the Union.

"One thing further I would add, not necessary, perhaps, in this connection, but I wish to say it, and the occasion is at least not unfit. Mr. Lincoln and myself, as most of you know, have been closely connected for more than a quarter of a century, by many ties, the recollection of which is very dear to me. Difference in political opinion since 1856, has in no wise diminished my respect for the man, or the unbounded confidence I have ever had in his personal integrity. I believe he entertains an ardent desire, and is struggling to preserve the Union and Constitution as our fathers made them; and, as a matter of feeling, as well as duty, I would rather aid than embarrass him in all such efforts. If my voice could now reach his ear, I would be glad to say to him: Follow the dictates of your own clear head and patriotic heart, and preserve the Union by the ample powers conferred upon you by the Constitution, and repulse from you any faction, if such there be, which would good you into a resort to revolutionary means; and for a Union and a Constitution so preserved, history will erect monuments for you by the side of Washington. Your obedient servant,

"AUGUST 30, 1862."

Mr. Stuart was triumphantly elected, receiving the entire Democratic vote, and that of hundreds of Republicans. In Sangamon county, where he was personally known by every voter, he ran far ahead of his ticket. The people believed in him, trusted in him. In Congress he endeavored to act faithfully to his convictions. The Emancipation Proclamation of President Lincoln he opposed, for the reason he believed it unnecessary, and the objects for which it was issued could more readily be attained in other ways. It is due to him to say that he now believes that "all was for the best."

In 1864, Mr. Stuart received the Democratic nomination for Congress, but was defeated by Shelby M. Cullom. From that time he has ceased to take an active part in political life.

It may truly be said of him that he never was a politician in the commonly accepted definition of the term. Politics with him is the science of government, and in his entire political career he has endeavored to act for the interests of the people rather than that of party.

As already stated, Mr. Stuart has always taken an active part in all matters of public interest. No man in Sangamon county is entitled to more credit for the excellent railroad system of this county. He has been prominently identified with each, and has served as President of one or more, Director and Attorney of several of them. In 1866, he was elected President of the Springfield City Railway Company, President of the Springfield Watch Company and President of the Bettie Stuart Board of Trustees. He was one of the three Commissioners for building of the new State House. As Chairman of the Executive Committee of the National Lincoln Monument Association, it devolved upon him to do more than any other one man in superintending the erection of that monument to the memory of his life-long friend, Abraham Lincoln.

In educational matters Mr. Stuart has likewise been prominently identified. The old Illinois State University, the predecessor of the German Lutheran Concordia College, took much of his time, and in the Bettie Stuart Institute he has ever felt great interest.

John T. Stuart and Mary V. Nash, a daughter of General Frank Nash, and niece of Judge Lockwood, were united in marriage at Jacksonville, Illinois, October 25, 1897. The union has been a happy one. Six children were born unto them—Bettie, afterwards the wife of C. C. Brown, and for whom the Bettie Stuart Institute is named, since deceased; John T., Frank N., Virginia L., Hannah and Robert.

Socially, there is nothing to be said of Mr. Stuart but what is good. As a husband and father, he is kind and affectionate; as a neighbor, he is friendly and accommodating; as a citizen, he is public spirited and helpful. The poor in him have always found a friend, the cry of distress from the unfortunate always touches his heart, and he is ever ready to hearken unto their cry and minister to their wants. The young love him; the middle aged trust him; the old lean upon him as a friend; and all trust him. The golden rule has always been the rule of his life. He has shown his love to God by his love of his fellow-man. John T. Stuart is a grand, good man, and when called upon by the Judge of the Universe to a higher court, his place here will remain vacant; it cannot be filled and he will not be forgotten.

Samuel H. Treat, Judge of the United States Court for the Southern District of Illinois, is a native of Otsego county, New York, and was born in 1812. He read law and was admitted to practice in his native State; came to Illinois and settled in Springfield in 1834, and has been a resident of the city ever since. In 1838 he was appointed Circuit Judge, and filled the office until 1841. He was then elected Judge of the Supreme Court of Illinois, serving till 1855, when he was chosen to the Bench of the United States District Court, which position he has filled with distinguished ability for more than a quarter of a century. Judge Treat is admirably adapted, both by nature and education, for the bench, and has few equals in the judiciary of this country.

Benjamin S. Edwards, for forty years an honored member of the Sangamon County Bar, is the youngest son of Hon. Ninian Edwards, the first Governor of the Territory of Illinois, afterwards United States Senator and Governor of the State, was born June 3, 1818, in Edwardsville, Madison county, Illinois. He graduated from Yale College in the class of 1838, studied law at the law school connected with that college, in 1839, completed his preparatory studies for the profession with Hon. Stephen T. Logan, deceased, of Springfield, and began practicing in March, 1840, with such competitors as Abraham Lincoln, Stephen A. Douglas, S. T. Logan, E. D. Baker, Jesse B. Thomas, Mr. McDougal, Mr. Lamborn, and other legal lights. In 1843, Mr. Edwards entered into partnership with Hon. John T. Stuart, in Springfield, which still exists, having continued thirty-eight years. He has studiously and zealously applied himself to the profession, paying little attention to politics. He was chosen a member of the Constitutional Convention in 1862, representing Sangamon county. He was, without his knowledge or consent, nominated for Congress on the Democratic ticket, in 1868, and greatly reduced the ordinary Republican majority, though opposed to Governor Cullom in the contest. At the solicitation of the Bar and the people, Mr. Edwards became a candidate for Judge of the Circuit Court, in 1869; was elected, and discharged the judicial duties with satisfaction to lawyers and litigants. When the circuit was enlarged, Judge Edwards retired from the bench, and has since devoted himself entirely to legal labors. Judge Edwards honors the profession he has faithfully represented, for more than forty years, and has won an enviable reputation, both as a superior lawyer and a thorough gentleman.

James C. Conkling was born in New York City, October 13, 1816. At the age of thirteen, he entered the academy at Morristown, New Jersey, and prepared for college. He entered Princeton in 1833, and graduated in 1835. He then entered the law office of Henry A. Ford, and read law for three years. In the fall of 1838, he came to Springfield, Illinois, was licensed by the Supreme Court of the State the following winter, and at once commenced the practice of law. Soon thereafter he formed a partnership with Cyrus A. Walker, then one of the leading attorneys of the State, and who, though living at Macomb, in McDonough county, practiced in the courts of Springfield. This arrangement continued for about two years, when he formed a partnership with General James A. Shields, of Mexican war fame, and who subsequently, at intervals, represented three States in the United States Senate.

In 1845 Mr. Conkling was elected Mayor of Springfield and served one term. In 1851 he was elected a member of the House of Representatives of the General Assembly of the State, and again in 1866. His object in accepting the nomination was for the purpose of securing an appropriation for the building of a new State House, and by that means forever to secure Springfield as the permanent seat of government of the State. It will be remembered that at this time the question of removal was being agitated by the press and people throughout the State. Peoria, Bloomington, Decatur, Chicago and other places were anxious to secure its location. A new State House had become an absolute necessity, the old having become too small for the proper transaction of business of the State. At the session of the legislature, in the winter of 1866-67, Mr. Conkling was made a member of the committee on public buildings, and also chairman of the Judiciary committee. As a member of the former he drew a bill for an appropriation, which after considerable delay was reported to the House. Here the fight raged furiously between friends and opponents of the measure. Several days were spent in discussion, and while one of the opponents of the measure, who had been selected to close the debate, was making his speech, Mr. Conkling learned the bill had no enacting clause, the engrossing clerk having left it off the bill as presented. Calling Isaac Keys, Mr. Conkling proceeded to the office of the engrossing clerk and compelled him to restore the enacting clause, and supply words that had been omitted or changed from the original bill. Returning to the House with the true copy, it was given to the clerk and the vote taken. A majority of two votes was obtained for the bill. Mr. Conkling deserves great credit for his efforts in this connection. He had to fight against great odds. Leading men in Springfield who had been working for months to the same end, before the bill was put upon its passage, became discouraged and abandoned the field.

In 1863 Mr. Conkling was appointed by Governor Yates, State Agent to settle the claims of the State against the general government for equipments furnished volunteers. The duty was performed to the satisfaction of the State.

As a lawyer, Mr. Conkling ranks among the ablest. He is regarded by many as the most eloquent member of the Bar at the present time, and some of his oratorical efforts are considered equal to any of the productions of Edward Everett.

James C. Conkling and Mercy A. Lovering were united in marriage September 21, 1841, in Baltimore, Maryland. Five children were born unto them—Clinton L., Charles, James, Annie V., and Alice.

James C. Conkling is a man of great enterprise and business activity. He has used much of his wealth in building enterprises and for the encouragement of manufactures. He is a member of the Second Presbyterian Church of Springfield, and for many years has been a ruling elder in that body.

James H. Matheny, the present County Judge was born in St. Clair county, Illinois, October 30, 1818. In the spring of 1821 he was brought by his parents, Charles R., and Jemima Matheny, to Springfield, where he has since continued to reside. He now lays claim to be the oldest living resident of the city. Judge Matheny's life has been an active one. At fifteen years of age he was employed as clerk in the Post-office and the Recorder's office, transacting the entire business of each, and probably having a little leisure to engage in such sports as were common to the youths of that age. It is well known that he enjoyed a little fun when a boy, and now that time has sprinkled his hair with gray he still enjoys a good joke. In 1839 he was appointed Deputy Clerk of the Supreme Court and served for a time. In 1841 he entered the office of Baker & Bledsoe as a law student, and for two years pursued his studies, being admitted to the Bar in 1843. Instead of seeking a country where he was not known, he "hung out his shingle" in Springfield, where he was raised and where he was known by almost every one. He soon secured a good practice, and from that time to the present, he has never lacked for clients. As a jury-lawyer, he ranks high, and has been retained in many of the most prominent cases before the courts of Sangamon and adjoining counties. He is an effective speaker, with power to move a jury at will. His perceptive faculties are large, and he can quickly grasp a point or penetrate the aims of an adversary.

In 1845 he was united in marriage with Maria L. Lee, and by her had seven children—Lee, Edward Dow, Lucy, Nora, James H., Jr., Ralph C., and Robert W.

Judge Matheny has held many important public positions, and has always discharged his trusts in a faithful manner. In addition to those already mentioned, he was a member of the Constitutional Convention of 1848, and was elected Clerk of the Circuit Court, in 1852, and served one term of four years. During the war he was commissioned Lieutenant Colonel of the 130th Regiment Illinois Infantry. After the capture of Vicksburg he was on detached duty, holding military courts until 1864, when his regiment was consolidated with another, and he resigned. In November, 1873, he was elected Judge of the County Court of Sangamon County, and re-elected in 1877, without opposition.

In the "good old days of the Whig party" Judge Matheny was an earnest defender of its principles, his first Presidential vote being given for William Henry Harrison in the campaign of 1840. During that campaign, in company with nine other young men, he made a trip to Nashville, Tennessee, to hear Henry Clay speak. This journey required about five weeks, as the party went in their own private conveyance and camped out of nights. On the dissolution of the Whig party, Judge Matheny acted for a short time with the American and Republican parties, but on account of the conservative tendency of his mind, he finally drifted into the Democratic ranks, and usually votes that ticket. He is not a modern politician by any means, and never has antagonized the better element of opposing parties. When running for office, he invariably leads his ticket, in consequence of personal popularity, and for the reason he does not antagonize.

In the meetings of the Old Settlers' Society he has always taken a deep interest, and was selected to make the first annual address. This address will be found elsewhere in this work. For several years he has held the position of Secretary of the Society, and no man would be missed more in its meetings.

William H. Herndon was born in Greensburg, Kentucky, December 25, 1818, and came to Illinois in 1820, and Sangamon County in 1821, in company with his parents. The schools of Springfield he attended, as the opportunity offered, until 1836, when he entered Illinois College, at Jacksonville, but only attended one year, being removed by his father in consequence of the Abolition excitement then pending, and which resulted in the death of Lovejoy, at Alton. The elder Herndon was inclined to be pro-slavery in his views, and did not care to have his son have Abolition sentiments instilled in his mind by the professors in the Jacksonville institution. It is probable, judging from later events, that the removal was accomplished when it was too late. After his removal from the college, he clerked in a store for several years, and in 1842 entered the law office of Lincoln & Logan, where he read two years and was admitted to the Bar in 1844. The partnership of Lincoln & Logan now being dissolved, Mr. Lincoln and Mr. Herndon became partners, a relation which was never formally dissolved, and which existed until the death of Mr. Lincoln, though other temporary arrangements were effected by Mr. Herndon after Mr. Lincoln entered upon the duties of the Presidency. The first arrangement was a partnership with Chas. S. Zane, which continued until Mr. Zane's elevation to the Bench, when a partnership was entered into with A. Orendorff, which continued until Mr. Herndon's removal to the country in March, 1867. Before he left the city, he wrote and delivered four lectures on the character and life of Abraham Lincoln.

Mr. Herndon has always been a great reader, and the questions of political economy and the science of mind have ever been with him favorite studies. The science of law has also been an interesting study to him. He always desires to go to the bottom of every subject, and wishes to reach it the quickest way possible. The little quibbles of the shyster disgusts him, and the red tapeism of the law affords him no pleasure.

In the days of the old Whig party, Mr. Herndon was an advocate of its principles, and the "hard cider campaign" of 1840, was the first in which he participated. He was always an opponent of slavery, and on the organization of the Republican party he became one of its strongest advocates.

Mr. Herndon has never been an office-seeker, and the public positions that he has held have come to him unsought. He has held the offices of City Attorney, Mayor of Springfield, Bank Commissioner for the State, under Governors Bissell, Yates and Oglesby, besides other minor offices.

William H. Herndon and Mary J. Maxey was married in Sangamon County March 26, 1840. They have had six children. Mrs. Herndon died August 18, 1860, and Mr. Herndon was married July 31, 1861, to Anna Miles, by whom he has had two children.

Personally, Mr. Herndon has the good will of everyone with whom he is acquainted. In his life he endeavors to follow the golden rule.

Norman M. Broadwell, attorney-at-law, was born in Morgan county, Illinois, in 1825. Baxter Broadwell, his father, and Mary Lindley, both New Jersey people by birth, married near Cincinnati, Ohio, and were among the first settlers in Morgan county, where they died a number of years ago. Judge Broadwell received his chief literary education in his native county; came to Springfield and commenced reading law with Abraham Lincoln and William H. Herndon, in 1851, and was admitted near the close of the same year. He had begun the study of medicine and continued it some months previously, but not liking it, abandoned the idea. Upon being admitted to the Bar, Mr. Broadwell at once entered upon practice, which he has zealously and successfully prosecuted, with but slight interruptions, nearly a third of a century. He has had several law partners during these years, among them such eminent attorneys as Governor S. M. Cullom, General John A. McClernand and Hon. William M. Springer. The first cause he ever tried in a court of record, Abraham Lincoln was opposed to him as counsel, and the last cause Mr. Lincoln ever tried in the Springfield courts, Mr. Broadwell was his associate counsel. Judge Broadwell has ever been an ardent devotee of his profession, which he honors, and paid little attention to politics. He was, however, elected to the State Legislature in the fall of 1860, from the Sangamon county district, on the Democratic ticket, being the only successful candidate of his party in the county that year. In 1862 he was elected County Judge, served three years, and was chosen Mayor of Springfield in 1867, and re-elected in 1869. Judge Broadwell was united in marriage to Virginia Iles, in Springfield, in 1856. She is a native of Sangamon county, Illinois, and is the mother of four daughters and one son. Judge Broadwell is a Past Master in the Masonic Order.

William J. Conkling was born in New York City in 1826; emigrated to Ohio in 1831 and to McLean county, Illinois, in 1839. Attended Oberlin College for a time, but left in his junior year. Came to Springfield in 1853, read law for two years and was admitted to the Bar. For some years he had a lucrative practice, but of late years he has devoted himself more to the real estate business.

John E. Rosette, lawyer, is a native of Delaware, Ohio, born in 1823. He was educated in that city, and read law there with Hon. Charles Sweetzer, an ex-member of the United States Congress; was admitted to the Bar in Columbus, Ohio, in 1850, and located in practice in Findlay, Hancock county, Ohio. During the several years of professional life in that place he was twice elected Prosecuting Attorney of the county. From thence he returned to Delaware; lived there nearly three years, was appointed Probate Judge of the county, and served the unexpired term of Judge Fuller, deceased. In 1855, upon the invitation of Abraham Lincoln, Mr. Rosette removed to Springfield, Illinois, and has been an active and prominent member of Sangamon County Bar for twenty-six years. He came to this county a Democrat in politics; but from 1856 has been identified with the Republican party.

Mr. Rosette was united in marriage with Miss Mary Taylor, in Findlay, Ohio. She was born in Salem that State, and educated there in a convent. They have four daughters; two married to Captains in the United States regular army; the eldest, the wife of Captain L. H. Rucker; the second the wife of Captain F. T. Bennett, from Toledo, Ohio, who has also been Indian Agent at Fort Defiance, for several years, the only instance of a regular army officer holding that office at the same time.

Charles S. Zane, Judge of the Nineteenth Judicial Circuit of Illinois, is a native of Cumberland county, New Jersey, born March 2, 1831. Andrew Zane, his father, was a farmer, and married Mary Franklin, whose father was a relative of Dr. Benjamin Franklin. Mr. Zane's paternal grandfather, with two brothers, emigrated from England in early life. Mr. Zane's boyhood and youth were passed on his father's farm, the time being divided between labor and attendance at the district school. In April, 1850, he came to Sangamon County, Illinois, and in the employ of Rev. Peter Cartwright, engaged in brickmaking and farming, at $13 a month. In the winter of 1852 he rode to Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, on horseback; returned the following spring, purchased a team, and spent the summer in breaking prairie. In the autumn of 1852 he entered McKendree College, and pursued a course of study for three years, passing the vacations in teaching, which he continued after leaving college while reading law. Mr. Zane entered the law office of Hon. J. C. Conkling in July, 1856; completed the course and was admitted to the Bar in the spring of 1857, and opened an office. He was elected City Attorney in the spring of 1858, and reelected in 1860 and 1865, each term being one year. In the spring of 1861 Mr. Zane formed a partnership with William H. Herndon, former law partner of Abraham Lincoln, and did a successful business until 1869, when the firm was dissolved and he associated himself with Hon. Shelby M. Cullom and George O. Marcy. This relation was continued until Mr. Zane was elected Circuit Judge in 1873, since which time he has worn the judicial ermine with distinguished ability. He rendered a famous decision in May, 1874, in the cause of The People vs. The Chicago and Alton Railroad Company, in which it was sought to recover certain penalties incurred by a breach of the law of the State authorizing Railroad and Warehouse Commissioners to fix maximum rates of freight and passenger tariffs, in which the attorneys for the defense made an effort to transfer the case to the United States Court, claiming lack of jurisdiction in the State courts, and in which he ruled that it was not the province of the Federal Courts to interfere with the inherent judicial rights of the State, and that in assuming to take control of such causes it transcended its constitutional authority, and held that the rights and powers of the States and the people, not transferred by the Constitution to the United States, are just as sovereign and sacred as are those of the United States. Judge Zane refused to order the papers certified to the Federal court, and proceeded to try the cause, by jury, who rendered a verdict of $400 against the defendant.

Judge Zane's religious views are liberal and tolerant, nearly identical with the doctrines of the Unitarian Society. He is a great admirer of the school of philosophy of which Herbert Spencer and Mr. Tyndall are able exponents. Politically, the Judge favors a bi-metallic money standard, a free banking system, and a tariff upon the luxuries for revenue.

Judge Zane married Miss Margaret Maxey in the spring of 1859. She is of Kentucky parentage, born in Springfield in 1835. They are the parents of eight children, six living. The eldest daughter, Mary Farnetta, is the wife of William Hinkle, chief clerk in the State Auditor's office. The eldest of their four sons, Charles W., is preparing for the legal profession, as is also the second son, John Maxcy Zane, now in Michigan University.

John Alexander McClernand is the only child of Dr. John and Fatima McClernand, and was born in Breckenridge county, Kentucky, in 1812. Four years later his father died, and young McClernand, being made of that stern stuff that overcomes difficulties and surmounts obstacles, had succeeded in placing himself in a respectable position and practice in the legal profession, at the early age of twenty. Meantime, in 1830, he had moved with the family to Shawneetown, Illinois. In 1832, before attaining his majority, he volunteered as a private in the Black Hawk war, and served honorably to its close. This service kindled a taste for, and gave him a knowledge of military tactics, and of the character of men, which proved important factors in his later career.

In 1835 Mr. McClernand established the first Democratic journal ever published in Shawneetown; and the same year re-commenced the practice of law, which continued with success until he was elected to U. S. Congress in 1843. In 1836 he was elected to the Illinois Legislature from Gallatin county. During this session he successfully vindicated President Jackson from charges brought against him by Governor Duncan; and also advocated that mode of constructing the Illinois & Michigan Canal known as the "Deep Cut" plan, which was finally adopted. Mr. McClernand was chosen, by the legislature as commissioner and treasurer, which duties he so faithfully discharged that complimentary resolutions respecting his services were passed in a number of public meetings held at different points. In 1838 he was urged to become a nominee for Lieutenant Governor, but declined because under the Constitutional age—thirty years. At the same Democratic convention which offered him the nomination Mr. McClernand prepared and offered the following resolutions:

"Resolved, That the Democratic principle is founded on an imperishable basis of truth and justice, and perpetually striving to sustain society in the exercise of every power which can promote human happiness and elevate our condition; that, instead of warring against order and encroaching on the privileges of others, the spirit of Democracy maintains an active principle of hope and virtue.

"Resolved, That we recognize no power but that which yields to the restraints of duty and is guided by mind; that we only seek to obtain influence by means of free conviction; that we condemn all appeals to brute force and the exercise of violence; and that our only means of persuasion are reason and truth.

"Resolved, That our just claim is to connect our party with the cause of intelligence and morality; to seek the protection of every right consistent with the genius of our Constitution and the spirit of the age. We desire to extend moral culture, and to remove, as far as possible, all inequalities in our human conditions by embracing all improvements which can ameliorate our moral and political state."

In 1840 Mr. McClernand was again returned to the legislature from Gallatin county; was re-elected in 1842; and as Chairman of the Committee on Finance introduced several measures to alleviate the existing financial troubles of the State, which he attributed to the defective banking system. These measures were all adopted. In 1843, while still a member of the legislature, he was chosen Representative to the Twenty-eighth Congress. The first speech he made in that body was on the bill to refund the fine imposed upon Gen. Jackson by Judge Hall. During the same session he delivered a speech on the Rock Island controversy, which was extensively published. In the second session of the same Congress, as a member of the Committee on Public Lands, he brought forward a comprehensive report, accompanied with a bill for a grant of land to aid in the completion of the Illinois and Michigan Canal.

By an act of the legislature, the time for holding elections had been changed, and Mr. McClernand was re-elected to Congress in 1844. He was one of the members who insisted with vehemence on the maintenance of the claim to fifty-four degrees, forty minutes in the Oregon controversy with Great Britain. He voted to sustain the President in the prosecution of the Mexican war, by granting the requisite men and means; and portrayed the beneficial results of that war in a speech delivered in Congress in June, 1846. In the first session of the Twenty-ninth Congress he prepared with great labor and introduced a bill to reduce and regulate the price of public lands. In the ensuing session, as chairman of the same committee, he introduced a bill, which became a law, to bring into market the mineral lands, lying around Lake Superior. During the same session he was called upon by the Jackson Monument committee to present their memorial, which he did, and his eulogium upon Jackson was highly esteemed. In 1848 Mr. McClernand was again elected to Congress, but not without opposition. In 1849, as a member of a select committee on certain charges preferred against President Polk, for having established a tariff of duties in the ports of the Mexican Republic, Mr. McClernand defended the President in an able argument. In 1850, at the instance of other leading men, he prepared and offered the first draft of the famous Compromise measures of that year. But the same subject being taken up in the Senate by the committee of which Mr. Clay was chairman, he prepared the bill which passed both houses, Mr. McClernand being chairman of the committee of the whole during its passage through the House. He delivered an elaborate speech on the subject during that session. He also during that session drafted the bill granting a quantity of land in aid of the construction of the Illinois Central Railroad and its Chicago branch. His colleague, Senator Douglas, being furnished a copy, introduced it in the Senate, and, with amendments, it passed both houses and became a law. During the same session he, as chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, introduced a paper for the regulation of the State Department. In 1851, declining reelection, he retired from Congress, after a flattering career of eight years, and moved to Jacksonville, Illinois. The following year he was chosen Presidential Elector for the second time in his life, and supported Pierce and King. In 1856 he made a powerful speech at Alton, deprecating the repeal of the Missouri Compromise, and predicting danger to the country as the consequence. In 1856 he removed to Springfield, Illinois, where he soon gained a prominent position as a lawyer in the State and Federal Courts. In 1859 he was elected Representative to Congress, to fill the vacancy caused by the death of Major T. L. Harris. In 1860 he introduced a bill repealing the law organizing the Territory of Utah and merging that Territory into others. This being his plan for overcoming the ascendancy of the Mormons, and the evils of polygamy.

On the 14th of January, 1861, Mr. McClernand delivered a speech in the House, on the Union and the phantom, "No Coercion," that for historical research, comprehensiveness and exhaustive argument, has few equals in the annals of parliamentary literature.

In 1843, after his first election to Congress, and before taking his seat, Mr. McClernand married Miss Sarah, daughter of Colonel Dunlap, of Jacksonville, Illinois.

A sketch of the eminent services rendered the Government by General McClernand during the war for the Union will appear in the military chapter.

Charles A. Keyes, Attorney and Counselor-at-Law, of the firm of McClernand & Keyes, Southwest corner Fifth and Washington streets, is a native of Springfield, Illinois, born in 1832. His parents, James W. and Lydia (Spickard) Keyes, were natives of Virginia, and came to Sangamon County, Illinois, in 1831, and are both living on their farm, four miles northwest of the City of Springfield. Charles attended the city schools, and graduated from Illinois College, Jacksonville, in the class of 1854; read law with Elliott B. Herndon, and was admitted to the Bar in 1856. They were partners at one time for two years. With that exception Mr. Keyes practiced alone until the present co-partnership was formed about eight years ago. In the spring of 1856 he was elected City Attorney and re-elected in 1857. In 1862-3 he served as Representative in the legislature, from Sangamon and Logan counties. He was appointed Master in Chancery by Judge E. Y. Rice, in 1867, and was twice re-appointed by Judge B. S. Edwards and Judge J. A. McClernand, serving in all seven years. He was a delegate to the National Democratic Convention that nominated Seymour for President, in 1868. Mr. Keyes was united in marriage with Elizabeth Lauman, of Xenia, Ohio, in 1868. Her parents were early settlers in that city. The fruit of this union is two daughters and one son.

Christopher C. Brown, Attorney-at-Law, of the firm of Stuart, Edwards & Brown, the oldest law firm in Illinois, was born in Sangamon county, now a part of Menard county, Illinois, on the 21st of October, 1834. His father, William B. Brown, came from Kentucky and settled in Sangamon county in 1832. He died in 1850. C. C. Brown attended the Springfield schools, and at Greensburg, and the Lutheran College at Hillsboro. He read law with his brother, David A. Brown, in Springfield, then attended the Transylvania Law School in Lexington, Kentucky, was admitted to the Bar in 1858, and in January, 1860, became a partner in the present firm, having been active in the profession until now. While he has been an earnest worker in the Democratic party, he has been a candidate for no political favor. Mr. Brown was united in marriage with Miss Bettie, daughter of Major J. T. Stuart, of Springfield, in October, 1859. She died in March, 1869, having been the mother of three children, one deceased. Mr. Brown married Carrie, daughter of John E. Owsley, of Chicago, in 1872, by whom he has a son and daughter. His eldest son, Stuart Brown, was graduated from Princeton College, in June, 1881.

Eugene L. Gross was born December 25, 1836, in Starkville, Herkimer county, New York, and came to Illinois with his parents in 1844. He received an academical education, and subsequently read law in the office of H. G. Reynolds, in Knoxville, Illinois, and was admitted to the Bar in 1857. In that year he formed a partnership with Mr. Reynolds, which continued but a few months. In 1858 he came to Springfield and opened an office, and here practiced his profession until his death. As a lawyer, he was regarded by both the members of the Bar and the public, as one of more than ordinary ability. His legal attainments were quite diversified, and whether pleading before a jury, or presenting his case for the consideration of the learned judge, he alike usually convinced both that his position was right. He was logical in his reasonings and drove home his ideas with great force.

In 1865 he revised the City Ordinances of the city of Springfield, by direction of the Common Council. This was his first literary work. In 1868, in connection with his brother, Colonel William L. Gross, with whom he had formed a law partnership, he compiled and published the General Statutes of the State, then in force. In January, 1868, they compiled and published a Digest of the Criminal Laws of the State. In 1869 a new edition of the General Statutes, including the laws of 1869, were published. During this year they also compiled and published an index to the Private and Special Laws of Illinois. In 1872 they compiled and published the second volume of Gross' Statutes. This ended the literary labors of Mr. Gross.

Eugene L. Gross and Susan L. Zimmerman were united in marriage April 17, 1860. Four children were born to them—Leighla, Fred, Susie, and Bessie.

In June, 1873, finding his health impaired, Mr. Gross started on horseback from Springfield and traveled through the Indian Nation, thence to New Mexico and Texas, and returned by railroad in December of the same year. The trip failed to be of that benefit it was hoped. That relentless destroyer, consumption, had fixed its hold upon him, and on the 4th day of June, 1874, he breathed his last.

Mr. Gross was never an aspirant to public office, being contented to follow the profession he had selected for a life work. In politics he was always a thorough-going Republican, and an earnest advocate of the principles of that party.

Milton Hay was born in Fayette county, Kentucky, July 3, 1817, and emigrated with his father's family to Springfield, Illinois, in the year 1832. Until arriving at age, he labored at different avocations for his father, attending the common schools at intervals, and receiving such education as such schools afforded at that day. He was fond of reading, and devoted the intervals of time when not at school or at labor, to the reading of such books as the scanty libraries of the time afforded. With James H. Matheny (now Judge Matheny) and others, he aided in forming the first society of a literary character ever formed in Springfield, the Springfield Lyceum, which was devoted to debating disputed questions and the reading of original essays. He studied law in the office of Stuart & Lincoln, and was licensed to practice in 1840. He begun practice at Pittsfield, Pike county, Illinois, and there practiced his profession until the year 1858, when he returned to Springfield, continuing the practice of his profession until January, 1881, when he retired from the active practice of his profession.

He was twice married. His first wife, Catherine, the daughter of James Forbes, of Pittsfield, died in 1857, leaving two children, both of whom died in infancy. In 1861, he married Mary Logan, eldest daughter of Judge Stephen T. Logan. She died in 1874. Two children survive, born of this marriage, Kate and Logan Hay.

He was elected to the Constitutional Convention of 1872, from the district composed of the counties of Logan and Sangamon, and, although not of the dominant party in the Convention, was made Chairman of the Committee on Revenue, and served on the Judiciary Committee. He actively participated in all the proceedings of that body, and in forming the new Constitution, which was subsequently adopted by the people. In 1874 he was elected as a Representative of Sangamon county to the legislature, and acted (after the death of Mr. Bushnell) both as Chairman of the Judiciary and Revenue Committees of that body. He was one of the committee of five appointed by the legislature, to revise, in conjunction with Mr. Hurd, the laws of the State, and this work was adopted at an adjourned session of the legislature. Other than as here stated he has never held office, preferring the practice of his profession to the pursuit of office. In politics he is a Republican.

Hon. William M. Springer, present member of Congress from the Twelfth District of Illinois, was born in Sullivan county, Indiana, 30th of May, 1836. When twelve years old he moved with his parents to Jacksonville, Illinois. There William prepared for college under the instructions of Dr. Newton Bateman, then teaching in the West District school of that city. He entered Illinois College, but owing to some difficulty with the faculty was dismissed from the institution, and went thence in the spring of 1856, to the State University of Indiana. In 1858 Mr. Springer returned to Illinois, and after studying law nearly three years in Lincoln, was admitted to the Bar in 1860. The same year he was a candidate on the Democratic ticket for Representative in the State Legislature, for the district composed of Logan and Mason counties, but was defeated by Colonel Robert B. Latham. In 1861 he settled in Springfield, and soon formed a law partnership with Hon. N. M. Broadwell, and Gen. John A. McClernand, the latter of whom retiring some years after, the firm continued as Broadwell & Springer. Returning home in 1870 at the close of a two-year's tour in Europe, for pleasure and the improvement of his wife's feeble health, Mr. Springer was elected to represent Sangamon County in the legislature. That being the first after the formation of a new Constitution. Several sessions were held during 1870-71 and 1871-72, and a complete revision of the Statutes of Illinois was made while he served in that body.

In 1874, Mr. Springer was elected Representative to Congress for the Twelfth District, composed of the counties of Cass, Christian, Menard, Morgan, Sangamon and Scott, and re-elected in 1876, 1878 and 1880, being nominated the first time on the first ballot, and each subsequent time by acclamation, the delegations from each county being instructed to support him. This, in the face of the fact that Sangamon county has furnished the Representative from this district for twenty years consecutively, speaks well for the popularity of the present incumbent. In the Forty-fourth Congress, Mr. Springer was a member of several important committees. When the bill was introduced, in that session, to grant a million and a half dollars by the Government to the Centennial Commissioners, Mr. Springer offered an amendment, that upon the close of the Exposition and the sale of the property, the Government should be reimbursed by that amount from the proceeds before any dividend could be made to the stockholders. The bill became a law, as amended. The Centennial Board attempted to evade the payment of the money into the United States Treasury, through a supposed defect in Mr. Springer's amendment clause, but he, being selected by the Attorney-General to prosecute the cause, fought it through the United States Supreme Court, and obtained a verdict sustaining the act, and recovering to the Government fifteen hundred thousand dollars. For this valuable labor he has not, as yet, received a dollar compensation, though he has asked Congress to allow him to go before the Court of Claims and prove the value of his services.

In the Forty-fifth Congress Mr. Springer served on several prominent committees, among them the Potter Election Committee and the committee to investigate Mr. Seward's official records while Minister to China, and which reported twelve articles of impeachment against him. In the same Congress Mr. Springer bolted the caucus nomination of his party and supported General Shields against Mr. Field, the party nominee.

He was the only Democratic member from the Northwest who voted against the Birchard and Hardridge resolutions, declaring that neither the courts nor Congress possessed the power to disturb Mr. Hayes' Presidential title, his action creating great excitement at the time. Mr. Springer believed that a wrong had been done in giving Mr. Hayes the Presidency, while he opposed all revolutionary measures, thought the Government had the power to right that wrong. Mr. Springer was the Chairman of the Committee on Elections in the Forty-sixth Congress, and opposed the majority of his party in their effort to unseat Representative W. D. Washburne, of Minnesota, and substitute Ignatius Donnelly in his stead. He thought the claim of Mr. Donnelly unjust and the proceedings dishonest; and although great pressure was brought to bear, through threats and slanderous charges of bribery, from which he was triumphantly vindicated, to coerce him to support the measure, he persistently opposed it, and was conspicuous in its defeat. The object of the movement was to secure a Democratic majority in the House, so that the party could elect the President in 1880, in case it should be thrown into the House of Representatives.

Mr. Springer married the daughter of Rev. Calvin W. Ruter, a prominent Methodist clergyman of Indiana. They have but one child, William Ruter Springer, aged eighteen years, who was graduated from a private military academy in Virginia in 1880. Notwithstanding her delicate health, Mrs. Springer is an author of recognized ability. The most noted productions of her pen are "Beech Wood," which appeared several years ago, and "Self," published in 1881, both from the press of Lippincott, of Philadelphia. She has also contributed a number of poems to the columns of current magazines.

William E. Shutt, Attorney, of the law firm of Palmers, Robinson & Shutt, was born in Waterford, Loudon county, Virginia, May 5, 1840. His parents, Jacob and Caroline (Leslie) Shutt, moved to the city of Springfield in November, 1842. They were natives of Loudon county, Virginia. Father died here in 1866, mother in in 1865. Mr. Shutt was educated in the city schools, and read law with Judge James H. Matheny, and was admitted to the Bar in 1862, commencing practice immediately. In 1864 he was elected City Attorney on the Democratic ticket; was chosen Mayor of the city in 1868, by the same party. In 1874 he was elected to the State Senate, for four years; and was re-elected in 1878, his official term expiring in 1882. The law firm of Robinson, Knapp & Shutt was formed July 1, 1869, composed of Hon. James C. Robinson, Anthony L. Knapp and Mr. Shutt; and has existed until the death of Mr. Knapp, in May, 1881, after which Robinson & Shutt formed a partnership with J. M. and J. Mayo Palmer, under the firm name of Palmers, Robinson & Shutt.

Robert L. McGuire of the firm of McGuire, Hamilton & Salzenstein, is a native of Missouri, and was born in 1833. He graduated from the Missouri University at Columbia, in the class of 1857. Subsequently he followed the calling of a teacher. In 1861 he came to Springfield, read law and was admitted to the Bar in 1862. He formed a partnership with James H. Matheny in 1866, previous to which time he practiced law alone. This partnership continued until 1874. In May, 1878, he formed a partnership with L. F. Hamilton, and later Mr. Salzenstein was admitted, forming the present firm.

Leonidas H. Bradley, of the firm of Bradley & Bradley, Lawyers, 117½ South Fifth street, was born in Galia county, Ohio, July 23, 1841. He is one of a family of four sons and a daughter, of Lewis and Nancy C. Bradley nee Knox, of New York, and the State of Delaware, respectively. In 1852 they moved to Clark county, Illinois, where the senior Bradley died in March, 1880, and where the widow and several of the family now reside. Leonidas was educated at Marshall, Illinois, and Ohio Wesleyan University, in Delaware, from which he was graduated in the classical course in 1861, being less than twenty years of age. He at once commenced the study of law with Judge Charles H. Constable, in Marshall, Illinois; in August, 1862, enlisted as a private in the 130th Illinois Infantry. Upon the consolidation with the 77th regiment he was made Quartermaster Sergeant and filled that office till discharged after the close of the war. In October, 1865, Mr. Bradley married Miss Abigail L., daughter of Hon. Uri Manley, an early settler and prominent lawyer of Marshall. Soon after retiring from the army Mr. Bradley was admitted to the Bar, settled in Springfield and formed a partnership with W. P. Olden, which continued till June, 1872, when Mr. Olden retired and Isaac K. Bradley took his place. Mr. Bradley has been ardently devoted to his profession, paying little attention to politics, but was elected a member of the Board of Supervisors in 1871, and in 1872 chosen to the City Council; was a candidate, against his wish, for County Judge on the Republican, ticket, but the county being strongly Democratic, was beaten. He was appointed Assistant United States District Attorney in 1869, did efficient service in prosecuting fraudulent distillers in this district; resigned in 1871. He enjoys an extensive practice in the Chancery and United States Courts. His marriage with Miss Manley has resulted in a family of three sons and three daughters, one of the latter deceased.

Isaac K. Bradley was also born in Galia county, Ohio, and is a little more than thirty-two years old. He attended school at Marshall and at Lebanon, Illinois, completing the classical course in 1869; read law with Messrs. Bradley & Olden, in Springfield; was admitted in May, 1870; began practice as a member of the law firm of Bradley, Olden & Bradley, in 1871. Since Mr. Olden's retirement, the following year, the brothers have continued under the present firm title, and have a large law business in the several courts.

Thomas G. Prickett, lawyer, is the second of five children of Hon. David and Charlotte G. Prickett, and was born in Springfield, December 23, 1837. Alderman from the Third ward in 1874, and again in 1876, serving four years in all.

The two brothers and two sisters own and reside in the old homestead, opposite the State Capitol, erected by Hon. George Forquer over fifty years ago. The premises include three acres of land, beautifully situated on the corner of Capitol avenue and Second street.

Norman L. Freeman is the present Reporter of the Supreme Court of Illinois, which office he has held, by appointment from that court, since April, 1863.

He is a native of Livingston county, New York, and was born May 9, 1823. His parents, Truman Freeman and Hannah Down, were natives of New Hampshire, and prior to their removal to the State of New York, had for many years been residents of the city of Concord. After the death of the father, in 1824, the mother, with the younger members of her family, moved to Ann Arbor, Michigan, where she resided many years. While a mere boy, young Norman entered the store of David Cooper, a leading merchant of Detroit, where he remained about three years. Leaving Detroit, he spent a few months in Cleveland, as a clerk, and then entered an academy near that city, from which he passed to Ohio University, at Athens, at which institution he completed his literary education. Upon leaving the university, he went to Kentucky, and for several years taught school in the vicinity of Lexington. While still a teacher he pursued his law studies, and in the winter of 1845-6 entered the law office of Kirtland & Seymour, at Waterford, New York, and in the spring of 1846 returned to Kentucky, was admitted to the Bar at Lexington, and began practicing his profession in Morganfield, Union county, in that State. In 1849 he was married to Miss Tranquilla Richeson, daughter of Alfred Richeson and Elizabeth Dabney Williamson. To them were born five children, four of whom survive, three daughters and one son. In 1851 we find him practicing his profession at Shawneetown, Illinois, where he remained until his removal to Springfield in 1864. In 1855 he published his Digest of the Illinois Reports, in two volumes, a work which went far to establish his reputation as a lawyer and law writer. During the time he has held his present office, he has issued sixty-six volumes of reports—a greater number, it is believed, than has been issued by any other American reporter.

Until the disorganization of that party, Mr. Freeman was a Henry Clay Whig, but since that time his political affiliations have been with the Democracy. Modest, genial, erudite—a good lawyer, an excellent Court Reporter, and a worthy citizen.

He served until September, 1864, when he resigned and returned to Jacksonville, and resumed the study of law, which he commenced before he entered the army. In June, 1865, he was admitted to practice, and at once located in Springfield, since which time he has actively engaged in the practice of his profession. He then entered the office of a law firm in Chicago, where he remained until the spring of 1865, when he was admitted to practice in the courts of this State, and at once returned to Springfield. Mr. Mather received his literary education in the schools of Springfield, and a partial course in Illinois College, at Jacksonville. Clinton studied law in the office of his father, Hon. James C. Conkling, of Springfield, and was licensed to practice in the courts of Illinois, November 23, 1866, and the United States in January, 1867. After practicing a few years he turned his attention to the manufacturing business, but in 1877 resumed the duties of his profession to which he now gives his whole time, devoting special attention to chancery and real estate law, and to the settlement of estates. For some years Mr. Conkling was secretary of the Lincoln Monument Association, and has been an active member of the fraternity of Odd Fellows in Central Illinois, besides being identified with other and similar benevolent societies. He has also been a member of the Board of Supervisors of the county, two terms. In his real estate practice he represents large land interests in this and other States.

In 1867 Mr. Conkling united in marriage with Miss Georgie Barrell, and they now have a family of two daughters, Georgie B. Conkling, and Kate Conkling, aged eight and six years respectively.

Lloyd F. Hamilton, of the firm of McGuire, Hamilton & Salzenstein, is a Kentuckian by birth, but was raised in Tazewell county, Illinois, his mother having emigrated to that county while he was yet an infant. His father died before they came to this State. He began to study law in 1864, with Judge Schofield, of Marshall, Illinois, and the following year entered the Law Department of Michigan University, where he remained one year. He then entered the Law Department of the Chicago University, where he graduated in 1866. During the same year he passed a successful examination before the Supreme Court of Illinois and was admitted to practice. Selecting Springfield as a home, he moved to that city and opened an office and has since continued to practice here. In 1872 he was elected States' Attorney and served four years, and was highly successful as a prosecutor. Previous to this, during the municipal year of 1869-70, he was City Attorney of Springfield. Mr. Hamilton has studiously devoted himself to the practice of his profession and stands well with the Bar.

James W. Patton was born February 15, 1840, near Auburn, Sangamon county, Illinois. When but eight years old his father died, leaving his mother with two other children younger than himself. His mother's maiden name was Elizabeth A. Moore, and she now resides upon the family homestead near the place of his birth. His grandfather, James Patton, was among the first settlers of Sangamon county, having emigrated from Christian county, Kentucky, in the spring of 1820.

Mr. Patton remained with his mother on the farm until he was sixteen, when he spent two or three years away from home at school. Upon his return he was engaged in teaching for a while. In 1860 he entered the law firm of Messrs. Hay & Cullom, of Springfield, with whom he studied until admitted to the Bar. After that he was engaged with his brother, Matthew Patton in merchandising at Auburn.

At the Presidential election of 1864, he was elected one of the Representatives of Sangamon and Logan counties to the legislature. In April 1866, he located in Springfield, and commenced the practice of his profession.

December 9, 1869, he was married to Francine E. daughter of Hon. Charles H. Lanphier, of Springfield. Mr. Patton has devoted himself to the practice of his chosen profession, in which he has been successful.

Samuel D. Scholes, of the firm of Scholes & Mather, is a native of Peoria county, Illinois, and was born in 1841. He was educated in Antioch College, Yellow Springs, Ohio, and began reading law with Johnson & Hopkins, of Peoria. When the war commenced he enlisted and served as Orderly Sergeant in the three months' service, and afterwards as First Lieutenant in the three years' service, in the 14th Illinois Infantry. At the close of the war, in 1865, he again returned to his law books, and in January, 1866, was admitted to the Bar, and commenced practice in Springfield. In 1875 he received the appointment of Master in Chancery, which office he continues to hold. Since 1871 the present law firm has been in existence. Alfred Orendorff, Attorney-at-law, was born in Logan county, Illinois, 29th July, 1845. Joseph Orendorff, his father, was a North Carolinian by birth, but came to Illinois with his parents about 1819. Christopher Orendorff, his father, settled on Sugar creek, north of Springfield, in what was then Sangamon, now Logan county, and built the first water-power grist-mill in that part of the country, making the burrs of boulders obtained in the vicinity of the mill. Joseph Orendorff married Elizabeth Stevens, a native of Henderson county, Kentucky. He died when the subject of this biography was a lad of ten summers, and his widow removed to Lincoln, Logan county. Alfred enjoyed the common schools, and subsequently attended the Wesleyan University at Lincoln, a year, and the military school at Fulton, Illinois, a short time. In the spring of 1866 he graduated from the Albany Law School, and spent the succeeding winter in Texas. Returning to Springfield in the autumn of 1867, he engaged in the practice of law in the office of Herndon & Zane; and upon the retirement of Judge Zane from the firm, the law partnership of Herndon & Orendorff was formed, and continued for a number of years. June 22, 1870, Mr. Orendorff united in marriage with Miss Julia, daughter of Colonel John Williams, an early settler and prominent business man of Springfield. In 1870 Mr. Orendorff was nominated by the Republicans for the State Senate, but the Democrats being largely in the majority, he was beaten by their candidate, Hon. Alexander Starne. In 1872, he was a delegate to the National Democratic Convention, and supported Hon. Lyman Trumbull for the Presidency. In 1873 he was chosen by the Liberals as candidate for Representative to the General Assembly of Illinois. The choice being ratified by the Democrats, he was elected, and was made a member of the Judiciary Committee in that body, and took an active part in framing the Revised Statutes, made necessary by the adoption of the new Constitution. Mr. Orendorff joined the Odd Fellows in 1874; has filled the various offices in the subordinate lodge; was chosen Representative of No. 465 to the Grand Lodge, held in Peoria in 1875; was elected Grand Master of the State in 1878, and is now Representative to the Sovereign Grand Lodge I. O. O. F. of the World.

The law firm of Orendorff & Creighton was formed in 1879. It has an extensive business, and its members are recognized as among the most successful practitioners at the Springfield Bar.

Henry S. Greene, Attorney for the Wabash, St. Louis and Pacific Railway Company, and member of the late prominent law firm of Hay, Greene & Littler, was born in Ireland in 1833. At six years of age he crossed the Atlantic, and grew to manhood on the shore of Lake Ontario in the Dominion of Canada. In 1857 he came to Illinois, read law in the office of Lawrence Weldon, at Clinton, and was admitted to the Bar in January, 1860. Having previously arranged to become a law partner with Hon. C. H. Moore, of Clinton, Mr. Greene entered into and remained in that relation six years. Three years after his admission he was appointed Attorney for the Chicago and Alton Railroad Company for the counties of Logan and McLean, which position he resigned upon moving to Springfield in 1868, since which time, his law firm has been counsel for the company in Sangamon county, he still retaining that relation. In 1860 Mr. Greene associated himself with Mr. D. T. Littler in the practice of law, and upon the dissolution of the firm of Hay & Palmer by the election of the latter to be Governor, Hon. Milton Hay became a partner, the firm title changing to Hay, Greene & Littler. This partnership ceased by dissolution January 1, 1881.

For a number of years this firm has had charge of the legal business of the Wabash Railway Company in this part of the State. Some time previously, and since their separation, Mr. Greene has been the General Counselor for the Wabash, St. Louis and Pacific Railway Company for Illinois, where it owns and controls by lease 1,300 miles of railroad lines, and Consulting Counsel for the outside business of the company, controlling in all 3,000 miles of road.

During the last two years of its existence, he was retained as counsel for the American Union Telegraph Company in its extensive litigation with the Western Union Company, previous to their consolidation. In none of the large legal business which Mr. Greene has done for corporations, has he received a stated salary, but simply a fee for the professional labor performed. In view of the great demand upon his time and energies in attending to the legal matters of these companies, he has withdrawn almost entirely, of late years, from general court practice at the Bar. The rapid growth of the Wabash, St. Louis & Pacific Company's, by absorption and construction, in the last few years, has created a large volume of legal business, and extended his duties until they are larger outside of the State than in it.

In 1863, Mr. Greene was appointed District Attorney, by Governor Yates, for the Eighth Judicial District, composed of the counties of DeWitt, Logan and McLean, and was subsequently elected to the same position, but resigned to take his seat in the legislature, in 1867, in which he served one regular and two special sessions; and upon moving from the district, resigned before the close of his term of office.

In the fall of 1854, before leaving Canada, Mr. Greene married Miss Elizabeth Hogle, born in that country, of New Hampshire parentage. Their family consists of one daughter and one son. In politics, Mr. Greene has always been a firm and active, but not radical, Republican.

A. N. J. Crook is a native of Tennessee, but was reared in Indiana, his parents removing to that State in his childhood. In 1856 he came to Peoria county, Illinois, and from there to Sangamon county in 1862. He spent two years in Pike's Peak, Colorado. After reading law for a time with Herndon & Zane, he was admitted to the Bar and commenced practice in Springfield. In 1869 he was elected County Judge and served four years. He also served as a member of the 32d General Assembly from Sangamon county. He is a staunch Democrat and an active worker in its interests.

James C. Robinson, of the firm of Palmers, Robinson & Shutt is a native of Edgar county Illinois, where he was born in 1824. His father, Richard Robinson was a North Carolinian, and married Sally Dixon, and moved to Clark county, Illinois, in 1820, but removed to Edgar county shortly after. Subsequently he returned to Clark county where James was brought up and educated. Mr. Robinson read law in Clark county, and was admitted to practice about 1850, and followed his chosen profession in that county until 1869, when he settled in Springfield.

Like many other lawyers, of a past Decade, Mr. Robinson became somewhat of a politician, and in 1858 was elected from the Clark county District, a member of Congress. He was re-elected in 1860 and 1862. In 1868, he was placed in nomination by his party, the Democratic, for the office of Governor, in opposition to his present law partner—John M. Palmer, but was defeated. In 1870 he was nominated for Congress from the Springfield District and triumphantly elected, and re-elected in 1872.

Soon after his settlement in Springfield, Mr. Robinson formed a partnership with A. L. Knapp, and subsequently William L. Shutt was admitted a member of the firm. The firm continued in existence until the death of Mr. Knapp in the summer of 1881. Soon after this a partnership was effected with John M. and John Mayo Palmer, under the firm name of Palmers, Robinson & Shutt, the firm being one of the strongest in the State. The new firm now enjoys, as the old one did for many years, an extensive practice, especially in the upper courts. Mr. Robinson is recognized as an excellent jury-lawyer, and as a stump speaker has few equals.

James A. Kennedy, attorney at law, is a native of Huntingdon—now Blair—county, Pennsylvania; was born in 1833. David Kennedy and Mary A. Miller, his parents, were also of that State. They came to Illinois about 1840, and settled in Calhoun county, where Mr. Kennedy died soon after. They had three children, of whom James is the only one alive. Soon after his father's death, the family moved to St. Louis, Missouri, and he was there reared and educated, completing a course in the St. Louis University in 1852. He then went south and engaged in teaching school in New Orleans and interior Louisiana, until 1857. Returning, he remained in St. Louis till the following year, then located in Waterloo, Monroe county, Illinois; read law with Hon. William R. Morrison, and was admitted to practice in 1859. He was elected County Superintendent of schools in 1860, and filled the office by successive elections, eight years. He was appointed Master in Chancery about the same time, and held that position till he moved to Sangamon county in 1870. Here he taught the first year as assistant in the city high school, at the close of which he opened a law office; was elected city attorney on the Democratic ticket in 1874; the following year was chosen Justice of the Peace to fill a vacancy, was re-elected in 1877, and served till May, 1881. Upon retiring he resumed the practice of law. Mr. Kennedy is now serving his second term as supervisor from Capitol township; was chairman of the Judiciary Committee, first term, is now at the head of Committee on Pauper and Poor Accounts. In January, 1879, he, with several others, printers, issued the "Catholic News," a weekly publication, which was suspended about six months later, from lack of proper support. In 1858 he married Miss Clara Vanderburgt, a native of Belgium, Europe, but came to America at ten years of age. They have two adult daughters, Mary E. and Emma. Mr. Kennedy is a member, and for several years was successively President and Secretary of the Union of the Irish Catholic Benevolent Societies, of Springfield.

Charles was born in Springfield, December 25, 1850, graduated from the city high school in 1868, commenced the study of law in August, 1869, with Messrs. Hay, Greene & Littler, and was admitted to the Bar, June 13, 1871. May 1, 1874, he opened a law office in company with his late partner, Robert H. Hazlett. In the spring of 1878, Mr. Kane was elected to the office of City Attorney, and re-elected in 1879 and 1880, retiring from the office May 1, 1881. His education was chiefly attained in the printing office, he having never attended school more than six months in his life. Mr. Snigg entered the office of the Springfield Register as an apprentice boy in 1862, and worked in that and the Journal office until 1871. He began reading law in May of that year, in the office of Robinson, Knapp & Shutt, and carried newspapers meantime to defray current expenses. Passed his first examination in Michigan, in 1873, and received license to practice law; passed another examination before the Supreme Court of Illinois in June of the same year, and commenced practice in Springfield. William L. Gross is an Attorney-at-Law, in the active practice of his profession in the city of Springfield, Illinois, in conjunction with Clinton L. Conkling, under the firm of Gross & Conkling. Mr. Gross is a native of the State of New York, and was born in Fairfield, Herkimer county, on the 21st of February, 1839. His father, Rev. Alba Gross, a minister in the Baptist Church, and his mother Althea Smith Gross, were born in Courtland county, New York. The family came to Illinois in the spring of 1844, making the journey in a movers' covered wagon. They first settled in Canton, Fulton county, and afterwards, in 1848, moved upon a farm in Knox county.

At the age of seventeen years, William, the subject of this sketch, having passed through the public schools and the Academy, engaged in teaching, and while so engaged he prosecuted his law studies. He was admitted to the Bar in Springfield on June 27, 1862, and at once entered into practice in that city in co-partnership with his brother, Eugene L. Gross, Esq.

In August, 1862, Mr. Gross entered the service of the Government, and in September, 1863, was appointed Superintendent of Military Telegraphs in the Department of the Ohio. Immediately following this appointment, on October 27, 1863, he was appointed by President Lincoln, a Captain and Assistant Quartermaster of Volunteers, and, under command of General Anson Stager, was assigned to duty in the Department of the Ohio, as Military Superintendent of Telegraphs. In the discharge of this duty he was engaged till Johnston's surrender in the spring of 1865, when he was transferred to the Department of the Gulf, relieving Colonel W. G. Fuller, and took control of Military Telegraphs in that entire department. While in this latter department he was a member of General Phil H. Sheridan's military family, and a member of his staff. He was twice breveted, once as major and afterwards as lieutenant colonel, and was honorably discharged in August, 1866.

From that time till February, 1868, he was engaged in the civil telegraphic service, successively as Auditor of the Southwestern Telegraph Company, at Louisville, Kentucky, as financial agent of the Western Union Telegraph Company for the district west of the Missouri, and as Superintendent of the Tariff Bureau of that company in New York City.

Resigning that position in February, 1868, he returned to Springfield, and, resuming his business relations with his brother, E. L. Gross, became an active member of the Law and Law Publishing firm of E. L. & W. L. Gross, so well known throughout this State. In 1868 the firm issued the first volume of Gross' Statutes of Illinois, a work accepted by the courts and Bar as authority, and specially legalized by an act of the legislature. The following year a second edition was issued, including the laws of 1869; and the firm also issued an Index to all the Laws of Illinois, a work of great research, minute detail and merit. In 1872 the second volume of Gross' Statutes appeared, and the following year the firm was dissolved by the retirement of the elder brother on account of ill health. The publications of the firm were continued by the subject of this sketch, and in 1874 appeared the third volume of Gross' Statutes. Of these publications it is not too much to say that they were acceptable alike to the courts, the Bar, and the people, and will long remain models of their kind.

Since 1874 Mr. Gross has been actively engaged in the practice of his profession in this city.

He was elected Representative from Sangamon county to the Thirty-First General Assembly, upon the Republican ticket, and served during that session.

In January 1881 he formed the law partnership now existing, with Mr. Clinton L. Conkling, one of the leading law firms of Sangamon county.

Upon the organization, in January 1877, of the Illinois State Bar Association, Mr. Gross was elected its Secretary, and by successive elections still holds that important position.

In 1864 Mr. Gross was married to Miss Althea Livingstone, of Poughkeepsie, New York, and to them have been born two children, Edgar S. and Louise.

John McAuley Palmer was born in Scott county, Kentucky, September 13, 1817. While yet in his infancy, he was taken by his parents to Christian county, Kentucky, where he remained until 1831, when, in company with his parents, he came to Illinois and settled in Madison county. At this time he was in his fourteenth year, with but little education, and only such as was derived from the common country schools of that day. About two years after, his mother died and the family was broken up. The old college at Alton, commenced on the manual labor plan, was started at this time, and he determined to avail himself of its privileges. For one year he arose at daylight, built the fires, swept the floors, and did other chores until school hours, when he prosecuted his studies.

Some four years after (in 1838), while traveling as a clock peddler, he stopped all night at a hotel in Carthage, Hancock county. A friend accompanied him to the hotel, and the two were assigned a room with two beds. Late in the night they were aroused by the landlord, who ushered in two strangers. "Sorry to waken you, gentlemen," said he, "but here are two strangers who want a bed. You two must sleep together, or share your beds with them." Palmer turned over, rubbed his eyes, and saw before him a short, spare man, with broad, expansive forehead, and large, luminous eyes. The other was taller, fine-looking, and had the appearance of being a college professor. The tall man inquired about their politics. "Well," replied Palmer, "My friend's a Whig, and I am a Democrat." "You take the Whig, and I'll take the Democrat," said the short man. They got into bed, and all were soon sound asleep. The next morning Palmer inquired the name of his bed-fellow. It was Stephen A. Douglas, the Little Giant of the West. His fellow-traveler was John T. Stuart.

In 1839, Mr. Palmer went to Carlinville, and entered the law office of John S. Greathouse, and commenced the study of law. In December of the same year he went to Springfield to apply for license to practice. The court appointed Judge Douglas and J. Young Scammon to examine him. His examination was satisfactory, Mr. Douglas remarking, "You may not now be able to take charge of important law cases, but from the cut of your features and set of your clothes, you soon will be." In the evening Mr. Palmer took a stroll around town, and into a church used as a State House, where a tall, long, bony man was entertaining a crowd with a speech that was full of anecdote, logic and common sense. He inquired his name, and was informed that it was Abe Lincoln. The next day he was introduced to Mr. Lincoln, and from that day to the death of Lincoln they were warm personal friends.

Returning to Carlinville, he at once commenced the practice of law, and, although he was not a good speaker, he soon commanded a lucrative practice. In 1840 he supported Van Buren for the Presidency, taking an active part in the canvass.

On the 20th of December, 1842, he was united in marriage to Melinda Ann Neeley. Two weeks after marriage the couple went to housekeeping. The whole cost of furniture and everything necessary to go to housekeeping, was less than fifty dollars.

While a strong Democrat, Mr. Palmer was always an anti-slavery man, and when the Kansas-Nebraska act of 1854 became the issue, he sided with the Anti-Nebraska Democrats. He was elected to the State Senate this year, which contained four Anti-Nebraska Democrats. A United States Senator was to be elected in place of General Shields. The Anti-Nebraska Democrats held the balance of power. Palmer offered to go into the Democratic caucus, provided fealty to the Kansas-Nebraska act was withdrawn. His offer was refused. Shields was nominated by the Democrats, Lincoln by the Whigs, and Palmer put Lyman Trumbull in nomination as the representative of the Anti-Nebraska Democrats. Trumbull was elected. Douglas labored hard with Palmer to get him to vote for Shields, and both in the wordy contest lost control of their temper. Doug'as taunted him with going over to the Abolitionists, and said he could fill his place with plenty of good Whigs. Palmer grew hot and retorted, "So help me God, I'll never vote for Shields. You know how warmly I have supported you. You now tell me you are willing to part with me, and that you can fill my place with your life-long enemies. You demand that I shall surrender my personal independence and manhood, and threaten me if I refuse. From this time forward I will fight you, and will never speak to you until you are beaten, and lose your power to make and unmake men." The friendship was severed and not renewed until 1861, when the Governor of Illinois sent Palmer to Washington as a member of the Peace Conference. The morning after his arrival Douglas sent a card to his room requesting an interview. The great statesman came in, and, offering his hand, said: "Well, Palmer, the time has come when, by your own limitation, we are to be friends. I beat you a long time ago, but it has taken you a long time to beat me. I'm glad to see you." "Yes, Judge," said Palmer, "You were a thundering hard man to beat." Douglas then said: "You have always misunderstood me. Years ago I saw that Davis and others meant disunion. I sought to force the issue upon them in the Lecompton controversy, and would have done so if Buchanan had not proven false. Then, there was Union feeling enough even in the South to crush them. They have since had two years to educate the South into secession." Then rising, and, in a solemn, prophetic voice, he said: "And now you will see millions of men in arms before the question is settled."

The campaign of 1856 was the first in which figured the newly organized Republican party. Palmer gave his adhesion to that party. In 1860 he did much service in the election of Lincoln to the Presidency. When the war broke out, Palmer raised the 14th Illinois Infantry, and by brave and gallant deeds was promoted to Major General, given command of a corps, and afterwards a department.

After the close of the war he returned to the practice of law, and in 1868 was elected Governor of the State, serving four years with marked ability. On the expiration of his term of office, he located permanently in Springfield, and is now an active, honorable member of the Sangamon County Bar.

CHAPTER VII.

THE FISHER MURDER CASE.

It has become a proverb that "truth is stranger than fiction." This was never more fully verified than in the events here related, concerning three brothers, who became victims to one of the most remarkable cases of circumstantial evidence on record. William, Henry and Archibald Trayler, were each born in Greene county, Kentucky, and who came to Illinois about the year 1829. William settled near Greenbush, Warren county, about one hundred miles northwest of Springfield. Henry settled at Clary's Grove, Menard county, but which was then a part of Sangamon county. Archibald settled in Springfield, and engaged in business as a carpenter and builder. He owned a lot on the corner of Adams and Third streets, and built thereon a dwelling house. Being a bachelor, he rented the house to his partner, Mr. Myers, and boarded with him. The three brothers were each sober, industrious and retiring men, there being nothing in their actions that would give rise to any remarks, or a suspicion that they would be guilty of any wrong-doing.

Archibald Fisher, a man about fifty years of age; taught school in Monmouth, Warren county, and vicinity. When not regularly employed in teaching, he worked at odd jobs, living in the families of those who employed him. He was unmarried, economical, and had saved up a few hundred dollars, and, at the beginning of the events here related, he was boarding at the house of William Trayler.

Desiring to enter some land, Mr. Fisher, in company with Mr. Trayler, started together for Springfield, arriving at the house of Henry Trayler on Sunday evening. The next morning, all three came to Springfield, arriving there about noon, Monday, June 1, 1841, and stopped at the house where Archibald Trayler boarded. After dinner the three brothers and Fisher left the boarding house, in company, for the purpose of looking about the town. At supper time the three brothers returned, but Fisher, having slipped aside as they were passing along a foot-path among the trees in the northwestern part of the city, did not appear. After supper, all the others went in search of him. One by one they returned as night approached, but with no tidings of Fisher. The next morning the search was continued, but up to noon was still unsuccessful.

William and Henry, having expected to leave early that morning, expressed their intention of abandoning the search and returning home. This was objected to by Archibald and those boarding with him at Mrs. Myers', as it would leave Fisher without any means of conveyance. They, therefore, continued the search the remainder of the day; but at night, William, who evidently was greatly disappointed at being detained so long, unknown to Archibald, hitched up his buggy and started home. Missing him, and learning what had been done, Archibald followed him on foot, and overtook him just as he was entering the water at Hickox's mill, on Spring creek, near where the Ohio & Mississippi railroad now crosses. Remonstrating with him against going home before the mystery was cleared up, William turned 'round in the water, and they both returned to Springfield. Notwithstanding all this, William and Henry started home the next day.

Up to this time, the mysterious disappearance had attracted but little attention. Three or four days later, Henry returned to Springfield for the purpose of continuing the search, and with his brother Archibald, and some of the boarders, another day was spent in the search, but without avail, when Henry concluded to cease further efforts.

On Friday, June 12, James W. Keyes, the Postmaster at Springfield, received a letter from Mr. Tice, postmaster at Greenbush, Warren county, stating that William Trayler had returned home, and was circulating the report that Fisher was dead, and boasting that he had willed his money to him, and that he had gained about fifteen hundred dollars by it—a much larger sum than Fisher was supposed to possess. Mr. Tice requested the Springfield postmaster to give him all the information on the subject that he could. The contents of that letter were made public, and the excitement became widespread and intense. Springfield had now a population of about two thousand, and had the year previous adopted a city charter. William L. May was Mayor, and together with Josiah Lamborn, Attorney-General of the State, headed the movement to ferret out the mystery. A large company was raised and formed into squads and marched about in every direction, so as to leave no spot unsearched. Examinations were made of wells and every conceivable place where a body might be concealed.

In the search, a club was found with some hair attached to it, and it was confidently believed that the murder had been committed with that weapon, but it was afterwards demonstrated that the hair was from a cow. This search was continued until Saturday afternoon, when it was determined to arrest William and Henry Trayler, and officers started for them on Sunday morning. Henry, being nearest, was brought to Springfield on Monday. The Mayor and Attorney-General took him in hand, and used every device to elicit information of the supposed murder, but he protested his innocence of any knowledge on the subject. He was reminded that the circumstantial evidence was so strong that he, with his two brothers, would certainly all be hung, and that the only chance to save his own life was for him to become a witness on the part of the State. He withstood all the pressure until Wednesday, the seventeenth of the month, when, protesting his own innocence, he stated that his brothers, William and Archibald, without his knowledge at the time, had murdered Fisher, by hanging him to a tree; that they had temporarily concealed the body; that immediately preceding the departure of himself and William from Springfield, on the second or third of June, William and Archie communicated the fact to him, and engaged his assistance in making a permanent concealment of the body; that at the time he and William left, ostensibly for home, they did not take the direct road, but, wending their way through the streets, entered the woods at the northwest of the city, and that on approaching, where the body was concealed, he was placed as a sentinel.

He then entered into a minute description of the murder, going into the smallest details. He said that his brothers entered a thicket of underbrush, where the body was concealed, placed it in the buggy, moved off with it in the direction of Hickox mill-pond on Spring creek, and soon after returned, saying they had put it in a safe place; that Archibald went back to town, and that William and himself found their way to the road, and proceeded to their homes.

Until that disclosure was made, the character of Archibald was such as to repel all suspicion of his complicity in the matter, but he was at once arrested and hurried to jail, which was probably the best thing that could have been done for him, for he was in great personal danger from the infuriated populace. Search then commenced anew for the body. The thicket was found, and indications of a struggle under a small tree, bent over as though the hanging might have been done there. A trail was also visible, as though a body had been dragged to where the tracks of a buggy were to be seen, tending in the direction of the mill pond, previously spoken of, but could not be traced all the way. At the pond, however, it was found that a buggy had been down into the water and came out again. Hundreds of men were engaged in dragging and fishing for the body. Becoming impatient, the dam was cut down on Thursday morning, the eighteenth of June, and the water drawn off, but no body found.

About noon that day the officers, who had gone to arrest William Trayler, returned with him in custody, accompanied by a gentleman who called himself Dr. Gilmore. Then it was ascertained that William Trayler had been arrested at his own house, on Thursday the sixteenth of the month, and started for Springfield, stopping at Lewiston, Fulton county, for the night. Late in the night Dr. Gilmore arrived there and told the officers that Fisher was alive and at his house; that he had followed them to give the information so that the prisoner might be released without further trouble. The deputy sheriff—James Maxcy—very properly refused to release him on the word of an entire stranger, and they continued their journey to Springfield.

Dr. Gilmore told the officers that when he heard of the arrest of William Trayler for the murder of Fisher, he was a few miles from home; that when he returned to his own house he found Fisher there; that he would have taken Fisher with him in pursuit of the officers with the prisoner, but that the state of Fisher's health would not admit of it. The doctor further said that he had known Fisher for several years, and that he was subject to fits of temporary derangement of mind, in consequence of an injury to his head, received in early life. The doctor still further stated that Fisher told him that the first he knew after visiting Springfield, he found himself in the vicinity of Peoria. Being nearer to his home than to Springfield, he proceeded at once to Warren county, without the slightest thought of his acts leading to the injury of any other person.

On their arrival at Springfield, Dr. Gilmore's statement was made public, and at first the people seemed to be struck dumb with astonishment. When the news was communicated to Henry Trayler, in the jail, he, without faltering, re-affirmed his own story about the murder of Fisher. The idea was at once taken up by the crowd that Dr. Gilmore was in collusion with the murderers, and that he had invented that story as a ruse to secure their release and escape. While the doctor was permitted to remain at liberty, he was regarded with strong suspicion. About 3 o'clock that afternoon, Mr. Myers, the partner of Archibald Trayler, started with a two-horse carriage, accompanied by Egbert M. Mallory, to ascertain whether Fisher was alive or not, and if so, to bring him back to Springfield.

Without waiting for the return of Myers and Mallory, the Traylers were brought before the proper officers for preliminary examination, on the charge of the murder of Archibald Fisher. Henry Trayler was introduced on the part of the State, and on oath testified that his brothers, William and Archibald, had murdered Archibald Fisher, re-affirming all the minutia of his former statements, and at the close bore a rigid cross-examination without faltering or exposure. It was also proven by a respectable lady, who was well acquainted with Archibald, that on the Monday afternoon of Fisher's disappearance, she saw Archibald Trayler and another man, who she identified as William Trayler,—then present—and still another, answering the description of Fisher, all enter the timber at the northwest of town, and an hour or two later, saw the two former return alone. Many other witnesses were examined, giving a combination of testimony that seemed to weave a network of circumstances about the prisoners, from which it would appear to any other than a legal mind, to be utterly impossible to extricate them. It was also proven that Archibald Trayler had passed an unusual number of pieces of gold coin. The buggy tracks in the mill pond were unexplained, as the prisoners were the only persons who could give any light upon that subject. The evidence of a struggle in the thicket, under the bending tree, where the hanging was supposed to have taken place, was unexplained, although it was afterwards proven that school children had been using the tree as a support to a swing. These and many other points of evidence, the intricacies of which space forbids that I should follow out, were before the courts.

When the prosecution had introduced all their evidence and rested the case, one of the attorneys for the defense, Hon. Stephen T. Logan, arose, and with every eye turned toward him, said that on the part of the defendants, he would introduce a single witness only.

Archibald Fisher, in full life and proper person, was then conducted slowly into the presence of the court. Messrs. Myers and Mallory had returned late in the evening before—June 21st—with Fisher, and the friends of the prisoners kept him secreted until the proper time. The effect may be imagined, but can not be described. A gentleman who was cognizant of the proceedings from beginning to end, and who is now a Judge of one of the courts of Illinois, describing the appearance of one of the prisoners in the court room, says: "Archibald Trayler was as fine looking a man as I ever saw. When his own brother was testifying that he was a murderer, he stared at him with a look of astonishment, settling into an appearance of stoical indifference, that seemed to say, 'there is no hope of relief, therefore I must calmly endure the worst,' but when the man he was accused of having murdered, was lead into his presence, he broke down and gave vent to his feelings in a flood of tears, followed by uncontrollable fits of sobbing and moaning."

By this time it began to dawn on the minds of the people that the threats of death to all three of the brothers had so wrought on the mind of Henry Trayler as to destroy his competency as a witness. A feeling of indignation immediately sprang up against May and Lamborn, who had led in the prosecution, and it only lacked a bold leader to mob and hang them. The feeling was so intense that Judge Logan, who had defended the prisoners, felt it his duty to come to the rescue of their prosecutors. He made a pacific speech, in which he exhorted all to abide by the laws. It had the desired effect, and all dispersed without violence.

A public meeting of the citizens of Springfield was held on the evening of June 22, 1841, to express sympathy with the brothers, who had passed through that fiery ordeal, and particularly with their fellow citizen, Archibald Trayler, whose character had never been tarnished with the slightest shadow of reproach. That sympathy was of little avail. His fine, manly countenance was never again lighted up with a smile. He made some feeble attempt at business, but generally wandered about, avoiding all society, pined away, and died in less than two years. One who knew him well said: "If ever a man died of a broken heart it was Archibald Trayler." William Trayler died in less than a year after the trial. Henry Trayler lived several years after the death of his brother, but was never known to speak of the mournful event after his departure from Springfield at the close of the trial. He died in Menard county. It is said that the three brothers never met after they passed out of the court room.

If the unhappy and afflicted being who was the innocent cause of all the trouble, had wandered away and died on the open prairie, much of which had not then been trod by the foot of man, William and Archibald Taylor would, beyond a reasonable doubt, have been executed as his murderers, and that upon the force of surrounding circumstances and the testimony of their own brother, who would doubtlessly have become hopelessly insane, caused by threats to make him confess a crime never committed, and afterwards by the appalling effects of his own testimony. The world would probably have looked on and called it retributive justice. Such may, and doubtless has been, the effect of circumstantial evidence in cases where the truth was never known.

Thus ended one of the most remarkable affairs of its kind on record.

CHAPTER VIII.

RAILROADS.

Sangamon county is traversed by one hundred and fifty-four miles of railroad, represented by six lines. The citizens of no county in the State have manifested more interest in the subject, from the beginning of the agitation to the present time. The news of a successful construction of a road in the East had no sooner become known in this section of country, before it was boldly advocated by Jonathan H. Pugh and others, as the only means of solving the transportation problem. Of course the advocates of such a scheme were regarded by some, as possessing an unbalanced mind, still they did not waver, and as the opportunity presented itself, it was forced upon the attention of the people.

As early as 1833, the subject of railroad building was introduced into the General Assembly, but no laws were enacted at that time. In the winter of 1835-6 acts were passed incorporating a large number of railroads, as well as for the building of canals and other internal improvements. Capital stock amounting to $12,450,000 was authorized, chiefly to railroad companies. The internal improvement act of 1837, appropriated $10,200,000 directly from the State Treasury. More than $9,000,000 of this sum was for railroads. At this same session, private laws were enacted, chartering joint stock companies with authorized capital stock to the amount of nearly $8,000,000, making an aggregate of about $30,000,000, involved in efforts to legislate railroads into existence in the State of Illinois at that early day. This gigantic system of internal improvement was inaugurated when the country was but sparsely settled, and before it was in a condition to export anything that would command money. The people imagined themselves rich, because the whole United States, east, west, north and south, was flooded with irredeemable paper currency. It was thought there would be no difficulty in negotiating loans to carry forward the public works.

Soon after the law was enacted, certificates of internal improvement stock was readily taken, contracts let, and work commenced at various points in all parts of the State. Millions of dollars were squandered in this way before the autumn of 1837, when the great financial crash, which commenced in the eastern cities, swept over the whole United States, and the internal improvement system of Illinois went down, leaving the State in what was thought at the time, to be hopeless bankruptcy.

WABASH, ST. LOUIS & PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Among the first lines upon which work was commenced under the internal improvement system, was the Northern Cross Railroad. The first ground was broken between Jacksonville and Meredosia, on what was called Wolf Run. It was about six miles east of the Illinois river. This was early in the spring of 1837. James Dunlap and T. T. January were the contractors. In the spring of 1838, the first locomotive ever brought to the State, came up the Illinois river on a steamboat, and was landed at Meredosia. It was used for running construction trains from that time forward. This engine was built by Rogers, Ketchum & Grosvenor, of Patterson, New Jersey, and was called the "Superior." The road was so far advanced that the locomotive run into Jacksonville in the latter part of 1838, or early in 1839.

The work on the Northern Cross Railroad struggled along, after the internal improvement system had ceased in nearly every other part of the State. After it was put in running order from Meredosia to Jacksonville, some work was done between the latter place and Springfield, but for a year or two it moved slowly. In some way the canal fund became indebted to the internal improvement fund. On the 26th day of February, 1841, an act of the General Assembly was approved, providing for the completion of the Northern Cross Railroad from Springfield to Jacksonville. To liquidate the indebtedness of the canal fund to the internal improvement fund, $100,000 of canal bonds were appropriated to defray the expense of completing that part of the road. The Fund Commissioner was authorized and instructed to enter into contracts for the work, to be paid for with the canal bonds, and to be completed in one year. On the day following—February 27, 1841—a law was enacted requiring the Fund Commissioner to advertise for proposals to do the work. He was, by the same law, directed to take charge of all the work between Springfield and the Illinois river.

FIRST LOCOMOTIVE IN SPRINGFIELD.

Before the road was completed to Springfield, another locomotive was brought on, from the works of M. W. Baldwin, of Philadelphia. It was called the "Illinois." The track was so far completed that on the 15th of February, 1842, it entered Springfield, being the first one to arrive in the city. George Gregory was the engineer, and T. M. Averitt the fireman. The track was laid along Tenth street to the crossing of Adams. The last half or three-fourths of a mile of the track was only the wooden stringers, the iron not yet having been spiked. The newspapers were not very enterprising, with reference to the latest news, especially when it is considered how wild they were on the subject of railroads only two or three years before.

Ten days after the event, February 25, the following item appeared in the Sangamo Journal:

"The railroad is so far finished that the locomotive occasionally runs upon it, and has drawn at least one heavy load of produce to the river. Under the circumstances of the times, the contractors, Messrs. Duff, Calhoun & Company have done well to complete it thus early. We anticipate that much business will be done on this road in the spring."

Again, from the Journal of March 11:

"Northern Cross Railroad.—We have neglected to notice that the railroad from this place to Meredosia, on the Illinois river, has been completed for a couple of weeks so far as to permit the passage of trains of cars through the whole line. The locomotive has now commenced trips between this city and the Illinois river; and, for the present, we understand it is arranged that the locomotive will leave this city every Monday, Wednesday and Friday, and Meredosia every Tuesday, Thursday and Saturday. We also learn that the steamer "Mungo Park" will run regularly between Meredosia and St. Louis, going and returning three times a week, so as to connect regularly with the train of cars. This arrangement will be of immense utility to our citizens and the traveling community, and will furnish the easy means of conveying to market the produce of a large and most productive region of country."

A contrast in the rate of speed then and now will be shown from the following item from Journal, March 18, 1842:

"On Saturday last, March 11, the cars ran from Jacksonville, thirty-three and a-half miles, in two hours and eight minutes, including stoppages. It is believed that the distance can be passed over in one hour and a half. Trips continue to be made three times per week."

On the 25th of March, the following appeared in the Journal:

"Pleasure trip.—On Monday, March 21, a large party left this city for Jacksonville, filling two passenger cars and another fitted up temporarily for the band of music. They speak in high terms of the hospitality and kindness of the citizens of Jacksonville, of the party there, and the pleasure of the trip."

In that paper of the same date is found the following item:

"During the few days the Springfield and Meredosia railroad has been in operation, and before the public generally were aware of the running of the cars, the receipts from passengers alone have amounted to about seven hundred dollars."

This road was all made by laying long pieces of timber lengthwise with the track—cross pieces were placed six or eight feet apart, to keep the stringers from spreading—flat iron rails were spiked on to the pieces of timber, and then it was ready to receive the locomotive and cars.

After running awhile the engines needed repairing, and the track became uneven, so that the cars ceased to be run by steam. The road was then leased, and mule teams took the place of the locomotives. William D. Baxter & Co. were the lessees.

In May, 1844, in the Springfield papers appeared the following advertisement of the road:

NORTHERN CROSS RAILROAD.

FROM MEREDOSIA TO JACKSONVILLE AND SPRINGFIELD.

The subscribers, having leased the Illinois Northern Cross Railway, are prepared to transport produce, merchandise, furniture, etc., to and from the above mentioned places, on terms as reasonable as can be desired, and by the employment of faithful and experienced agents, and the occupancy of safe and commodious depots, can insure all requisite care and attention to whatever may be entrusted to their commission.

WM. D. BAXTER & CO.,

Receiving, Forwarding and Commission Merchants.
MEREDOSIA, May 10, 1844

Refer to S. M. Tinsley & Co., Mr. J. Bunn, Springfield; Mr. J. G. Lamb, Alton; Collier & Morrison, Mr. J. Simonds, St. Louis, Mo; Small & McGill, New Orleans.

After becoming quite dilapidated, a law was enacted authorizing the sale of the entire road. The sale was effected for a mere trifle, with the stipulation that the parties coming in possession of it, should put it in running order, for the accommodation of the public. The road was sold in 1847, and was afterwards known as the Sangamon & Morgan Railroad. Other changes followed until it became part of the Toledo, Wabash & Western Railroad, and as such, many improvements were made by the company in the operation of the road. In 1858 the company located their repair shops in Springfield, thus giving employment to a large number of employes, who made here their home, and consequently added much to the trade of the city. In 1869 new buildings were erected for their rapidly increasing machine works, at a cost of $75,000.

In 1870 a fine passenger depot was erected in Springfield, at a cost of $36,000. In this building are the offices of the Division Superintendent and other officers of the road located here. A freight house was also erected the same year.

In 1879, the Toledo, Wabash & Western, the Toledo, Peoria & Warsaw and several other roads were consolidated under the name of the Wabash, St. Louis & Pacific Railway Company. Although the details of the consolidation were agreed upon by the stockholders in November, 1879, the business of the new company did not begin until January 1, 1880. The company now own, in 1881, 3,000 miles of railway, and expect to secure other roads, having entered into contracts by which they will soon come into their possession.

CHICAGO, ALTON & ST. LOUIS.

The present Chicago, Alton & St. Louis Railroad was built from Alton to Springfield under an act of the legislature, passed in 1847. By this act, and an amendment to it, the line of the road was intended to run by way of Waverly, in Morgan county, and New Berlin, in Sangamon county. John T. Stuart, while a member of the State Senate, feeling it for the best interest of the road, as well as for the general public, introduced an amendment, which became a law January 29, 1851, by which the company was authorized to build direct from Carlinville to Springfield.

During the session of the legislature in 1848 and 1849, Mr. Stuart introduced the first bill to build a road from Springfield to Chicago, and which passed the Senate and was then sent to the House. The morning after its passage, Mr. Smith, representing Macon in the Senate, moved to recall the bill from the House, assigning as a reason that it was passed in his absence and was interfering with the building of the Great Western and the proposed Illinois Central Railroad. The motion of Mr. Smith prevailed and the bill was recalled and laid upon the table.

At the next session of the Senate in 1850-51, it was thought prudent to pass the measure, not as a whole, but in sections, owing to the opposition manifested the previous session; therefore, Mr. Stuart introduced "An act to extend the Alton & Sangamon Railroad Company, incorporated February 27, 1847, which was passed and became a law February 11, 1851, and by which, authority was given to extend the road from Springfield to Bloomington, and under which that part of the road was built.

At the session of the Senate in 1852, Mr. Gridley, representing McLean county in that body, introduced a bill, the object of which was to further extend the road from Bloomington to Joliet, and which became a law on the 19th of June, 1852, and under which that part of the road was built. By further legislation it was afterwards extended from Joliet to Chicago. By still another act, authority was given to extend the road from Alton to East St. Louis, which, in due time, was built, and which different sections now compose the Chicago, Alton & St. Louis Railroad.

The Chicago, Alton & St. Louis, or the Alton & Sangamon Railroad, by which it was then known, was completed to Springfield in 1853, and an entertainment was given in that city by the railroad company, to a party of excursionists from St. Louis and Alton. The steamboat Cornelia left St. Louis for Alton with the excursionists from that city, at six o'clock on the morning of Thursday, October 6, and being joined by the Alton people, proceeded by rail to Springfield, arriving at two o'clock p. m., where a sumptuous dinner awaited them, in a building erected for a machine shop. Benjamin Godfrey, of Alton, was introduced by Virgil Hickox, as one through whose exertions the road was chiefly built. After a brief address from Mr. Godfrey, and speeches from some others of the party, and dinner had been partaken of by all, the train moved away with its four hundred passengers on the return trip. This was an important event in the history of Springfield, as it opened direct communications with Springfield and the South.

On the 18th of October, 1853, the road was completed to Normal, forming a junction with the Illinois Central, by which passengers could go to La Salle, and from there to Chicago by the Chicago & Rock Island Road. This opened up the first communication from New York city to the Mississippi river. On the 4th of August, 1854, the present road was completed through to Joliet.

By an act of the General Assembly, approved February 14, 1855, the name of the company was changed to Chicago, Alton & St. Louis, and on the 21st of January, 1857, another act was passed, changing it to the St. Louis, Alton & Chicago Railroad Company. February 19, 1859, the name was changed from St. Louis, Alton & Chicago, to Alton, Chicago & St. Louis. On the 18th of February, 1861, it was again changed, making it the Chicago & Alton.

Coming from Chicago to St. Louis, the road enters Sangamon county on section 34, township 18, range 4 west, Williams township, and taking nearly a southwestern course, passing through the townships of Williams, Springfield, Woodside, Ball, Chatham, and Auburn, passes into Macoupin county from section 34, the latter township. The company have seven stations in this county—Williamsville, Sherman, Springfield, Iles Junction, Woodside, Chatham, and Auburn.

OHIO & MISSISSIPPI.

A charter was granted to the Springfield and Pana Railroad Company, February 16, 1857, but no road was ever built under that charter. The hard times, beginning in 1857, followed closely by the war, prevented the prosecution of the work. On the 16th of February, 1865, another charter was granted to cover the same ground, but extending further, under the title of the Pana, Springfield and Northwestern Railroad Company. Forty miles of this road—from Springfield to Pana—was completed and opened for business in March, 1870. During the summer of 1870, it was put under contract to Beardstown, with the intention of extending it to Keokuk, Iowa. The extension was never undertaken.

By an act of the General Assembly, approved March 5, 1867, a charter was granted to the Illinois and Southeastern Railroad Company. This company became possessed of the Pana, Springfield and Northwestern Railroad, giving it a line from Shawneetown, on the Ohio, to Beardstown, on the Illinois river. On the 28th day of March, 1872, through trains commenced running from Shawneetown to Beardstown. Subsequently, the road came into possession of the Ohio and Mississippi Railroad Company, as the Springfield Division of the Ohio and Mississippi, by which it is now operated. The headquarters of the company are at Cincinnati, but having a Division office at Springfield, with C. M. Stanton, Division Superintendent.

The Ohio and Mississippi enters Sangamon county on section 4, township 14, north of range 3 west, Cooper township, and passes through the townships of Cooper, Rochester, Springfield, Gardner and Cartwright, passing into Cass county from section 27, township 17, range 8 west, Cartwright township. The road has eight stations in the county—Breckenridge, Berry, Rochester, Springfield, Bradford, Farmingdale, Richland, and Pleasant Plains.

ILLINOIS CENTRAL.

The Gilman, Clinton & Springfield Railroad Company was incorporated by an act of the General Assembly, March 4, 1867. An organization was effected at Clinton, April 21, 1869. Grading was commenced near Clinton, July 4, 1870, and from that time until the close of the working season, from fifteen to eighteen hundred men were employed along the line. Track laying was commenced at Gilman, February 19, 1871. The entire line was completed, and an excursion train, extemporized at Springfield, visited the ruins of Chicago, starting from Springfield, Saturday evening, October 21, but the road was not regularly opened for business until December 3, 1871. Subsequently the road passed into the hands of the Illinois Central Railroad Company, and is now operated by them under the name of the Springfield Division of the Illinois Central.

Entering the county on section fifteen, Buffalo Hart township, the road runs southwest through the townships of Buffalo Hart, Williams, Clear Lake and Springfield. It has but two stations in the county outside of Springfield, in Buffalo Hart township and Barclay.

SPRINGFIELD & NORTHWESTERN.

In 1869 a charter was secured for a new road, under the name of the Springfield & Northwestern, running from Springfield to Rock Island. A contract was let early in the year 1871 from Havana to Springfield, and work was immediately commenced, and continued until some time during the following year, completing a track from Havana to Petersburg, Menard county, a distance of twenty-five miles. The contractors then failed, and other parties entered into contract to continue and complete the work to Springfield. This last party, in consequence of the hard times, also failed in the fall of 1873, having completed the road to Cantrall. John Williams, of Springfield, then took charge of the road, and in 1874 had the cars running into the city of Springfield. In 1875 the road was placed in the hands of a Receiver and subsequently sold under mortgage, and purchased by Colonel Williams for the benefit of the bondholders. In 1878 a new company was formed which purchased the road from Williams and electing new officers, undertook its management. John Williams was the first President of the new company and was succeeded by John T. Stuart. Subsequently Charles Ridgely became the owner of the principal part of the stock, and in August, 1881, he sold to the Wabash Company, and it is now a part of that system.

CONTEMPLATED ROADS.

The Peoria & Springfield railroad was chartered in 1871, and the entire line was let under contract for grading of the road, in 1872. Grading was commenced at the Peoria end of the road and it was completed to Pekin in 1873. The hard times of that year caused the suspension of all work, and it has since been entirely abandoned. George N. Black, John Williams, John T. Stuart and James C. Conkling, were among the directors on its organization.

The Springfield & St. Louis Railroad was projected about the same time of the Peoria & Springfield road. The same cause is given for the failure of both enterprises—hard times.

The Springfield, Carrollton & St. Louis Railroad Company, and the St. Louis, Jerseyville & Springfield Railroad Company were each organized March 1, 1872. Before work was commenced on either road the hard times of 1873 set in, and all efforts to build the road were abandoned. In 1880 a new company was organized, taking the old name of St. Louis, Jerseyville & Springfield Railroad Company, and began the construction of a line upon the old route. In 1881 the road fell into the hands of the Wabash Company, and was made a part of their system.

The Springfield Southern Railroad Company was organized March 25, 1872, and the Springfield, Macon & Wabash Railroad Company, March 1, to take effect April 4, 1872. No effort was made to build the roads in consequence of the depression in money matters.

CHAPTER IX.

WARS.

Since the organization of the county, its citizens have been called upon, and promptly responded, in two Indian wars, the Mormon and Mexican wars, and the war for the Union.

THE WINNEBAGO WAR.

When lead was discovered in the region of Galena, and it was found profitable to mine it, the white people flocked there in large numbers. For some years previous, the different Indian tribes inhabiting the northern part of Illinois and Wisconsin had been at war among themselves, and in the spring of 1827, a small party of Winnebagoes surprised a party of twenty-four Chippewas, and killed eight of them. The United States commander at Fort Snelling caused four of the offending Winnebagoes to be arrested, and delivered to the Chippewas, by whom they were punished. Red Bird, the Chief of the Sioux, while acting with the Winnebagoes, in an attempt to obtain revenge for the killing of the four members of their tribe, was defeated by the Chippewas. He then determined to wreak his vengeance on the white people, who had assisted his enemies and invaded his country. On the 27th of June, 1827, two white men were killed near Prairie DuChien, and on the 30th of July, two keel boats, carrying supplies to Fort Snelling, were attacked, and two of the crew killed. The news soon spread among the settlers, and upon a call from Governor Edwards, four companies of infantry and one of cavalry were made up in Sangamon county. The cavalry company was commanded by Edward Mitchell, and the four infantry companies by Captains Thomas Constant, Reuben Brown, Achilles Morris and Bowling Green. The whole, under command of Colonel Thomas M. Neale, with James D. Henry, as Adjutant, marched to Peoria, where the regiment was more fully organized, and continued on to Galena. Before their arrival in the Indian country, Red Bird, with six of his warriors, voluntarily gave themselves up to the United States forces, under General Atkinson, to save their tribe from the miseries of war. Thus ended the campaign, and the troops from Sangamon county were ordered home.

THE BLACK HAWK WAR.

In 1804, a treaty was made with certain of the Sac and Fox Indians by General Harrison, at St. Louis, by which they ceded to the United States all their lands on Rock river, and much more elsewhere. This treaty was confirmed by a part of the tribe, in a treaty with Governor Edwards and Augustus Chouteau, in September, 1815, and by another part, in a treaty with the same commissioners, in May, 1816. These treaties were never considered binding by Black Hawk and other chiefs of his tribe. In this connection it will be well to give an account of Black Hawk, and what he says of the treaty of 1804. From a work published by J. B. Patterson, of Oquawka, on the Black Hawk war the following extract is taken:

"Black Hawk, whose Indian name was Muck-a-tan-wish-e-ke-ack-ke-ak (meaning a black hawk) was born at the Sac village (the site of this village was at the present village of Camden, at the Rock river crossing of the Peoria and Rock Island Railroad), on Rock river, in Illinois, in the year of 1767. His father's name was Py-e-sa. His great-grandfather, Na-na-ma-kee (Thunder) was born near Montreal, Canada, and was placed at the head of the Sac nation by a Frenchman who claimed to be the son of the King of France.

"He gave them many presents, such as guns, powder, lead, spears, and lances, and showed them how to use them in peace and war; and also cooking utensils, and many other presents of different kinds. He afterwards sailed for France, promising to return at the end of the twelfth moon.

"They continued to trade with the French for a long time, and until the latter were overpowered by the British. After that event several tribes united and drove the Sacs from Montreal to Mackinac, and thence to Green Bay, where they formed an alliance with the Fox nation, and then retreated to the Wisconsin, and finally to Rock river, from which they drove the Kaskaskias and commenced the erection of their village.

"Py-e-sa succeeded Na-na-ma-kee as war chief, and was killed in an engagement with the Cherokees, who largely outnumbered the Sacs and Foxes. On seeing him fall, Black Hawk assumed command and fought desperately until the enemy retreated. In this battle, he killed three men and wounded several with his own hand, the enemies loss being twenty-eight and Black Hawk's being only seven. After this engagement, he fell heir to the great medicine bag of his tribe, and, after a season of five years mourning, with blackened faces, they determined on avenging the death of Py-e-sa, by the annihilation if possible of the whole Cherokee tribe, and took out a strong army for that purpose.

"Black Hawk succeeded in killing many of them and in finally driving them to their own country.

"His next movement was against the Chippewas, Kaskaskias and Osages, with whom he had seven regular engagements, with a loss of two or three hundred. The enemy retired and Black Hawk and his band returned to their village.

"Spain was then in possession of St. Louis and all the country south and west. The Indians congregated at St. Louis every spring for many years to do their trading. After the Louisiana purchase, the Spanish withdrew from St. Louis and the Americans took possession. Soon after Lieutenant (subsequently General) Zebulon M. Pike, with an escort of soldiers, went up the Mississippi river, calling on the chiefs of the various tribes that dwelt along the banks of the Father of Waters, and made them many presents in the name of their Great Father, the President of the United States, who he told them would always treat them well if they would listen to his advice. A few moons later a Sac Indian killed an American, for which offence he was arrested and confined in the prison at St. Louis. As soon as intelligence of the murderer's arrest and imprisonment reached Black Hawk, he called a council of the head men of his tribe at the Sac village to talk the matter over and consider what was best to be done.

"They resolved to send four of their braves to St. Louis to compromise with the authorities by paying the relatives for the man killed—the only way with them for saving one person who had killed another. Quash-quame and three other men of the tribe were chosen to go on this mission, the result of which was thus related by Black Hawk.

"Quash-quame and his party remained a long time absent. They finally returned dressed in fine coats and wearing medals and encamped near the village.

"Early the next morning the council was convened and Quash-quame and party came in and reported the result of their mission.

"On their arrival at St. Louis, they reported to the American chief and urged the release of their friend. The American chief said his government wanted more land, and if the Sacs and Foxes would give him some in Illinois, opposite Jefferson (barracks), they would release the imprisoned Sac.

"Quash-quame and his party assented to this, and signed a paper by making their marks. When they were ready to leave, their friend was released, but as he was let out of the prison he was shot dead. This was the treaty of 1804, in which all their country in Illinois was ceded to the United States, for one thousand dollars a year, and was the cause of the Black Hawk war, as the chiefs claimed that no one but themselves and head men had authority to make a treaty."

Under this treaty, it was agreed that the Indians should retain possession of the country until it was wanted for white occupancy.

Black Hawk and his people remained in peaceful possession of the country along Rock river, until 1830, when they were notified that they must move across the Mississippi river. They complied with the "notice to quit," and crossed over the Father of Waters and took up their abode on the eastern slope of Iowa, in what came in after years to be known as the Black Hawk purchase, or forty-mile strip.

Ranking under what Black Hawk believed to be a wrongful dispossession of their homes along Rock river, and hunger and want coming to his people in their new homes, they re-crossed the Mississippi in the spring of 1831, and took possession of the site of their old village and corn fields. This movement of Black Hawk excited alarm among the white people who had settled in that part of Illinois, and complaint was made to Governor Reynolds, of Illinois, against their presence. The complaints represented that the Indians were insolent, and had committed many acts of violence. Governor Ford says the Indians ordered the white settlers away, threw down their fences, unroofed their houses, cut up their grain, drove off and killed their cattle, and threatened the people with death if they remained. These acts of the Indians were considered by Governor Reynolds to be an invasion of the State. He immediately addressed letters to General Gaines, of the United States army, and to General Clark, the Superintendent of Indian Affairs, calling upon them to use the influence of the Government to procure the peaceful removal of the Indians, if possible; at all events, to protect the American citizens who had purchased those lands from the United States, and were now about to be ejected by the Indians. General Gaines repaired to Rock Island, and becoming convinced the Indians were intent upon war, he called upon Governor Reynolds for seven hundred mounted volunteers. The Governor obeyed the requisition, and issued a call upon the northern and central counties, in obedience to which fifteen hundred volunteers rushed to his standard at Beardstown, and about the 10th of June were organized and ready to be marched to the seat of war. The whole force was divided into two regiments, an odd battalion, and a spy battalion. The First Regiment was commanded by Colonel James D. Henry, of Springfield.

Black Hawk, becoming convinced that he could do nothing against the force sent against him, retreated across the river, and fearing pursuit from General Gaines, returned with his chiefs and braves to Fort Armstrong, and sued for peace. A treaty was here formed with them, by which they agreed forever to remain on the west side of the river, and never to re-cross it without the permission of the President or the Governor of the State. The treaty of 1804 was thus at last ratified by these Indians. Notwithstanding this treaty, early in the spring of 1832, Black Hawk and the disaffected Indians prepared to re-assert their right to the disputed territory.

Governor Reynolds, as soon as informed of the action of Black Hawk, issued another call for volunteers. General Thomas M. Neale, of the State militia, received the following order:

To General T. M. Neale:—You are hereby commanded to cause six hundred men of your command to meet at Beardstown, on the 22d inst., without fail. I have ordered the Colonels of your brigade to furnish their proportion of men out of their respective regiments, for fear you might not be at home. You will call on the militia nearest the rendezvous. Each company to be composed of fifty men and to elect its own officers. Mounted volunteers are preferred. If none such will offer their services, then you are to draft, which I hope will not be the case.

JOHN REYNOLDS,
Commander in Chief.

April 16, 1832.

The Sangamo Journal of this period contained many articles recounting the atrocities committed by the Indians. The excitement ran high and every able-bodied man was ready to volunteer. The quota of this county was easily raised. As a specimen of the war poetry of the period we quote the following, appearing as original in the Journal:

SONG

FOR THE SECOND EXPEDITION AGAINST BLACK HAWK.

Brave Sangamon hath armed,
All to defend her right—
Arouse, ye bold Kentucky boys,
The foremost in the fight!
Away! away! away!

The flames of war are burning red,
The naked frontier needs your aid!
Huzza for old Kentucky!
Away! away! away!

Virginia and fair Tennessee,
From danger never known to flee,
Show Sangamo your pluck!
Away! away! away!

Now old Virginia's hearts of fire,
Who in the battle never tire,
Remember Washington, your sire!
Away! away! away!

Ye Yankee boys of courage true,
Now show the world what ye can do!
And make the Black Hawk tremble, too!
Away! away! away!

Our answer is the rolling drum
We come! we come! we come!
Forward! our course is to the West—
The war-path is no place of rest!
Away! away! away!

The Kentucky, Tennessee, Virginia, and the few "Yankee boys" then living here, nobly responded, causing grief to some loving wives, whose husbands were thus to be taken from them, probably never to return. Some one whose wife was thus grieving, relates his experience through the columns of his weekly paper, as follows:

Have e're you seen, when you've been called
To scenes of arms and strife,
The tear stand trembling in the eyes
Of your beloved wife?

Have you seen this, then heard her say
With faltering voice—"My dear, (Then pausing and embracing you)
"My dear—don't go—I fear!"

Ah, have you seen and have you heard
Her urge her moving plea—
"I fear you'll ne'er come back, my love,
To these sweet babes and me."

Then you have felt what I have felt,
My resolution tried—
But bracing up my nerves, I said,
"Dear wife don't be afraid."

"We've heard of fearful massacres
Of fathers—mothers slain—
And little babes—as small as ours
All mangled on the plain!

"Then ought I not, with sword in hand,
Go quickly to defend Those little babes and women, who May meet such direful end?"

She nothing said—but while I spoke
She gently pressed my hand,
And ever since her actions say
Go now—defend our land.

Speaking of the Black Hawk war, Ford, in his "History of Illinois," says:

"The united Sacs and Fox nations were divided into two parties. Black Hawk commanded the warlike band, and Keokuk, another chief, headed the band which was in favor of peace.

"Keokuk was a bold, sagacious leader of his people; was gifted with a wild and stirring eloquence, sure to be found, even among Indians, by means of which he retained a greater part of his nation in amity with the white people.

"But nearly all the bold, turbulent spirits, who delighted in mischief, arranged themselves under the banner of his rival. Black Hawk had with him the chivalry of his nation, with which he re-crossed the Mississippi in the spring of 1832.

"He directed his march to Rock river in the spring of 1832.

"He directed his march to the Rock country, and this time aimed, by marching up the river into the countries of the Pottawottomies and Winnebagoes, to make them his allies. Governor Reynolds, upon being informed of the facts, made another call for volunteers. In a few days eighteen hundred men rallied under his banner at Beardstown. This force was organized into four regiments and a spy battalion. Colonel Dewit commanded the First Regiment, Colonel Fry the Second, Colonel Thompson the Fourth, and Colonel James D. Henry commanded the spy battalion. The whole brigade was put under the command of Brigadier General Samuel Whiteside, of the State militia, who had commanded the spy battalion in the first campaign.

"On the 27th of April, General Whiteside, accompanied by Governor Reynolds, took up his line of march. The army proceeded by the way of Oquawka, on the Mississippi, to the mouth of Rock river, and here it was agreed between General Whiteside and General Atkinson, of the regulars, that the volunteers should march up Rock river about fifty miles, to the Prophet's town, and there encamp, to feed and rest their horses, and await the arrival of the regular troops in keel boats, with their provisions. Judge William Thomas, who again acted as quartermaster to the volunteers, made an estimate of the amount of provisions required until the boats could arrive, which were supplied, and then General Whiteside took up his line of march.

"But when he arrived at the Prophet's town, instead of remaining there, his men set fire to the village, which was entirely consumed, and the brigade marched on in the direction of Dixon, forty miles higher up the river.

"When the volunteers had arrived within a short distance of Dixon, orders were given to leave the baggage wagons behind, so as to reach there by a forced march. And for the relief of the horses, the men left large quantities of provisions behind with the wagons.

"At Dixon, General Whiteside came to a halt, to await a junction with General Atkinson, with provisions and the regular forces; and from here parties were sent out to reconnoitre the enemy and ascertain his position. The army here found upon its arrival, two battalions of mounted volunteers, consisting of 275 men, from the counties of McLean, Tazewell, Peoria, and Fulton, under the command of Majors Stillman and Bailey. The officers of this force begged to be put forward upon some dangerous service in which they could distinguish themselves.

"To gratify them they were ordered up Rock river to spy out the Indians. Major Stillman began his march on the 12th of May, and pursuing his way on the southeast side, he came to "Old Man's" creek, since called "Stillman's Run," a small stream which rises in White Rock Grove, in Ogle county, and falls into the river near Bloomingville. Here he encamped just before night; and in a short time a party of Indians on horseback were discovered on a rising ground about a mile distant from the encampment. A party of Stillman's men mounted their horses without orders or commander, and were soon followed by others, stringing along for a quarter of a mile, to pursue the Indians and attack them.

"The Indians retreated after displaying a red flag, the emblem of defiance and war, but were overtaken and three of them slain.

"Here Major Hackelton, being dismounted in the engagement, distinguished himself by a combat with one of the Indians in which the Indian was killed, and Major Hackelton afterwards made his way on foot to the camp of General Whiteside.

"Black Hawk was nearly with his main force, and being prompt to repel an assault, soon rallied his men, amounting then to about seven hundred warriors, and moved down upon Major Stillman's camp, driving the disorderly rabble, the recent pursuers before him. These valorous gentlemen, lately so hot in pursuit, when the enemy were few, were no less hasty in their retreat, when coming in contact with superior numbers. They came with their horses in a full run, and in this manner broke through the camp of Major Stillman, spreading dismay and terror among the rest of his men, who immediately began to join in the flight, so that no effort to rally them could possibly have succeeded. Major Stillman, now too late to remedy the evils of insubordination and disorder in his command, did all that was practicable, by ordering his men to fall back in order, and form on higher ground; but as the prairie rose behind them for more than a mile, the ground for a rally was never discovered; and besides this, when the men once got their backs to the enemy, they commenced a retreat, without one thought of making a further stand.

"A retreat of undisciplined militia from the attack of a superior, is apt to be a disorderly and inglorious flight; and so it was here, each man sought his own individual safety, and in the twinkling of an eye the whole detachment was in utter confusion. They were pursued in their flight by thirty or forty Indians, for ten or twelve miles, the fugitives in the rear keeping up a flying fire as they ran, until the Indians ceased pursuing.

"But there were some good soldiers and brave men in Stillman's detachment, whose individual efforts succeeded in checking the career of the Indians, whereby many escaped that night who would otherwise have been easy victims of the enemy.

"Among these were Major Perkins and Captain Adams, who fell in the rear, bravely fighting to cover the retreat of their fugitive friends.

"But Major Stillman and his men pursued their flight without looking to the right or left until they were safely landed at Dixon.

"The party came straggling into camp all night long, four or five at a time, each fresh arrival confident that all who had been left behind had been massacred by the Indians.

"The enemy was stated to be just behind in full pursuit, and their arrival was looked for every moment. Eleven of Stillman's men were killed, and it is only astonishing that the number was so few.

"It is said that a big, tall Kentuckian, with a loud voice, who was a colonel of the militia, but a private with Stillman, upon his arrival in camp, gave to General Whiteside and the wonder struck multitude, the following glowing and bombastic account of the battle: 'Sirs,' said he, 'our detachment was encamped among some scattering timber on the north side of Old Man's creek, with the prairie from the north gently sloping down toward our encampment. It was just after twilight, in the gloaming of the evening, when we discovered Black Hawk's army coming down upon us in solid column; they displayed in the form of a crescent upon the brow of the prairie, and such accuracy and precision of military movements were never witnessed by man; they were equal to the best troops of Wellington, in Spain. I have said that the Indians came down in solid columns, and displayed in the form of a crescent; and what was most wonderful, there were large squares of cavalry resting upon the points of the curve, which squares were supported again by other columns fifteen deep, extending back through the woods and over a swamp three-quarters of a mile, which again rested on the main body of Black Hawk's army, bivouacked upon the banks of the Kishwaukee. It was a terrible and a glorious sight to see the tawny warriors as they rode along our flanks attempting to outflank us, with the glittering moonbeams glistening from their polished blades and burnished spears. It was a sight well calculated to strike consternation in the stoutest and boldest heart; and accordingly our men soon began to break in small squads, for tall timber. In a very little time the rout became general, the Indians were soon upon our flanks and threatened the destruction of our entire detachment. About this time, Major Stillman, Colonel Stephenson, Major Perkins, Captain Adams, Mr. Hackleton, and myself, with some others, threw ourselves into the rear to rally the fugitives and protect the retreat. But in a short time all my companions fell bravely, fighting hand-to-hand with the savage enemy, and I alone was left upon the field of battle. About this time I discovered not far to the left, a corps of horsemen which seemed to be in tolerable order. I immediately deployed to the left, when, leaning down and placing my body in a recumbent posture upon the mane of my horse, so as to bring the heads of the horsemen between my eye and the horizon, I discovered by the light, of the moon that they were gentlemen who did not wear hats, by which token I knew they were no friends of mine. I therefore made a retrograde movement and recovered my position, where I remained some time meditating what further I could do in the service of my country, when a random ball came whistling by my ear and plainly whispered to me. 'Stranger, you have no further business here.' Upon hearing this I followed the example of my companion in arms, and broke for the tall timber, and the way I ran was not a little."

On the arrival of Major Stillman's command, at Dixon, a council of war was held, in which it was agreed to march early the next morning to the fatal field of that evening's disaster. For some time the soldiers had been living without any regular supplies, but Quartermaster Thomas, anticipating the action of the council, went out in search of cattle and hogs, and before daylight the next morning the army was supplied with some fresh beef, which they ate without bread. When the volunteers arrived upon the battle field they found the Indians gone, a party of seventy of them soon being heard of as having made a descent upon a small settlement on Indian creek, a tributary of Fox river, and within fifteen miles of Ottawa, they massacred fifteen persons, taking two young ladies—Sylvia and Rachel Hall—prisoners. The young prisoners were hurried by forced marches, beyond the reach of pursuit. They were afterwards purchased from their captors.

Returning to Dixon, General Whiteside, the next day, was joined by General Atkinson, but the time of many of the volunteers having expired, no further advance could then be made. The Governor had previously issued orders for raising two thousand additional volunteers, to rendezvous at Beardstown and Hennepin. A volunteer regiment of those just discharged, was organized to remain in defense of the country until the new troops arrived.

On the 15th of June, the new levies had arrived at the place of rendezvous, and were formed into three brigades—General Alexander Posey commanding the first, General Milton K. Alexander the second, and General James D. Henry the third. On the march each brigade was preceded by a battalion of spies, commanded by a major. The whole volunteer force at this time amounted to three thousand two hundred men, besides three companies of rangers, under the command of Major Bogart, left behind to guard the frontier settlements. The object in calling out so large a force was to overawe the Pottawatamie and Winnebago Indians, who were hostile in their feelings towards the whites, and much disposed to join Black Hawk's party.

Before the new army could be brought into the field the Indians had committed several murders. One man was killed on Bureau creek, some seven or eight miles above Princeton; one in Buffalo Grove; one between the Fox river and the Illinois; two about six miles northwest of Ottawa. On the 22d of May, General Atwater had dispatched Mr. St. Vrain, the Indian agent for the Sacs and Foxes, at Rock Island, with a few men as an express, to Fort Armstrong. On their way thither, they fell in with a party of Indians, led by a chief well known to the agent. This chief was called "The Little Bear." He had been a particular friend of the agent, and had adopted him as a brother. Mr. St. Vrain felt no fear of one who was his friend, and who had been an inmate of his house, and who had adopted him as a brother, and therefore approached the Indian with the greatest confidence and security. The treacherous Indian, untrue in war to the claims of gratitude, friendship and brotherhood, no sooner got him in his power than he murdered and scalped him and all his party, with as little compassion as though he had never known him or professed to be his friend.

Not long after the new forces were organized on the Illinois river, Black Hawk, with a hundred and fifty warriors, made an attack on Apple River Fort, within twelve miles of Galena, and defended by about twenty-five men, under command of Captain Stone. This fort was a stockade of logs stuck in the ground, with block-houses at the corners of the square, by way of towers and bastions. It was made for the protection of a scattering village of miners, who lived in their houses in the vicinity during the day, and retired into the fort for protection at night. The women and children, as usual in the day-time, were abroad in the village, when three men, on an express from Galena to Dixon, were fired upon by the Indians, lurking in ambush within half a mile of the village, and retreated into the fort. One of them was wounded, but his companions stood by him nobly, retreating behind him, and keeping the Indians at bay by pointing their guns first at one and then at another of those who were readiest to advance. The alarm was heard at the fort in time to rally the scattered inhabitants.

The Indians soon came up within firing distance, and then commenced a fearful struggle between the small party in the fort, against six times their number of the enemy. The Indians took possession of the log houses, knocked holes in the walls, through which to fire at the fort with greater security to themselves; and while some were firing at the fort, others broke the furniture, destroyed the provisions, and cut open the beds and scattered the feathers found in the houses. The men in the fort were excited to the highest pitch of desperation. They believed that they were contending with an enemy who never made a prisoner, and that the result of the contest must be victory or death to them and their families. The women and children moulded the bullets and loaded the guns for the men, who fought with a fury caused by desperation itself. The loss in the fort was one man killed and one wounded. One of the men who first retreated to the fort, immediately passed on to Galena, and there gave the alarm. Colonel Strode, who commanded in Galena, lost no time in marching to the assistance of the fort, but before his arrival the Indians had raised the siege and departed.

About the time of the siege of the fort, a party of Indians made an attack on three men near Fort Hamilton, in the lead mines. Two of the men were killed, while the other escaped. General Dodge, of Wisconsin, who happened to arrive at the fort soon after with twenty men under his command, made quick pursuit after these Indians, who were chased to the Pekatonica, and there took shelter under the high bank of the river. General Dodge and his party charged upon them in their place of concealment, and killed the whole party, eleven in number, with the loss of three of his own men, mortally wounded, and one who afterwards recovered.

The Indians had now shown themselves to be a courageous, active, and enterprising enemy. They had scattered their war parties all over the North, from Chicago to Galena, and from the Illinois river into the Territory of Wisconsin. They occupied every grove, waylaid every road, hung around every settlement, and attacked every party of white men that attempted to penetrate the country. Their supremacy in the field, however, was of short duration, for on the 20th, 21st, and 22d of June, the new forces assembled on the Illinois river, were put in motion by General Atkinson, of the regular army, who now assumed command of the whole.

General Atkinson, having heard that Black Hawk had concentrated his forces at the four lakes in Wisconsin, and fortified his position, with the intention of deciding the fate of war by a general battle, marched with as much haste as prudence would warrant, when invading a hostile and wilderness country with undisciplined forces, where there was no means of procuring intelligence of the numbers or whereabouts of the enemy.

Eight weeks were now spent in a fruit-search of the enemy, by which time the volunteer force through one cause or another, had been reduced nearly one-half, and such was the wastefulness of the volunteers, that they were frequently one or two days short of provisions before new supplies could be obtained. At this time there were not more than four days' rations in the hands of the commissary; the enemy might be weeks in advance; the volunteers were fast melting away; and General Atkinson found it necessary to disperse his command for the purpose of procuring supplies. Colonel Ewing's regiment was sent back to Dixon; General Posey marched to Fort Hamilton as a guard to the frontier country; Henry, Alexander and Dodge, with their commands were sent to Fort Winnebago; while General Atkinson himself fell back with the regular forces to Lake Koshkenong, where he proposed to remain until the volunteer generals could return with supplies. Henry and Alexander made Fort Winnebago in three days, Major Dodge having preceded them a few hours by a forced march, which so crippled his horses that many of them were unable to continue the campaign.

Two days were occupied at the fort in getting provisions, on the last of which the Winnebago chiefs there reported that Black Hawk and his forces were encamped at the Manitow village, thirty-five miles above General Atkinson, on the Rock river. In a council held between Henry, Alexander and Dodge, it was determined to violate orders by marching directly to the enemy, with the hope of taking him by surprise.

Twelve o'clock, on the 15th of July, was appointed as the hour to march. General Henry proceeded at once to re-organize his brigade, with a view to disencumber himself of his sick and dismounted men, that he might have as little as possible to impede the celerity of his march. General Alexander soon announced that his men were unwilling and had refused to follow, while Major Dodge reported his horses so much disabled by their late march that he could not muster a force worth taking along. General Henry was justly indignant at the insubordination and defection of his companions in arms, and announced his purpose of marching in pursuit of the enemy alone, if he could prevail upon but fifty men to follow him. Directly after this a company of mounted volunteers, with fresh horses arrived to join Major Dodge, then making his force of men and horses one hundred and twenty in number. General Henry's brigade, exclusive of Dodge's battalion, numbered between five and six hundred, but not more than four hundred and fifty had horses fit for service. On returning to his own brigade, General Henry discovered that his own men, infected by association with those of General Alexander, were on the point of open mutiny.

Lieutenant-Colonel Smith, of Fry's regiment, presented to General Henry a written protest, signed by all the officers of the regiment, except the Colonel, against the intended expedition; but these officers had to deal with an officer of rare abilities as a commander of militia. General Henry was a complete soldier; he was gifted with uncommon talent of commanding with sternness, without giving offense; of forcing men to obey without degrading them in their own estimation. He was brave without rashness, and gave his orders with firmness and authority, without any appearance of bluster. In his mere person he looked the commander. In a word, he was one of those very rare men who are gifted by nature with the power to command militia—to be at the same time loved and feared, and with the capacity of inspiring the soldiery with the ardor, impetuosity, and honorable impulses of their commander. General Henry made no other reply to this protest than to order the officers under arrest for mutiny, appointing at the same time Collins' regiment as a guard to escort them to General Atkinson. Colonel Smith, in great trepidation, protested that he did not know what the paper contained when he signed it, and implored the General's permission to consult a few moments with the officers before further steps were taken. This being accorded, in less than ten minutes they were all collected at the General's quarters, manifesting the utmost contrition, and pledging themselves, if forgiven, to return to their duty, and never be guilty of the like offense again. The General, than whom none better understood human nature, made them a few remarks, tempered with dignity and kindness. The officers returned to their duty, and it is but just to say, that from that hour no men ever behaved better.

General Henry took up his line of march on the 15th of July, accompanied by Poquette, a half-breed, and the "White Pawnee," a Winnebago chief, as guides, in hunt of the Indians. After three days' hard marching, the troops reached the Rock river, and on the morning of the 19th, everything was placed in readiness for a forced march. The fresh trail of the enemy had been struck, and the men now felt in better spirits, and were inspired with a lively hope of bringing the war to a speedy close. In the afternoon of the 19th, the command was overtaken with one of those storms common on the prairies, which lasted until two o'clock the next morning. The men, exhausted with fatigue, threw themselves, superleass, upon the muddy earth, covered with water, for a little rest. The rain made it impossible to kindle a fire or to cook, so that both officers and men contented themselves with eating some raw meat and some wet flour, which was converted into a soft dough by the drenching rain.

All were on the march by daylight on the morning of the 20th, and after a hard march, encamped at night upon one of the banks of the four lakes, near where the Indians had encamped the previous night. At this place the men were able to make fires and cook their suppers, and this they did with a hearty good will, having traveled about one hundred miles without tasting anything but raw food, and without having seen a spark of fire. That night they lay upon the ground, many of them with nothing but the sky for a covering, and slept soundly and sweetly. All were in fine spirits and high expectations of overtaking the enemy the next day, and putting an end to the war by a general battle. The march was continued on the morning of the 21st. Major William Lee D. Ewing commanded the spy battalion, and with him was joined the battalion of Major Dodge, of Wisconsin. These two officers, with their commands, were in advance, but with all their ardor, were never able to get out of sight of the main body. About noon of this day the advance guard was close upon the rear guard of the retreating enemy. For many miles before they were overtaken their broad trail was strewn with camp kettles and baggage of various kinds, which they had thrown away in the hurry of their flight. By faint attacks the Indians kept their pursuers in check until they reached the broken grounds on the bluffs of the Wisconsin river.

About four o'clock on the afternoon of the 21st, while the advance guard was passing over some uneven ground, through the high grass and low timber, they were suddenly fired upon by a body of Indians, who had here secreted themselves. In an instant Major Ewing's battalion dismounted and formed in front, their horses being removed to the rear. The Indians kept up a fire from behind fallen trees, and none of them could be discovered except by the flash and report of their guns. In a few minutes General Henry arrived with the main body, when the order of battle was formed. Colonel Jones' regiment was placed on the right, Colonel Collins' on the left, and Colonel Fry's in the rear, to act as a reserve. Major Ewing's battalion was placed in front of the line, and Major Dodge on the extreme right. In this order the forces marched into battle. An order was given to charge upon the enemy, which was promptly obeyed by Ewing's battalion and by Jones' and Collins' regiments.

The Indians retreated before this charge obliquely to the right, and concentrated their main force in front of Dodge's battalion, showing a design to turn his flank. General Henry sent an order by Major McConnell to Major Dodge, to advance to the charge; but this officer being of the opinion that the foe was too strong for him, requested a reinforcement. Colonel Fry's regiment was ordered to his aid, and formed on his right, when a vigorous charge was made from one end of the line to the other.

Colonel Fry's regiment made a charge into the bush and high grass, where the Indians were concealed, and received the fire of the whole body. This fire was briskly returned by the forces under Fry and Dodge, who continued to advance, the Indians standing their ground until the men came within reach of them, then fell back to the west, along the high, broken bluffs of the Wisconsin, only to take a new position amongst the thickest timber and tall grass in the head of a hollow, leading to the Wisconsin river bottom. Here it seemed they were determined to make a firm stand; but, being charged upon in their new position, by Ewing's battalion, and by Collins' and Jones' regiments, they were driven out of it, some of them being pursued down the hollow, and others again to the west, along the Wisconsin heights, until they descended the bluffs to the Wisconsin bottom, which was here about a mile wide and very swampy, covered with a thick, tall grass, above the men on horseback. It now being dark, further pursuit was stopped, and General Henry and his forces lay upon the field of battle.

Early next morning, General Henry advanced to the Wisconsin river, and ascertained that the Indians had all crossed it, and made their escape into the mountains between that and the Mississippi. The Indian loss in this battle of the Wisconsin, as it is known in history, was sixty-eight left dead on the field, and a large number wounded, of whom twenty-five were afterwards found dead along the Indian trail leading to the Mississippi. General Henry lost one man killed and eight wounded. The small loss of General Henry is accounted for from the fact that the Indians had been trained to fire at an elevation to hit men on horseback, but as General Henry had dismounted his forces, the Indians overshot them.

In the various histories of this campaign, Major Dodge is given all credit for the success attained, being spoken of as General Dodge, when it is well known that he only commanded a battalion, and was ranked by several officers, the whole force being under command of General Henry. The reason of this is that all the war news was first published in the Galenian, then the only newspaper published north of Springfield, either in Illinois or Wisconsin, the editor of which, Dr. Philleo, was a member of Dodge's battalion. When he wrote home the news to be published in his paper, he never mentioned Henry, except as a subordinate, or any other officer except Dodge. His letters chronicled the deeds of Major Dodge only, and by calling him General Dodge it was made to appear that he was the commander of the whole brigade, instead of a single battalion attached to it. These letters were copied into every newspaper throughout the Union, and have formed the basis of all the histories of the war, the people abroad being thus deluded into the belief that Dodge was the great hero of the war. Henry was lost sight of, and now in some histories, Dodge is spoken of as the commander in that war, thus throwing out of sight both General Henry and Atkinson, as well as General Zachary Taylor, who, as Colonel, commanded the regular forces.

The day after the battle of the Wisconsin, for want of provisions, it was determined to fall back to the Blue Mounds. Here General Henry was joined by General Atkinson and the regulars, and General Alexander's and Posey's brigades.

After spending two days in preparation the whole force, now under command of General Atkinson, was again on the march in pursuit of the Indians. About ten o'clock the morning of the fourth day after crossing the Wisconsin, General Atkinson's advance reached the bluffs on the east side of the Mississippi. The Indians had reached the bank of the river some time before. Some had crossed, and others were making preparations to cross it. The steamboat Warrior, Captain Throckmorton, descended to the place the day before. As the steamboat neared the camp of the Indians, they raised a white flag, but Captain Throckmorton, believing this to be treacherously intended, ordered them to send a boat on board, which they declined doing. Allowing them fifteen minutes time in which to remove their squaws and children, he fired upon them with a six-pounder, and continued the "fight" about one hour, with a loss to the Indians of twenty-three killed and a large number wounded. The boat then fell down the river to Prairie DuChien, and before it could return the next morning, the land forces, under General Atkinson, had come up and commenced a general battle.

The Indians were encamped on the banks of the Mississippi, some distance below the mouth of Bad-Axe river. Being aware that General Atkinson was in close pursuit, and to gain time for crossing into the Indian country, west of the Mississippi, they sent back about twenty men to meet him, with instructions to commence an attack, and then to retreat to the river, three miles above this camp. Accordingly, when General Atkinson came within three or four miles of the river, he was suddenly fired upon from behind trees and logs, the very tall grass aiding the concealment of the attacking party. General Atkinson rode immediately to the scene of action, and in person formed his lines and directed a charge. The Indians gave way, and were pursued by General Atkinson and all the army, except Henry's brigade, which was in the rear, and in the hurry of pursuit left without orders. When Henry came up to the place where the attack had been made, he saw clearly that the wily stratagem of the untutored savage had triumphed over the science of a veteran General. The main trail of the Indians was plainly to be seen leading to the river lower down. He called a hasty council of his principal officers, and by their advice, marched right forward upon the main trail. At the foot of the high bluff bordering the river valley, on the edge of a swamp, densely covered with timber, driftwood and underbrush, through which the trail led fresh and broad, he halted his command and left his horses. The men were formed on foot and thus advanced to the attack. They were preceded by an advance guard of eight men, who were sent forward as a forlorn hope, and were intended to draw the first fire of the Indians, and to disclose thereby to the main body where the enemy was to be found, preparatory to a general charge. These eight men boldly advanced some distance, until they came within sight of the river, where they were fired upon by about fifty Indians, and five of the eight instantly fell dead or wounded. The other three, protected behind trees, stood their ground until the arrival of the main body under General Henry, which deployed to the right and left from the centre. Immediately the bugle sounded a charge, every man rushed forward, and the battle became general along the whole line. These fifty Indians had retreated upon the main body, amounting to about three hundred warriors, a force equal, if not superior, to those contending against them. It was soon apparent that they had been taken by surprise. They fought bravely and desperately, but seemed without any plan or concert of action. The bugle again sounded a charge. The Indians were driven from tree to tree, and from one hiding place to another. In this manner they receded step by step, driven by the advancing foe, until they reached the bank of the river. Here a desperate struggle ensued, but it was of short duration. The bloody bayonet, in the hands of excited and daring men, drove them into the river, some of them trying to swim it, while others took shelter on a small willow island near the shore.

About this time General Atkinson, with the regulars, and Dodge's battalion, arrived, followed by Posey's and Alexander's men, but the main work had been accomplished before they came up. It had been determined that Henry's men should have no share in this day's glory, but the fates taking advantage of a blunder of General Atkinson, had otherwise directed. After the Indians had retreated into the river and on the island, Henry dispatched Major McConnell to give intelligence of his movements to his commander, who, while pursuing twenty Indians in another direction, had heard the firing where Henry was engaged. General Atkinson left the pursuit of the twenty Indians, and hastened to share in the engagement. He was met by Henry's messenger near the scene of action, in passing through which, the dead and dying Indians lying around bore frightful evidence of the stern work which had been done before his arrival. However, he lost no time in forming his regulars and Dodge's battalion for a descent upon the island. These forces, together with Ewing's battalion and Fry's regiment, made a charge through the water up to their arm-pits on to the island, where most of the Indians had taken their last refuge. All the Indians who attempted to swim the river were picked off with rifles, or found a watery grave before they reached the opposite shore. Those upon the island kept up a severe fire from behind logs and driftwood upon the men, as they advanced to the charge, but most of them there secreted were either killed, captured or driven into the water, where they perished miserably, either by drowning, or the still more fatal rifle. The Indian loss in this battle, known as the battle of Bad-Axe, is estimated at one hundred and fifty killed, as many more drowned in the river, and fifty prisoners taken, mostly squaws and children. The loss of the whites were seventeen killed and twelve wounded.

The twenty men who led General Atkinson astray, were led by Black Hawk in person, and as soon as Atkinson ceased his pursuit, they retreated to the Dells on the Wisconsin river. A number of Sioux and Winnebagoes went in pursuit of him, headed by Decorah, a Winnebago chief, and captured them on the upper Wisconsin river. The prisoners were brought down to Prairie DuChien and delivered up to General Street, the United States Indian Agent. Among the number captured was a son of Black Hawk, and also the Prophet, a noted chief, who formerly resided at Prophet's town, in Whiteside county, and who was one of the principal instigators of the war. Thus ended the Black Hawk war. The militia were sent to Dixon and discharged. Black Hawk and the Prophet were taken east and confined in Fortress Monroe for a time. On the 4th day of June they were set free. Before leaving the fort, Black Hawk delivered the following farewell speech to the commander:

"Brother, I have come on my own part, and in behalf of my companions, to bid you farewell. Our great father has at length been pleased to permit us to return to our hunting grounds. We have buried the tomahawk, and the sound of the rifle hereafter will only bring death to the deer and the buffalo. Brothers, you have treated the red man very kindly. Your squaws have made them presents; you have given them plenty to eat and drink. The memory of your friendship will remain till the Great Spirit says it is time for Black Hawk to sing his death song. Brother, your houses are as numerous as the leaves on the trees, and your young warriors like the sands upon the shore of the big lake that rolls before us. The red man has but few houses and few warriors, but the red man has a heart which throbs as warmly as the heart of his white brother. The Great Spirit has given us our hunting grounds, and the skin of the deer which we kill there is his favorite, for its color is white, and this is the emblem of peace. This hunting dress and these feathers of the eagle are white. Accept them, my brother. I have given one like this to the White Otter. Accept it as a memorial of Black Hawk. When he is far away this will serve to remind you of him. May the Great Spirit bless you and your children. Farewell."

After their release from prison they were conducted, in charge of Major Garland, through some of the principal cities, that they might witness the power of the United States and learn their own inability to cope with them in war. Great multitudes flocked to see them wherever they were taken, and the attention paid them rendered their progress through the country a triumphal procession, instead of the transportation of prisoners by an officer. At Rock Island the prisoners were given their liberty, amid great and impressive ceremony. In 1838 Black Hawk built him a dwelling near Des Moines, Iowa, and furnished it after the manner of the whites, and engaged in agricultural pursuits and hunting and fishing. Here, with his wife, to whom he was greatly attached, he passed the few remaining days of his life. To his credit, it may be said, that Black Hawk remained true to his wife, and served her with a devotion uncommon among Indians, living with her more than forty years.

Black Hawk died October 3, 1838.

After the close of the Black Hawk war Congress voted the munificent sum of twenty-one cents a day to the volunteers. The Sangamo Journal protested vigorously against such injustice, urging that a Congress that voted each member of that body $8 per day for their services, could afford to be a little more liberal with those who periled their lives in a contest with the savage Indians.

Forty-nine years have now passed since the events of the Black Hawk war, and yet justice has never been done the brave men who participated in it, by the United States Congress. A few of the men participating in the war yet live—a very few. Some of them are in need of the necessities of life, and yet nothing is done for them by representatives who annually squander millions of the people's money. Surely, the time has come when something should be done.

Upon the return of the Sangamon county soldiers, a ball was given in Miller's hotel in Springfield, "in honor of General James D. Henry and the brave soldiers lately under his command." The local papers chronicle it as "a pleasant affair."

REMINISCENCE OF THE BLACK HAWK WAR.

In the fall of 1831, the Sangamon Monitor published the names of the company commanded by Captain Iles, which drew out the following from the pen of Major John T. Stuart, and which was written for and printed in the Monitor:

"Having published a list of the names of Major Iles' company in the Black Hawk war of 1832, you would, doubtless, be pleased to know something of the history of that company. The volunteer force assembled in the spring of that year, under the orders of Governor Reynolds, and commanded by General Whitesides; marched to Rock Island, and finding that the Indians had crossed the Mississippi and gone up Rock river, followed them up that stream without any incident worthy of note, until they arrived at Dixon's ferry, (now Dixon).

"Captain Snyder's company had been detached across Rock river, to protect Galena and its neighborhood, but no news had reached the camp at Ottawa of his movements, or of the condition of things in the neighborhood of Galena. The commanding officers at Ottawa were very uneasy and anxious to communicate with Galena. While in camp at Dixon, at midnight the army was aroused by the news of the defeat at Stillman, brought first by one and then another flying from the battle ground. The army of General Whitesides in the early morning, took up the line of march for the battle ground, and arrived there in the early afternoon and found that the Indians had marched up Rock river, leaving their dead on the ground, as well as the killed of the whites, and many slaughtered horses, making a sad sight to behold. Whitesides' army buried the dead and marched back to Dixon.

"The term of service of the volunteers of that army was about to expire and they were anxious to return home. A council of war was held at Dixon, in which it was debated whether to pursue the enemy or march to the Illinois, disband the army and wait for the new levies. After an angry debate, it was decided to march to Ottawa, on the Illinois river, and disband the army. Whitesides' army was then marched to Ottawa and disbanded, burying on the route Mr. Katty and others, murdered by the Indians on Fox river.

"At Ottawa a call was made for volunteers to form a regiment for twenty days, to protect the northern frontier of the State from the Indians during the time that would elapse before the assembling of the new forces. Among those who volunteered were the men whose names you published as composing Iles' company, and who, by common consent, elected Elijah Iles captain—a man then in the prime of life, and popular as a man and a soldier.

"After the disbandment of the army of General Whitesides, the condition of the scattered settlements in northern Illinois was sad indeed. Universal terror prevailed. The Indians, victorious over Stillman, and elated by their victory, had fallen upon the settlements on Fox river, and at other places, and had murdered and scalped some and carried others into captivity. It was understood they were scattered in small parties from the neighborhood of Chicago to the Mississippi river, along the entire line of frontier. Where would they strike next? Would they attack Chicago, or fall upon the defenceless settlers on the borders of the Illinois river and the military tract? Would they aim to cut off Galena from support and attempt to capture it? These questions may seem idle now. They were momentous then.

"It soon became known that a large force of Indians, under the command of Black Hawk, were between Rock river and Galena, and threatening that town, then having about four hundred inhabitants.

"It was believed to be an expedition of much danger and hazard, and therefore it was determined to call for volunteers. Major Iles' company volunteered and was accepted. After due preparation, that company began its march, the bearer of important dispatches. It camped the first night at a grove south of Dixon, believed to be Chalongs'. The next day it swam Rock river at Dixon, thirsted for adventure and was ready, anxious for the fight. They had confidence in each other, and in their modest, but brave, prudent captain. They were accompanied by General James D. Henry, going as a private, but also acting as aid to the Captain, then believed and afterwards proved to be.

"It was splendidly armed; it was composed of first-class material of men, who, if not brave, dare not be cowards. My Captain was one of the best Captains of his time. They were also accompanied, as a volunteer, by a Captain in the regular army, whose name the writer has forgotten, and thus armed, composed, and officered, it is believed no better company of volunteer militia ever marched to what it believed a post of danger and patriotic duty.

"It camped the second night at Buffalo grove. During that night the company expected an attack from the Indians. There were many signs that they were around and about them, and once an alarm was given, and the company mustered under arms. The next morning the company marched towards Galena, and entered the timbers of Apple creek about noon. Here an Indian pony was seen running at large, and some of the boys thought to capture it; but the Captain, believing that it had been let loose as a decoy to induce the breaking of ranks, and to give the enemy an opportunity to make an attack, sternly forbade the effort, and commanded to close the ranks and be ready.

"The company pursued its march, and encamped for the night in the timbers of Apple creek, about twelve or fifteen miles from Galena, and there were many signs that they were watched and followed, but the company was ever ready for an attack. They camped that night near where a fight had taken place between the Indians and Sneyder's company that day or the preceding night. During that night not a man doubted but that the Indians would make an attack before morning. The company was kept under arms all night, and constantly drilled by Henry and others, and picket guards placed all around the encampment. That the Indians were all around the encampment was very manifest, and the writer of this, who stood on picket guard during most of that night, did not doubt but that he heard them more than once; but they made no attack, because the company was too well prepared to receive them. Next morning the company marched into Galena, delivered its dispatches, procured all desired information, and then, in the same good order, marched back to Ottawa, and was disbanded. Most of its members enlisted in the new army, and in Early's spy company.

"That the Indians were in Apple creek timber, during the march of the company to and from Galena, admits of no doubt. They attacked, and came very near defeating Snyder's company, or part of it, a short time before the company marched through to Galena. They attacked Stephenson's company a short time after its return from Galena, and not long after attacked Dement. These attacks were made when these commands were at a disadvantage. Why did they not attack Iles' company? No one of that company doubted but that they were watched and followed by Indians, from the time the company crossed Rock river until its arrival at Galena, and on its return, seeking an opportunity to make an attack. The answer is that the company was handled, armed, and kept such perfect order and readiness for an attack that the Indians were afraid to make it.

"The publication of the muster roll of Iles' company has induced this hurried notice of one of the almost forgotten incidents in the early history of Illinois. Most of Iles' company, after well spent lives, have gone to the grave, and a few still linger on its brink. They were a part of the hardy, brave and adventurous early settlers of Illinois, who fought and drove off the Indians, relieved it of wolves and wild beasts, built its first bridges, school houses and churches, and prepared it for that higher civilization it now enjoys."

THE MEXICAN WAR.

Texas, under Spanish rule, was a nearly uninhabited part of Mexico, lying between Louisiana and the Rio Grande river. It was a fertile region, with a fine climate. The Spanish possessors of Mexico, in the bigoted and bitter spirit that was traditional with the Spaniards toward Protestants, and deeply hostile in feeling from the rather high-handed and vigorous proceedings of General Jackson before and after the cession of Florida, did not encourage the settlement of Texas, preferring to be separated by a wilderness from the United States. In 1821, the Mexicans finally threw off the Spanish yoke, and established an independent government.

About this time the Americans, and especially those of the South, foreseeing the probable spread of the northern part of the Republic to the Pacific, began to look with covetous eyes upon the fine savannas of Texas, as an excellent field for land speculations, and also for extending the southern area, so as to keep its balance in the number of slave States, equal to the free States of the North. It was believed to be the plan of Mr. Calhoun, an able and far-seeing statesman, thoroughly in earnest in the maintenance of slavery, and the political equality of the slave with the free States. Settlements were made by people from the United States. In a few years they grew to be numerous, and came in contact with the rigid Spanish laws, still maintained by the Mexicans. The United States Government made advances toward purchasing Texas, but the Mexicans were resolute in their purpose to hold it, and bring its people under the dominion of strict Mexican law. The Americans resisted this with the settled determination of ultimate separation from Mexico, and probable annexation to the United States.

The Mexicans undertook to reduce them to submission. The Texans, supported by bold and fearless adventurers from the southern States, resisted. The war commenced October 2, 1835, by a battle at Gonzalez, followed by various others. On the 2d of March, 1836, the Texans formally declared independence, which they maintained by force of arms. On the 3d of March, 1837, the United States Government recognized the independence of Texas. England did the same in 1842. Propositions of annexation had been made to Presidents Jackson, Van Buren, and Tyler, successively, by the Texas government, but as often rejected by them, as tending necessarily to a war with Mexico, that power having distinctly and repeatedly declared that she should regard such a step as a declaration of war.

The Democratic party regaining the ascendancy in the election of 1844, made this annexation one of the issues of the Presidential campaign. A majority of the people were in favor of it. The Southern view, however, was not alone in its influence on this decision. Indignities and injuries had been inflicted by the Mexicans on American citizens in that country; its haughty, exclusive and unfriendly spirit awakened strong indignation; and the Pacific coast of California, with the mining regions of the northern interior of Mexico, both nearly uninhabited, were objects of desire to the American people. Thus a wish to extend the bounds of the Republic, and to chastise an insolent neighbor, combined with the ardent wishes of the pro-slavery interest, to lead the nation to determine on a war, somewhat ungenerously, with a neighbor, notoriously too weak and disorganized for effectual resistance to the whole strength of the United States.

On the 12th day of May, 1846, Congress ordered the raising of 50,000 men and voted $10,000,000, to carry on the war. A requisition being made upon the Governor of this State for three thousand men, a call was issued by Governor Ford upon the militia of the State, to volunteer for the war. John J. Hardin, commander of the Third Brigade of the Third Division of Illinois Militia, also issued an address to those who had served under him, urging them to respond to the call. He closed his address by saying "The General asks no one to go where he is not willing to lead. Let volunteers respond by enrolling their names in the service of their country."

On Saturday, May 29, 1846, a public meeting was held in Springfield addressed by Governor Ford, Dr. Merryman, D. L. Gregg, T. Campbell and Abraham Lincoln, on the condition of the country, and the necessity of prompt and united action of her citizen soldiery to sustain her national character, secure our national rights, as well as an everlasting peace. The speeches were in the right spirit—warm, thrilling and effective. Some seventy men responded to the call and volunteered for the war. A glance at the names of those from this county will reveal some who greatly distinguished themselves and reflected honor upon that county in which they resided.

A treaty of peace was signed between representatives of the two governments, February 2, 1848, and formally ratified by the United States government, March 10th, and the Mexican government, March 20th. The Mexicans relinquished all claims to Texas and ceded Upper California and New Mexico to the United States. In return the United States gave them $18,500,000, of which $3,500,000 was due by a former treaty to citizens of this country, and paid them by our government.

Colonel E. D. Baker, who wielded the pen equally as well as the sword, and who commanded the regiment, largely made up from Sangamon county, contributed to the press of that day, the following poem:

TO THE MEMORY OF THE DEAD OF THE FOURTH
ILLINOIS REGIMENT.

Where rolls the rushing Rio Grande,
Here peacefully they sleep;
Far from their native Northern land,
Far from the friends who weep
No rolling drum disturbs their rest,
Beneath the sandy sod—
The mould lies heavy on each breast,
The spirit is with God.

They heard their country's call and came,
To battle for the right;
Each bosom filled with martial flame,

And kindling for the fight.
Light was their measured footstep, when
They moved to seek the foe,
Alas that hearts so fiery, then,
Should soon be cold and low.

They did not die in eager strife,
Upon a well-fought field;
Not from the red wound poured their life,
Where covering foemen yield.
Death's ghastly shade was slowly cast
Upon each manly brow;
But calm and fearless to the last,
They sleep in silence now.

Yet shall a grateful country give
Her honors to their name,
In kindred hearts their memories live,
And history guard their fame.
Nor unremembered do they sleep
Upon a foreign strand,
Though near their graves the wild waves sweep,
Thou rushing Rio Grande.

CHAPTER X.

REMINISCENCES.

In the following chapter is presented a few pioneer reminiscences, in most cases written by pioneers or their descendants. In no case has the compiler of this work attempted to change the diction of the writers, thus giving variety to the style of the reminiscences given.

COTTON PICKING.

Previous to the winter of the deep snow, cotton was raised to some extent in Sangamon county, and it was once thought that it would be a profitable article to raise in the State. Ex-Governor John Reynolds, the "Old Ranger," as he was familiarly known, contributed the following to the State Journal, in 1857, as part of a series of articles on "Pioneer Times."

"Cotton, at as early a day as 1800, and for many years after, was cultivated to a considerable extent in Illinois. My father had resided in Tennessee previous to his emigration to Illinois, in the year above named, and we were tolerably well acquainted with the culture of cotton in that State. At that time I had often heard it computed, that an acre of good cotton land in Illinois, would yield in the seeds, ten or twelve hundred pounds. This was then considered such a crop as would justify cultivation. We cultivated the crop in Randolph county, where the climate is more congenial to its growth than the north of the State.

"At that early day, more than half a century back, the disadvantages in the article of cotton was the labor in picking the seeds from it so as to prepare the cotton for the spinning wheels. There were then no improved spinning jennies invented, and the old fashioned wheels were the only means of preparing the threads for the looms. Two classes of wheels were used at that day; the little wheel, so called, was turned by the spinner, with a crank on an axle running through the centre of the wheel. The other was known as the big wheel. The person spinning on this wheel was always on foot and in motion. The thread was drawn out as the motion was given to the wheel. The operator on the little wheel sat still, and produced the motion with their feet. The big wheel gave opportunity for the display of elegant and graceful motions, which I have often seen performed, even to the steps of the dance, by the modest and pretty pioneer lasses of the olden time.

"The cotton cloth was at that day wove in the country, or at least so far as Illinois was concerned, in looms worked by either men or women. It was rather an art or trade to weave, and people thus accomplished traveled frequently over the country for work. The invention of a cotton jenny, made with wood or iron rollers, was subsequently perfected, which aided much in extracting the seeds from the cotton, but the great invention of Whitney, of the iron saws, propelled by horse power, laid all previous discoveries in the shade and immortalized the inventor. That illustrious man has accomplished as much for the benefit of mankind as the inventor of the steam engine, and has acquired a fame which will hand his name down to posterity as one of the great benefactors of the human race. It will be borne in mind that probably two-thirds or more of the human race are clothed in cotton, and that before this invention, cotton fabrics were almost as costly as silk.

"In the pioneer times of which I have spoken, much amusement and innocent mirth were enjoyed at the "cotton pickings," as these parties were called. The whole neighborhood would assemble on these occasions, and the log cabins, in the evening of a winter's night, would be brushed up to perfect neatness, and made still more attractive by the large fire in the wooden chimney, with rocks under the fore sticks in place of andirons. A large pile of cotton was spread out to dry, so it could be picked the easier. Generally, two sprightly young ladies were elected to divide the heap of cotton, and then the hands began to pick it; so that a contest for victory would excite the two contending parties, by which the more cotton would be picked, and with additional merriment. The last, indeed, was the main object of the young folks. The lady leaders chose their side to pick alternately, and then a general tornado of excitement began—picking, talking, and hiding the cotton, and all sorts of frolicking in the sphere of a backwoods cotton picking. A perfect equality and the best good feeling pervaded the whole company, and each one enjoyed as much innocent merriment as is generally allotted to man. Art or improper education had not spoiled either the morals or the symmetry and beauty of their persons; but they exhibited the superior workmanship of Nature over the foolish fashions of wealth, without sense, and spurious refinement without taste. The words of Nature's poet involuntarily forces itself upon us:

“Yes, let the rich deride and the proud disclaim
The simple blessings of the lowly train;
To me more dear, congenial to my heart,
One native charm than all the gloss of art.”

“Frequently, at these gatherings, the youngsters presented masterly models of symmetry and beauty, and such that neither wealth nor fashion can ever surpass. But as the pen cannot describe the beauty and brilliancy of human excellence, the comeliness of the figures of the early pioneers of Illinois must pass away and be forgotten.

“At these ‘cotton pickings’ love always became the ruling theme, as this passion always will occupy the virtuous and elevate the heart; and many a pioneer courtship and marriage received their date from some such gathering. But those happy times have passed away, and the race has now well nigh passed away with them.”

BY GEORGE BRUNK.*

“I emigrated from the State of Ohio, leaving Fort Harrison and arriving in the ‘St. Gamage country’ in the fall of 1821, making the first track that could be followed to the forks of the ‘St. Gamage’ to the head of the Okaw.

“The first cabin I saw was where the village of Rochester now stands. There were no settlers on the north fork of the St. Gamage, except a few in and about Mechanicsburg. But above that point, there were none except where Decatur now stands, a man by the name of Stephens having made a settlement there. I found Elijah Iles and Charles R. Matheny where is now the city of Springfield. The Kickapoos were here then, and I have had many a social hunt with Bassena and Joe Muney, the chiefs of that nation.

“In the spring of 1822, myself and the Dillons raised a cabin, broke the prairie and planted corn in Tazewell county, where stands the town of Dillon. There were no settlers on the east side of the Illinois river from thence to the lake, except Mr. Kinzie’s, where the city of Chicago now stands.

“On my return I crossed the Illinois river by putting my wagon in two Indian canoes and swimming my horses alongside. On the west bank I found Abner Eads and another settler. During that fall the land in Sangamon county came into market. The first entry was made by Israel Archer, being the west half of the northwest quarter of section eight, township fourteen north, range four west, and the tract of land on which now stands the present Cotton Hill Methodist Church.

“It is well known now that Robert Pulliam built the first cabin in Sangamon county. The first barn was built by Mr. Rogers, near Athens, in what is now Menard county.

“In the spring of 1826, J. Miller and myself, left Sangamon county for the lead mines on Fever river. We fitted out in Peoria, and started in a northwest direction, carrying our provisions on our horses. In consequence of being unacquainted with the route we missed our course, and suffered almost starvation for three days—so much so that all the nourishment we had was a fish about as long as my hand, and coffee made from the boiling of a coffee sack. With hard travel, and greatly fatigued, we reached Fever river in seven days, where we found a few miners. I believe we were the first from Sangamon county. In a few days we heard of Lake Phelps being there also. I am not able to say whether he landed previous to us or not.

“Much has been said about the origin of the word ‘Sucker,’ in its application to the people of Illinois. Late in the fall of that year I was standing on the levee, in what is now Galena, watching a number of our Illinois boys go on board a boat bound down the river, when a man by the name of Walker, a Missourian, stepped up and said:

* Written in 1859, as a contribution to the Old Settlers’ Association.

"Boys, where are you all going?"

The ready reply was.

"We are going home."

"Well," said he, "you put me in mind of the 'suckers'—up in the spring, and down in the fall."

"Those who stayed over received the humble name of 'Badgers.' That was the first time I ever heard the term 'sucker' applied to the people of Illinois. After that, all Illinoisans were considered suckers, and when Judge Sawyer came to the mines, he was called 'King of the Suckers.'

"That same fall, Van Noy was hung in Springfield, the first in the county.

"In the spring of 1827, a great number of Missourians came to the mines. The Illinois boys returned the compliment of the Missourians by saying that 'Missouri has taken a puke,' and after that all the people from that State were called 'Pukes.'

"At this time, we had a scrimmage with the Winnebago Indians, which has been made the subject of history. I returned to Sangamon county in the fall of 1828, from my northern tour.

"The winter of 1830-31 was the winter of the deep snow. It was with the greatest difficulty we could find our shocks of fodder, they were so enveloped in the snow. My father-in-law lost his life in the snow-drifts on the prairies of Sangamon. Game, which had heretofore been always plenty, was nearly destroyed by the cold. Then was the time to try men's metal. The men of our day think that they see hard times. They forget the want of conveniences and privations encountered by the pioneers—oftentimes compelled to wade through the streams up to the arm-pits and break ice to get the teams across, and, to cap all, to ride through perfect fields of fire, caused by the burning grass of the prairies, in the fall and winter, and lie out all night wrapped in a blanket on the cold, bleak prairies. And yet, freed as is the present generation from such privations, we hear more grumbling from them than from men who had in reality to earn their bread by the sweat of their brow.

"I am now in my fifty-fifth year, and claim to be the father of eleven children, and can say with certainty that I have never been intoxicated, have never used tobacco in any shape or form, or any narcotic, and never was sued for debt of my own contracting."

AUBURN AND VICINITY FORTY YEARS AGO—BY

M. G. WADSWORTH.

"The young people of the present day can have but inadequate conception of the appearance of this country forty years ago. The prairies were generally a trackless waste, save the Indian trails that were still visible, and an occasional, and rarely used wagon track. The settlements, with very rare exceptions, were confined to the timber line. When the writer first knew this region, there were but two fields fenced between Old Auburn and the farms along Lick Creek. One of them belonged to George Eastman, on the west side of Panther Creek, (now a part of John L. Mason's farm), and the other was owned by Platt S. Carter, now of Loami township, and is included in J. M. Lochridge's farm. No one resided on either of these places, though Mr. Carter had a barn built and an unfinished house, into which he moved the following winter. The first settlers, who were almost exclusively from Virginia and Kentucky, universally selected their land with a view to its contiguity to the forests, and embracing a good proportion of the same, not seeming to think it probable that the vast prairies would ever be occupied. Indeed, any man who bought and improved land out in mid-prairie, at that day, was laughed at for his folly. He labored under several disadvantages, it is true. The wild prairie grass growing to a height of five to seven feet, was the nursery of myriads of horse flies, that, in hot weather, tortured the stock fearfully. Then, in the winter, stock owned by prairie farmers, suffered terribly from the bleak winds, as hardly any one had any better shelter for his animals than a rail fence, and, during severe weather, if not kept up, they would find their way to the woods for comfort.

"The first houses were all unbewn log cabins. In 1840, a few of the most prosperous had begun to 'put on style,' and there were a number of story and a half mansions of hewed logs. Some people even were so extravagant as to have their houses clapboarded, and there were in Southern Sangamon a number of small frame houses, and an occasional small brick building. The lumber used at that day was all hard oak, walnut, cherry, ash, sycamore. Pine lumber had not been introduced here, there being no railroads, and to haul it in wagons from St. Louis or Alton, would make it an expensive luxury.

"Could the farmers of the present day have the privilege of comparing the stock of horses, cattle and swine of this country, of forty years ago, with that of the present day, they would almost be led to swallow the theory of evolution, so remarkable has been the change and improvement. But in no direction, perhaps, has there been so marked a progress as in the methods of farming and implements. My recollection extends back to the time when plows with wooden mould boards were used altogether. These would be considered very inefficient implements now, but were looked upon then as the best that could be devised. But few of them would 'scour,' and the plowman was compelled to keep a paddle hanging to one of the handles, to clean his plow off at each end, or oftener. The average depth of plowing was from two to three inches, and the slovenly habit of 'cutting and covering' (taking several inches more 'land' than the plow could turn) prevailed with most farmers.

"As markers and corn planters at that time were unknown, this was the common modus operandi of planting corn: A man with a pair of horses and a breaking plow 'laid off' the rows, running below the breaking, in order to make his plow 'scour' (the cross rows having previously been made with a single corn plow). The dropper followed along behind with the seed in a basket or bucket, and another man with one horse and a shovel plow, or 'bull tongue,' which, run in the side of the furrow, left a small ridge upon the seed. By this slow process, seven to ten acres could be planted in a day. It being before the day of double corn planters and of cultivators, either a one-horse 'turning plow' or a shovel plow was used to 'tend' the crop. Twenty to twenty-five acres was all that one hand could take care of, and the rule was to plow it three times. Thirty bushels per acre was considered a fair crop, though hard workers made their land produce forty and even fifty bushels.

"For a crop of oats, as the previous year's corn stalks were usually plowed under, rendering the use of a harrow, to cover the seed and smooth the ground, impracticable, the top of a tree was hitched to and dragged over the ground. Wheat was managed the same way, and, of course, failed as often as it succeeded.

"At the time here spoken of, a field of timothy grass or clover was a rare sight. The prairies yielded innumerable tons of wild hay, and any man could have all he wanted for the cutting. There was no mowing machinery—the good old fashioned scythe, with muscle to propel it, sufficed to lay from one to two acres per day, and as reapers and headers were as yet uninvented, the cradle was the only dependence to fell the grain. Threshing, except among the largest farmers, was done upon the barn floor, two, three, or four horses walking in a circle over the grain until it was separated from the straw, after which it was cleaned with a fanning machine. If a man had no barn of his own he borrowed one for the purpose.

"Mules had not come into use at that time. Many thought it wicked, and a violation of the laws of nature to raise them. Mule colts, occasionally, might be seen, but they were sold to some buyer for southern use, and taken away generally in the fall after foaling.

"Much of the breaking was done by oxen, nearly every farmer owning one or more yoke of these slow but sure beasts. Raw prairie was always broken, at that day, with teams of three or four yoke, which would turn over two or three acres per day.

"Forty years ago, cooking stoves, save an occasional one in the towns, had not come into use. Everything was cooked by the fireplaces, which every house contained, and were built to receive wood three or four feet in length. Nearly everything was cooked in a skillet or a Dutch oven, both being supplied with a lid with a raised rim, upon which coals were piled. It was hot and laborious work for the women to cook by a fireplace, but the meals thus prepared were not to be excelled.

"Although the red man's camp-fire at the time of which I write, no longer threw its ruddy glare over the trunks of the forest monarch, he having some years previous abandoned this for more successful hunting ground, much wild game still lingered. Deer abounded in the broad prairies between Apple creek and the east of Sugar creek, and I have frequently seen them within a mile of Old Auburn, and have seen wolves within the limits of the town. Wild turkeys still abounded in the woods, in their season, flocks of prairie chickens, vast enough to darken the air as they flew, might be seen any hour in the day. Every winter the sharp shooters of this community, would make up parties of four or five men, and each with its wagon and team, bedding, provisions, cooking utensils, rifles and ammunition, would drive to the wilds of Christian county, remain five or six days, generally returning home with six or eight deer. The rifle was almost universally used, and the old hunters looked with supreme contempt upon any man or boy who could content himself with a shot-gun. Even squirrels, prairie chickens, geese and ducks were hunted with the rifle.

"The clothing of the early resident was fashioned exclusively of homespun. Every farmer kept sheep, every home had its spinning wheel, and every wife and daughter could extract music of a practical nature from this instrument. Looms were convenient too. The men and boys all wore jeans, either yellow, brown or blue, and the mothers, wives and daughters were arrayed in linsey, usually striped or checked. At the date of which I write, calico had begun to be worn, but was laid aside, for woolen, in cold weather. The sturdy pioneers of western or southern origin, looked upon the eastern men who occasionally found their way out here, dressed in broadcloth or cassimere, as Yankee upstarts. Indeed, the New England and New York emigrants were regarded with suspicion. Some of the first comers were clock peddlers from Connecticut, who fleeced the people, and a prejudice was engendered that did not entirely die out with that generation. Besides this unfavorable introduction, many of the eastern settlers came hither, full of conceit about methods of farming, and undertook to give their new neighbors the benefit of their experience, not realizing that the Illinois prairies required quite different treatment from New England hills. I am glad to say that the feeling thus engendered has almost entirely passed away, but it was quite a formidable and disagreeable element in society, forty years ago.

"Apropos of the above, the western people of the early days, entertained a supreme contempt for a man who attended to the milking. The women here did all the milking. No matter if there were three or four men about the house, and but one hard worked woman, the farmer couldn't degrade himself by adopting this Yankee innovation. I have frequently known young men, when contracting to work by the month on farms, to ask if they were expected to milk. If this was required, either negotiations were broken off, or several dollars were added to the price.

"The young people of the present day, attending school in nicely painted and ornamented comfortable structures, furnished with all the modern educational appliances, would gaze with astonishment at the rude and crude accommodations of two score years ago. At that time, there were four schools (taught only in the winter,) within a radius of a few miles of this place. One of these was taught in the Old Cumberland church, a log building, four miles north east; there was one in Auburn, a rude frame house of about fourteen by sixteen feet; a small brick building near A. S. Orr's, and another two miles further up the timber. Both of these were used, when necessary, for religious services on Sunday, as there were no meeting houses on the timber above the Cumberland Presbyterian Church, above mentioned.

"The scholars sat upon bare benches, made usually of slabs, with four legs. Many of the scholars had never seen or heard of such a thing as a desk. Reading, spelling and writing, with geography, grammar and arithmetic, for the 'advanced' scholars, constituted the studies. The rod, and a great deal of it, was an indispensable reliance as an educator.

"Singing classes were sometimes taught, Mr. John Baker, of Lick Creek, being the only teacher within reach. He taught vocal music by the 'patent' or 'buck-wheat' notes, the Old 'Missouri Harmony' being the work generally used, the major part of whose tunes were in the minor strain, and as the young folks flocked in for miles around, crowding the houses where they were held, old 'Consolation,' 'Ninety-Fifth,' 'Jefferson' and 'Russia' would waken the echoes.

"At that day, very few buggies or carriages were seen. Nearly everybody went to meeting on horseback; the wives frequently riding behind their liege lords. Often a young lady was taken on the horse behind her lover, though each girl had generally a steed of her own. A horse, saddle and bridle was the goal of every young man's or woman's desires, when growing up.

"Springfield was only a limited market. There being no means of transportation from there, there was no demand, save a local one, for grain, pork and other productions, which was soon supplied. I have known corn hauled to Springfield, from this vicinity, fourteen or fifteen miles, and sold for five cents a bushel. Of course, none but a renter sorely needing money, would undertake to haul corn to Springfield at such a price.

"Alton was, at that day, the principal market for the farmers of Central Illinois. It wouldn't do to haul corn so far, at ten or fifteen, or even twenty cents a bushel, so the corn was fed to cattle and hogs, mainly to the latter, large droves of which were driven down in the early winter, a number of neighbors combining together. A wagon was driven by one of the men, in which to deposit the swine that might, perchance, 'break down.' The hog drivers walked. These droves were sometimes so extensive as to fill the road for half a mile or more.

"One of the pleasantest episodes of the writer's boyish life, was a trip to St. Louis, with a company of wagons, during the Indian summer season of 1841. There were some ten or a dozen wagons, all laden with wheat. Provisions, cooking utensils, bedding and a supply of horse feed were taken, the weather being so fine as to allow the company to spread their couches beneath the wagons. It was customary to take bread and pies ready baked; with sometimes a boiled ham, but coffee was made and meat fried by the fire, improvised on the ground. There was no lack of dry fuel along the road in the woods, and no objection to its being picked up. After the men had supped, the evening, until bedtime, was spent in smoking and telling yarns, the flickering flames throwing a ruddy light over the merry group. The camping ground was always selected, if possible, in the woods. These trips, going and coming, usually occupied about a week. The teamsters brought back groceries, clothing and other family necessities for themselves, and often loads of goods for the Springfield merchants, receiving so much for each hundred pounds.

"Forty years ago, the people of this vicinity were just beginning to taste the sweets of a post-office close at home. The new Springfield and St. Louis stage-road, running through Chatham and Auburn, had recently been established. The old route lay through Sugar Creek timber, some two or three miles east of this. The "Sugar Creek Postoffice" had been kept, until this change, at John L. Drennan's, which was a 'stage stand,' as the place was called where the four stage horses were changed on each trip for fresh ones. By this arrangement, Auburn people were five miles from the postoffice, and the residents up towards the head of the timber, eight to ten miles.

"At that time, the question of cheap postage and pre-payment had not yet engaged the attention of our wise men. Letter postage was all the way from six to twenty-five cents, dependent upon distance. The family of the writer had twenty-five cents to pay on many a letter from eastern friends, during the early forties. The mailing business was much more complicated then than now, for all letters had to be way billed, and each letter's destination, rates, etc., recorded carefully in a book kept for the purpose, which contained a column for paid, another for unpaid, and another for free letters.

"Forty years ago there was but one steam grist mill in the county, south of Springfield. This stood just about where the Chicago & Alton road crosses the branch, near what is now known as Anderson pond, north of town. The engine and works in the mill had been removed from Waverly, by Asa and George Eastman. This mill was only run here two or three years, I believe, and the works were transferred to Springfield. The building was occupied for several years afterwards by David Eastman for finishing leather, he having a tanyard on the premises.

"At the time of which I write, there were two watermills in this township, both of which ground corn and wheat, and each had a saw mill connected with it. One of these was owned by Jacob Rauch, the father of the Rauch boys, and stood on the south side of the creek, nearly opposite the present Rauch's mill. The other mill was owned by E. & W. D. Crow, and was located due west of Old Auburn, on a site now owned by John Garber, just northeast of his dwelling, on the west bank of the creek. 'Crow's mill pond' was a favorite resort by crowds of men and boys, on summer Saturday afternoons, for swimming exercises. The swimmers frequently rode their horses into the pond, and the steeds, swimming with their nude riders, drew out great applause from the multitude on the banks.

"The currency of the country, forty years since, was quite a different matter from that of the present day. 'Wild-cat money' from hundreds of banks, scattered over the country, was in circulation. Our own 'State bank paper' was largely used, but there was a discount upon it. Money of the Missouri bank was always reliable, and generally preferred to gold. In silver, the old Spanish coins prevailed, and the 12½ and 6¼ cent pieces possessed no higher value than the dimes and half dimes. They were distinguished as 'long bits' and 'short bits'—'long picayunes' and 'short picayunes.' Copper coins were not used, and a picayune was the lowest sum recognized. If an article wasn't worth a picayune, it wasn't worth anything. I well recollect how indignant some of the old residents were when asked to pay postage on newspapers—two, three or four cents. At that time the privilege of franking the letters was about all the compensation the Auburn postmaster received for getting up to 'change the mail' once or twice in the night, every night in the year, and performing the duties of postmaster; yet it was difficult to convince some of these worthies that if the postmaster didn't collect all the moneys due the department, he must suffer loss.

"In 1840, a large amount of land in the country was as yet unentered. Thousands of acres in the broad prairie to the west and east of Sugar creek timber were open to settlers, at $1.25 an acre. Most of the land along Panther creek, however, had been entered by speculators. John Griggs, of Philadelphia, owned immense tracts, and his agent, David B. Ayres, at Jacksonville, sold it to settlers at $3 to $5 per acre. Many of the farms along Panther creek, between Irwin's (then known as Harlan's) grove and the head, were made of the Griggs land.

"The pioneers supposed that the value of timber land would increase indefinitely. Hedges for the prairie had not been thought of, and there was no knowledge of the vast fields of coal underlying this whole expanse of country. Consequently, believing that the demand for wood for fuel, and rails for fences, must constantly increase as the prairies became settled, they held on to their forest acres with an iron grasp. The discovery of coal in this region, and the utilization of the Bois D'Arc tree for hedges on the Western prairies, may certainly be counted among the notable events of the nineteenth century. Could our fathers have been told that farms of whole sections could so easily be fenced, splendid houses built and provided with fuel, without the aid of wood land, they would have thought it incredible.

"Pulmonary consumption, so prevalent now, was almost unknown among the early residents. Living in log houses, generally unplastered, with open fireplaces, they breathed pure air, and having regular sleep, and dressing healthfully, they were afflicted with but few physical ailments, save malarial ones.

"There were but few holidays in the early days. But little notice was taken of the Fourth of July. Frequently the riflemen of the neighborhood would gather together on Christmas and indulge in shooting matches. The grandest day in the year to both men and boys was election day. The State and county elections of that day were held in August. This being before the day of township organization, this election precinct (Sugar Creek precinct), comprised a large scope of country—indeed, if I recollect rightly, some three or four townships. Forty years ago, the voting place for this precinct was John L. Drennan's, (the place now occupied by Benjamin F. Drennan.) Afterwards it was transferred to a house just this side of the C. P. Church. Nearly every boy in the precinct, old enough to ride a horse, accompanied the fathers or brother, and all spent the day. Liquor was usually available, and drunken men and fights were often witnessed. Horse racing was a common pastime at elections. Voting was a slow and tedious process. The clerks recorded the name of the voter, and after it the name of each candidate voted for, which were called out by the voter in rotation.

"At the time to which this sketch refers—only about twenty-two years after the first white man's cabin was erected in 'the San-gam-ma country,' as the early comers called it, most of the pioneers were yet living here, mainly, people in the prime of life. They were an honest, friendly, unassuming, industrious class of people, generally, who were content to make a fair living and keep out of debt. The mania for accumulating illimitable acres had not yet been developed. No man felt envious of another's prosperity. There was no desire evinced to overreach a neighbor in a trade; to live in a finer house, or to dress better than anyone else. The milk of human kindness permeated society. The people were hospitable to a fault. A person in distress, or needing help in any form, had but to signify it and it was invariably forthcoming.

"The first comers—principally from the hilly regions of Virginia and Kentucky, were enraptured with the beautiful country spread out before them. The boundless prairies coated with luxuriant grass, affording faithful indications of the marvellous possibilities of crops concealed beneath, and the facility with which they could be developed; the herds of deer and other game that roamed the plains—sights so dear to the hunter's heart—led the pioneers to send back enthusiastic accounts of the country to the friends they had left behind. Their attractive representations brought others, and 'the San-gam-ma country' came to be known as the farmers' paradise.

"I will conclude this sketch by detailing a case of

EARLY RASCALITY.

"In the winter of 1842 (I think it was), a trunk belonging to a mail agent, of Springfield, named Brown, was cut from the rear part of the stage, while it was crossing the bridge over Panther creek, between Maynard's and Harland's Grove. The coach was making its down trip, in the night, as usual, and that place was doubtless selected for the deed on account of the speed of the team being checked while crossing.

"Crime was so rare a thing in country places, at that day, that the affair created great excitement throughout the country. It was difficult, at first, to obtain a clue to the perpetrator, though the impression prevailed that the mischief had been done by some one living in the neighborhood. The trunk contained clothing, some specie, some counterfeit money (carried for detective purposes), a stock of fine cigars for Mr. Brown's own smoking, &c. It was partly through the cigars that the guilty one was detected. John Kennedy, a young man of about eighteen, living with his parents on the Harlan place, was very liberal with a lot of fragrant Havanas at the Cumberland Church, the next Sunday, dividing them around among the irreverent boys who made a practice of going punctually to meeting, and remaining out of doors, to discuss horseflesh during service. The writer had the pleasure of puffing one of them, and the memory thereof is still fragrant—as was the cigar.

"The trunk, after being partly rifled, was concealed in a corn shock in the field, just east of the bridge. Several more little things shortly leaked out, that, combined, directed suspicion to the right quarter. One of them was this: The very afternoon of the robbery, Kennedy was at the postoffice in Auburn, and asked Mr. Wadsworth, the postmaster, what time the stage came down, and being informed, rode off towards the north.

"Evidence being deemed sufficient, a warrant was issued and served by Arny R. Robinson, of Springfield, then an officer. Mr. Brown and another man accompanied. Kennedy denied the theft at first, but being confronted by the testimony, soon confessed the deed, produced the money, and led his captors to where the trunk was hidden.

"Kennedy was consigned to jail, and before the day fixed for the trial, contrived, with two fellow prisoners (one confined for horse-stealing, the other for breach of trust), to escape. They fled west, and on Spring creek two of them stole a horse apiece, and made their way to St. Louis. A description of two of the fugitives was advertised, but for some unaccountable reason, a description of Kennedy was omitted. A detective saw Kennedy and his companion in a barber's shop, recognized the latter by the description, and took him. Kennedy lost no time in getting out, aboard a boat, and down the river. He found means to communicate with his family, his father soon followed, and in a few months afterward, the remainder of the family. They settled at Natchitoches, Louisiana.

"Kennedy was never captured for the above crime."

BY S. C. HAMPTON.

"My father, Samuel Hampton, settled in Sangamon county in the fall of 1830, near Mechanics-burg, and removed to the village of Springfield, next year. We lived in the lower rooms of a two-story log house, and Sullivan Conant occupied the upper rooms with his family, having come from Massachusetts in 1831. Father Conant says his wife thought she could scrub her floor as they did in their native home, and in the attempt almost drowned us out of house and home. Mother Conant used to tell that one of her earliest recollections of Springfield was a little urchin, with a black, curly head, full of mischievous pranks. That curly headed boy and her little black eyed daughter, in their manhood and womanhood, became man and wife, and under the blessing of a kind Providence, have become father and mother of a large family of children, and been blessed with a liberal share of worldly prosperity. Five of our children still live, two are dead. Mother Conant lived and died a christian, many years ago. Father Conant still lives, four score and one years of age, a well preserved man, honored and blessed by eight living children and many grand-children, and by all who know him. One of the earliest things I recollect was, we lived in a log cabin near the old cemetery. We slept on one feather bed and covered with another in winter. When we had a drifting snow-storm, we would have an extra job in the morning of shoveling the snow out of the house, but the children enjoyed better health then than many who are confined in air-tight houses, heated with air-tight stoves. On one occasion, Mr. Erastus Wright gathered all the boys in town and had them clean up the court house yard, and after the job was done, took us down to old Father Dickey's and treated us to beer and cakes, and we all felt happy over it. I well remember the immense political gathering of 1840, with its log cabin on wheels, its hard cider barrels, its coonskins and live coons grinning over the dead roosters carried in procession. I well remember the sad day in 1844, when, in attempting to raise an ash pole, it fell, killing Mr. Brodie, and maiming for life the brother of my wife. To show you how we had to work and how we were paid, I will relate a little of my experience. I, with a younger brother, worked on a brickyard for old Mr. Hay, who long ago passed away to his rest. It took both of us to do the work of one boy, and for this we got twenty-five cents a day and boarded ourselves. Many a day have I worked with a chill on, and then lay down until the fever abated, but we had some good company. Judge Milton Hay and his brothers, J. Addison and Theodore, moulded the brick, while we off-bore them. Money was scarce then. We boys hardly ever saw any, except once in a while we would get twenty-five cents to go to a show. They would make us take orders on the stores. I recollect one show that came, and I had to have a decent cap to go with, for in those days we boys wore seal skins, not the seal of to-day, but which looked more like hog skin with the hair cut short. Well, I went up to the store before breakfast and picked out a cap for one dollar; went back for my order, and when I returned the proprietor asked one dollar and twenty cents as soon as he saw the order. I told him he had offered it to me for a dollar. He said, before breakfast it looked like rain, and that they would have a dull day, but it had cleared off, and they could not sell so cheap. So after that I prayed for dull days for that store."

HUNTING EXPERIENCE OF R. W. DILLER.

"In regard to my hunting experience, I would say, a very few days after my arrival, November, 1844, my brother-in-law, Mr. R. F. Ruth, took me in his buggy just south of where the Junction coal shaft now is, to try my hand in shooting prairie chickens. The birds were feeding in a corn field, and as it was near sundown, they commenced their flight for roosting in the prairie. You have heard of 'buck ager;' well, I had the 'chicken ager,' and for the life of me ! could not get a shot, or did not shoot at all. Mr. Ruth until to-day often amuses the friends by describing my effort—pointing here, then there, mimicing my performances. There were thousands of them flying within shot, but they were bigger game than I was used to, so I was scared; but I got bravely over that, as my friends can testify. He killed several of them as they lit on the trees, while I found a flock of quail, and peppered them, as I was used to in the East. He laughed at me for wasting ammunition on such small fry, for 'we net them,' he said; and I afterward found such was the case, and had much sport in doing so, in company with Robert Irwin, Caleb Burchall, John C. Spring, Bella Webster, S. B. Opdyck, George L. Huntington, Captain Diller, Henry Coon, and others, and many funny incidents could be related happening on our hunts.

"The shotgun was little used in those days; the long-barreled Kentucky rifle was the old settler's trusted weapon, with which many were very expert. Uncle Andy Elliott and William Lockridge, I was told, could tumble a deer at full speed of a horse and deer, nearly every time. I saw Uncle Andy do it once, the ball entering the head just below the horns. I asked him if he aimed for that. 'Yes, always,' was his answer; still, I thought it rather accidental. The useful bird dog was little used then, Mr. H. N. Ridgely and J. C. Spring being the only possessors, in 1844-45, of one each. Mr. R. used to tell very amusing stories of the astonishment the farmers would express when he would drive up and put his dog in the field, and see him knock chickens right and left on the wing, when they had not observed any birds before. The farmers shot them only in the winter, from trees and fences. The winter of 1844-45, I saw prairie chickens shot from the trees where the Governor's house now stands. As late as 1850, a friend of mine was fined for shooting wild pigeons from trees where Dr. Vincent's house now stands. In 1846, Mr. John Ives got a pointer dog, and in 1847, I brought from the East my black setter, 'Jack,' with which I killed hundreds of chickens. I seldom went further than the machine shop and Butler's farm to get all we wanted for ourselves and neighbors. On one occasion, as I was riding on horseback, with my gun and dog, hunting (where General John Cook's house, on South Fourth street, stands), in company with two young farmers, 'Old Jack' found a covey of chickens. I told them if they would hold the horse, I would give them a mess of birds to take home. They looked around to see them. I walked up to where the dog was standing, and as the birds got up, I killed eight or nine before they all got away. You ought to have seen the men's eyes buck out. I gave them two apiece. After thanking me, one said: 'By Jingo, Tom, I mean to have a dog and scattering gun right away.'

"The first deer hunt I was on, was on the 4th day of July, 1846, when a large party gathered early in the morning at Uncle Andy Elliott's, now First street and North Grand Avenue. The old house and gate posts were decorated with antlers of deer, skins of wolves, foxes, coon and other varmint—a regular hunter's home—while the hounds lay lazily around, waiting patiently for the old hunter to mount his horse, and when he tooted his horn they bounded and howled like wild. The party consisted of Colonel James Barrett, R. F. Ruth, Robert Allen, Charlie Chatterton, P. C. Johnson old man Peak (the baker), Harrison Hammond, Wm. H. Herndon, Wes. and Harrison Elliott, and others whose names I have forgotten. The rendezvous was near old Sangamon Town, where a wagon with cooking utensils and Mr. Elliott Herndon, the orator of the day, had preceded us. We did not carry meat in those days, as we were sure of getting enough on the hunt. We started through the brush due northwest, and the hazel came up to Elliott's house. We had gone about one-half hour when one of the dogs 'gave tongue,' and then the whole pack burst forth in one grand harmony, making the welkin ring, enthusing men and horses alike. They put us green ones on stands, and I for one wished most heartily the deer would not come by me, for should I miss it (and the way I felt I knew I would), Barrett and Elliott would have worn my hat off. But luck would have it, that old fox, Mr. Peak—who could beat any horse in the timber and knew every run-way—got the first crack at it, wounding and making the deer take water a few miles west of the 'cut-off,' and he was soon our meat. He was carried to camp and dressed, and by twelve o'clock we were enjoying the feast. It was a wonderful day's sport for me—a greenhorn. Wm. Herndon used to be called 'Injin Bill' and 'Turkey Bill,' for the reason, if he ever got after a deer or turkey he was always sure to capture it, if it took him two days. He was so called in order to distinguish him from another Wm. Herndon, a brick mason. Deer and turkey were quite plenty in any of the timber within three miles of town, and with hounds, hunters could have a chase any day. But the big hunts of two weeks—when they would kill twenty to fifty deer—were made on Flat Branch, Bear Creek and away out on the Okaw, in which Mr. O. Lewis, Joshua Amos, N. Divelbiss and others, were prominent actors.

"I will relate one more little incident and quit, for when you get an old hunter started, he will think of enough to fill a whole volume, if you would let him—interesting enough to him, but may be to no one else. In the winter of 1849, Messrs. Peak and Herndon proposed a hunt on Sugar creek, starting in at what is now the Model Farm. Harry Myers, I. G. Ives, Captain I. R. Diller, and myself were to meet them at Newcomer's Mill. We started early on foot, and when we got to the bridge heard the dogs running through Scattering Point, but the deer-dogs and men crossed far above, and the dogs took the deer up to Hickory Grove, in Christian county. Our party ate our lunch, drank up our 'snake bite cure,' shot the bottles to pieces, and started home on the east side of the creek, hoping to find a flock of turkeys. As we scattered through the brush, it was not very long when I heard my brother—who had never seen a wild deer before—hallooing for dear life. He had started two deer with immense horns. We all run for a clearing to get a shot. I happened to strike a clear place, and saw the two deer bounding along about forty yards from me. I had a small double-barreled shotgun. I let go on the leader, and dropped him in his track, then let the other have it, and down he came. My! but my heart burned with pride as I run and cut their throats. I thought my brother would go wild. He said they looked as big as elephants, and was so frightened he forgot he had a gun. Two of us packed them on poles about two miles to Mother Short's, where we got a team to bring us to town. When the old lady saw the little gun, and was informed it done the work, she said: 'Young man, somebody will have to set up with you to-night, sure!' So they did; those two deer cost me a heap that night, I tell you."

BY JAMES J. MEGREDDY.

"My father, Enoch Megredy, with his family, left Port Deposit, Cecil county, Maryland, April 15th, 1837, and after a very interesting trip by land, water and mud, landed in Cass county, Illinois, near Virginia, at the home of his cousin, Archibald Job, June 16th, 1837. In the spring of this year the building of the old State House was commenced. The continuous rainy weather, and the imperfect arrangements for quarrying the stone had brought the work to a close for the time being. Mr. Job was one of the State House Commissioners, and my father having been engaged in quarrying granite at Port Deposit, was placed at once in charge of the State House quarries, near Crow's Mill, and moved his family, consisting of twelve persons, to a cabin on the land now owned and occupied by Mr. Hexter, six miles south of Springfield. The cabin was about fourteen feet square, with a clapboard addition eight by twelve. Cranes were erected for raising the rock from the quarry and loading the wagons. Of this year's work the basement of the old State House was built. He then purchased the Z. Peter's farm, on the south side of Lick Creek, six miles south of Springfield, February 2, 1838, and where part of the family still reside. My father was a local preacher of the M. E. Church, his license dating from 1828; he was ordained a deacon in 1835, by Bishop Emory, at Philadelphia, and ordained an elder in 1840, by Bishop Waugh, at Springfield, Illinois; he died in the fifty-seventh year of his age. In 1839, Old Harmony Church (near the present Woodside) was built of timber, hewed, framed and weather-boarded with nicely shaved clapboards; it had seven windows, of eight by ten glass, twelve panes of glass in each window; the pulpit was made of walnut, substantial and plain. This appointment was styled by Rev. James Leaton, the Athens of the circuit. * * * In those days, to minister to the wants or comfort of new-comers was a peculiar trait in western character. On the first day after moving into the cabin, an old gentleman, a genuine type of the pioneer class, called, saying that he heard that we had just come in and were strangers, and he had come over to see if we did not want a cow for the summer, as he had more than he needed, and if we would send over we should be welcome to one. We thanked the old gentleman and accepted the cow. He said she was the best cow he had, and 'Chance' proved equal to any cow we have had since. It was a fixed fact, that when one or more of the community would be sick with chills or jaundice, or something else, his neighbors would meet and take care of his harvest, or get up wood, or repair his cabin, or plant his corn, or whatever was necessary to be done for the comfort of his family or himself. In this, those grand old men who are now with us, and those who have passed away, were prompted by the noble, self-sacrificing women, who endured without mourning the hardships of pioneer life, and encouraged those toil-worn men with the prospect of a happy future for their children. When we take an imaginary inside view of one of the cabins and its fixtures, and remember that it was sleeping room, dining room, parlor and kitchen, and the cooking utensils a Dutch oven and a skillet; the never-failing pile of bed quilts on a chair in one corner; the loom in one end of the porch, with a piece of blue jeans partly woven; the lots of dresses hanging up against the wall; the snow white pillows on the bed, and the floor so white; such an air of comfort and satisfaction, in spite of all the inconvenience, we wonder, mixed with much fear, if any of their fair daughters could duplicate the cabin comfort. There was some courting then among the young folks, but being of a very modest and retiring disposition ourself, we were ever kept at a distance by the favored ones. We think the facilities for courting were circumscribed—top buggies and long hedged-in-lanes and sentimental, sombre evenings for airings and health exercise, were unknown. Girls rode to church or town in the big wagon with their parents generally, but those that could afford a fine saddle and fine blood horse, were as proud of the display as those of the present day are of a gold watch, half hidden in the net work of a side pocket. The only good place for courting was the singing school, with a Missouri Harmony under your arm as a passport, you could ride up to the fence and tie your horse and call at the door with some assurance and ask the young lady to accompany you, which was generally followed by the question: 'Will your horse carry double?' Which was answered in the affirmative, of course, which we are sure was not always strictly true. Unless the young lady would hold on mightily, which they always did, you never heard of one being thrown off, and would get to the log school house safe enough, and back again all right, if some fellow didn't cut you out and the girl give you the sack. This made a fearful experience, and sometimes a fight, but notwithstanding the absence of a private room, top buggy and long, quiet, sombre lanes and all modern appliances, there was scarcely a bachelor to be found in the country—William Vigal, Esq., was the only exception we think of just now. The boys and girls got married, and remained married. We had no divorces, and considered it far better to fight it out on the old plan than be disgraced by a divorce, and we recommend the old plan to our friends who enjoy the benefits of refinement and social culture, and the teaching of the polite literature of the present day."

BY R. H. BEACH.

"When I landed in Springfield, in the fall of 1835, the centre of our present square was graced with a commodious brick court house of very fair dimensions. The court houses were almost invariably put in the center of the public squares, and every town that was then laid out would not be considered complete if it had not a public square. This grew out of what then was supposed to be a fact—that every town in the State, great or small, was supposed to be a candidate in the near future for the county seat. After Springfield had acquired the distinction sought, viz, the county seat, it aspired still higher, and put out its feelers for the State Capitol, which we all know she succeeded in getting. The lower story of our court house was devoted to the dispensation of justice, while the upper one was let out for offices. Our present State Journal was at that time printed there. The Bar was not as numerous then as it is at present, but what it lacked in number, it made up in quality. Among the shining lights of that day were such men as Lincoln, Baker, Douglas, Forquer, and others, and last, but not least, Logan. I had been in Sangamon county but a short time, when a brother-in-law from the city of New York came to visit me. The Rev. J. G. Bergen, whom we all know as a genial, pleasant gentleman, was showing us round the then small village, 'doing up the sights.' Among other places, we sauntered into the court house. The court was in session, and a case was then in progress. Judge Logan was on the bench, and Mr. Douglas (the 'Little Giant,' as he was afterwards called) on the floor. To us, just from the city of New York, with the sleek lawyers and the prim and dignified judges, and audiences to correspond, there was a contrast so great, that it was almost impossible to repress a burst of laughter. Upon the bench was seated the judge, with his chair tilted back and his heel as high as his head, and in his mouth a veritable corn cob pipe; his hair standing nine ways for Sunday, while his clothing was more like that worn by a woodchopper than anybody else. There was a railing that divided the audience; outside of which smoking and spitting and chewing of tobacco seemed to be the principal employment. I remarked to Mr. Bergen, who sat beside me: 'That is a strange scene, and not like the courts we have been in the habit of seeing, and, as for the judge, he did not seem to have much knowledge or be of much force.' 'Ah, my dear sir,' replied Mr. Bergen, with that peculiar smile and comical cast of countenance that all who knew him, will instantly recollect, 'He is a singed cat,' and we passed out into the open air. 'A singed cat,' said I to myself, 'I wonder what that can mean.' The expression, coupled with the comical look Mr. Bergen gave as he said it, led me to think that there was more in it than met the ears. After walking a few steps, I said: 'Mr. Bergen, what did you mean by saying that that judge on the bench, with that old overcoat not fit hardly for anyone to wear, was "a singed cat?"' His reply, with another of those comical looks, his brow drawn down, and his chin nearly on his breast, was: 'I mean he is better than he looks.' In a short time I became fully convinced that it was not clothes that makes the man, but brains. Judge Logan, for many years in the Springfield Bar, was a giant among giants in the legal profession."

BY JOHN S. CONDELL, SR.

"In the summer of 1833, being then fifteen years old, I left the paternal home, in Philadelphia, and in company with my oldest brother (Thomas Condell), started for Illinois, which was then called 'The Far West.' As it was before the days of railroads, we traveled all the way over the mountains to Pittsburg, and thence to Cincinnati, in the old fashioned stage coaches. The cholera was then prevailing all through the West. When passing through Columbus, Ohio, and other towns we saw yellow flags suspended from dwellings, denoting the presence of that dreadful scourge.

"At Cincinnati we embarked on a steamboat for St. Louis. Below Louisville there were but few towns or improvements on the river. I can never forget, neither can I describe, how strangely I was impressed by the wildness and grandeur of the scenery on the river, before it had been molested by the touch of man. The primeval forests crowded and covered the banks, and the surface of the stream was the home of wild fowl of every description. A peculiar stillness brooded over the scene, broken only by the splashing of the steamer's wheel and the jolly song of the firemen. Seldom was there any occasion for our boat to stop, except to 'wood up.' Then we would take a ramble through the wild woods, gathering nuts, grapes, plums, paw-paws and flowers.

"After reaching St. Louis, we again took stage to Carrollton, Greene county, where we began our mercantile career in Illinois. There I became acquainted with Colonel E. D. Baker, (who was killed at Ball's Bluff, during the late war). He was then a resident of that place. There I heard some of his first efforts in eloquence, both at the bar and in the Christian church, of which I believe he was then a member. He also manifested a military spirit at that early day, being captain of a company of militia, which he was fond of training and parading. His brother, Dr. Alfred C. Baker, also residing there, was a man having as high sense of honor and as much of the milk of human kindness in his nature as any man I ever met. There I first saw Stephen A. Douglas, when he was quite a young man, as he traveled around the circuit practicing law. His dress and habits corresponding to the surroundings of the pioneer times. I often saw him sitting upon the ground in the court house square eating watermelons with the 'boys' and entertaining them with his versatile conversation. There I first saw and found an early friend in Dr. John Hardtner and his family, who have since become residents of this city. There I first met my present partner in business, Mr. C. M. Smith; at that early day we 'were boys together,' and little did, or could we then anticipate, that after the lapse of almost half a century we would be associated together in business in this city, under the firm name of C. M. Smith & Co.

"In the fall of 1840, my brother Thomas and myself left Carrollton in a buggy, with a view of looking for a better location for business. We started north, visiting Jacksonville, Springfield, Decatur and Bloomington. Finally, we decided to make Springfield our permanent home, and try to do business on the cash principle, under the firm name of Condell, Jones & Co. We moved to Springfield in August, 1841. We had difficulty in finding a house to do business in, but finally rented one of the stores in 'Hoffman's row,' North Fifth street, and soon after we purchased of Mr. Blankinship the building still standing on the northwest corner of the north side of the square, and continued doing business in it twenty-one years. It was the first brick building on the north side; all the rest were mostly one-story frame structures, and known in those days as 'Chicken row.' It then required six or more weeks to get goods transported from the East. They had to be wagoned over the mountains to Pittsburg; thence by steamboats to St. Louis and Beardstown, and from thence to this city by transient teams. As but little manufacturing was then in existence in the United States, we were dependent upon foreign markets for most of our goods; hence, nearly all the dry goods we first sold here were of English manufacture. Muslins and calicoes, which we are now selling at six and eight cents per yard, were then sold at 25 to 37½ cents per yard. Most of the woolen goods then used here were spun and woven by the women of Sangamon and adjoining counties. Jeans, flannels, linseys, socks, mittens, rag carpets, tow linen, men's straw hats, etc., were brought to the stores in abundance, and exchanged for groceries and other goods.

"Peter Cartwright, the old pioneer preacher, who was a life-long customer of ours, never wanted anything out of a store but a black silk cravat and a bandana silk pocket handkerchief; all the rest of his wardrobe was the product of the labor and skill of the pioneer women of Sangamon county.

"The ladies' bonnets first brought out were somewhat similar in size and shape to an inverted coal scuttle, and were sold at six to ten dollars each. Parasols were a novelty, and not much needed in the days of large sun-bonnets. However, to suit the times, the parasols we first brought out were mostly of cotton material, on rattan and whalebone frames. We sold them to the mothers of some who are now the wealthy and fashionable of Sangamon county, and at that time they seemed to think they could hardly afford the luxury of a cotton parasol. In those days money was indeed scarce; what little there was, mostly found its way to the land office, to pay for more land. Business was mostly done on a credit of twelve months; settlements made once a year, either at Christmas or 'hog killing time.'

"Soon after commencing business in Springfield, we established a branch store in Decatur, managed by a younger brother (Wm. J. Condell), who is still living there. As there was very little money in circulation, and no outlet, whatever, for produce, as a matter of necessity as well as to accommodate the farmers of Macon county, we exchanged goods with them for their fall wheat, at twenty-five cents per bushel, had it wagoned to Springfield at five cents per bushel, and sold it to J. L. Lamb at thirty cents per bushel, and were glad in that way to get out even on our speculation in wheat. Mr. Lamb was then proprietor of the old City Mill, on South Seventh street, on the Town Branch as it then was, but both the mill and branch have long since disappeared. In connection with this I would ask the farmers in this and other sections of the State to make a note of this wheat transaction, occurring in the centre of the most fertile portion of Illinois, and learn therefrom how much they are indebted to railroads for present prices of produce and the general prosperity. While I do not own a dollar of railroad stock or hold a pass over any road, I am free to say that we owe an immense debt of gratitude to the men who projected and built our railroads, as well as the larger class who are engaged day and night operating them. Let us remember that as they have been in the past, they will ever remain, our greatest benefactors.

"While waiting for first stock of goods to arrive, I went to the first camp-meeting I ever attended, then being held on the 'Old Salem camp ground,' six miles west of this city. The first day I went there I found I was a stranger among strangers, and as night came on, having made no acquaintance, and being somewhat timid and backward, I got no supper and had no place to sleep. After the night services closed, I thought I would make my bed on the straw about the preaching stand; but while sauntering around I found an old empty log school house, which formed a part of the inclosure, and into it I went to pass the night alone. On one of the puncheon benches I found a soft hat, and lying down upon the bench I placed the hat under my head for a pillow and went to sleep with the intention of rising before any one else would be stirring around, and see where I had made my resting place; but being tired, I slept so soundly, that when I awoke the sun was two hours high, and I discovered a boy sitting upon the doorstep patiently waiting for his hat, which was under my head.

"That day I formed my first acquaintance with some of the early settlers of Sangamon county—the Megredys, Shepherds, Swingleys, Lyons, Hickmans, Tomlins, Lightfoots and others in the country; and from the city, Dr. McNeil, Rev. W. T. Bennett, Geo. R. Weber, Enos M. Henkle, Edmund Roberts, Noah and Charles W. Matheny, Arny Robinson, Wm. Dickey, Thomas Lee, Sr., and Jas. F. Reed, among whom I was cordially received and entertained.

"There was a young lady from Williamsport, State of Maryland, at that meeting, with the family of Judge Swingley, to whom three years after I was married, although at that time I had not the remotest idea of what the future had in store for me. I had no thought of matrimony then, and was only interested in the progress of the meeting. In those days there was more weeping and rejoicing at camp meeting than we see now. I wept with those who wept, and rejoiced with those who rejoiced, and wished the meeting would last all summer.

"The Spring and summer of 1844 will be remembered by many, as one of the most gloomy and disastrous seasons that Sangamon county ever passed through. It rained almost incessantly all through the spring, until some time in June. The whole country was flooded with water. What little corn had been planted was mostly drowned out, and vegetation wore a sickly hue. It was a year of short crops, long faces and general depression. Dullness prevailed, and business men had more leisure than they knew what to do with. However, I turned it to good account, improving the leisure and enlivening the dullness by a courtship, resulting in securing a partner for life.

"In the face of all the discouraging prospects, all the shaking of heads and forebodings of evil, I was married on the 27th day of June, 1844, to Miss Bell Rice, at the residence of her brother-in-law, Judge Samuel K. Swingley, six miles south of Springfield. In going to and returning from the wedding, we found all the prairie from town to Lick creek timber, covered with a sheet of water, and much of the way it was hub deep. That event proved to be the wisest proceeding of my life, and I close these recollections of the past by advising young men to go and do likewise."

JOHN H. HARRISON, SON OF REUBEN HARRISON, SALISBURY.

"I was born in the county of Rockingham, State of Virginia, April 6, 1815. My father moved to Kentucky in 1818, living there four years, and then moved to Sangamon county Illinois, settling on the farm on which I have ever since lived, on the 4th of November, 1822. Everybody was poor, as is the case in every new country, but we enjoyed life as much then as now. We had time to visit our friends, work our little farms, hunt game, which was plenty, and to go to meeting on a week day. We did not use buggies and carriages then. All traveling was done on horseback. It was not uncommon for a man and his wife and three children to get on one horse and ride three or four miles to visit a neighbor. The first school I attended was taught in a house built of round logs and without any windows. All the light we had came down the chimney. The next spring they cut out a log for a window and made a writing desk of a slit slab, which they placed under it. The first lot of hogs we raised, father sold in Beardstown, for $1.25 per hundred. But several hogs paid for four acres each of land, on which I now live. About the 10th of March, 1826, father and W. B. Renshaw started from the mouth of Richland creek, for New Orleans, with the second flat boat load of corn ever floated down the Sangamon—Abraham Sinnards took the first one. There are few of the privations now felt in settling a new country, which we felt in settling this. I can remember when we had to raise and prepare everything we had to eat, make everything we had to wear; and every kind of vessel we had to use. The first saw mill was built on Richland creek, below the mouth of Prairie creek, by Reuben Fielding and Robert Harrison, in 1825. William and T. Kirkpatrick built a horse mill in 1822, half a mile southeast of Salisbury. That was the only place we could get flour and meal. It took two-thirds of a bushel of wheat or five or six bushels of corn to pay the postage on a letter."

BY W. T. BENNETT.

"I was born near Shepherdstown, Jefferson county, Virginia, on the 30th of November, 1805. In 1834 emigrated to the west, and, in company with my brother, Van S. Bennett, reached Springfield on the 9th day of December, and registered at Captain Whorton Ransdell's Hotel, an old gentleman full of life and gay spirits, and, as I thought, the most attentive and accommodating landlord I had met in my travels.

I was not favorably impressed with the appearance of Springfield at that time, and did not think of remaining there very long, but I was induced to commence business, and received a reasonable share of patronage from the citizens. As I became acquainted with the people, I found them sociable and kind. Everybody seemed to be in good spirits and prospering. I became attached to the people and the place, and made it my home till the year 1850, when I entered the itinerant ministry.

The first Sabbath I spent in Springfield I attended the Methodist church, and was most agreeably disappointed in the appearance of the congregation, and in the eloquent sermon by Rev. Joseph Edmonson, of precious memory. There was a flourishing Sabbath school, under the superintendence, of a very good brother, and if I am not mistaken, James H., now Judge Matheny, when but a boy, was reported as having committed to memory the largest number of verses in the New Testament of any of the scholars belonging to the school. The memory of the warm friends with whom I first formed an acquaintance, I still cherish with feelings of pleasure and sadness—Dr. J. M. Early, Charles H. Matheny, Esq., Nicholas Garland, Edward Phillips, Edmond Roberts, Asbury and Cyrus Sanders and others. These have all passed into the silent city of the dead. I am still here, in the seventy-seventh year of my age, and since the death of my cousin, William A. Bennett, whom I loved as a brother, I begin to feel lonely.

In 1835, I was introduced by Rev. Mr. Edmondson to Miss Rebecca J. Roberts, who was then visiting Springfield, whom I afterwards courted and married. The most of our courtship, however, took place on paper, for soon after our acquaintance I learned of the death of my brother-in-law, George W. Shutt, in Shepardstown, and returned to see my widowed sister. I returned to Springfield in the spring of 1836, and was married to Miss Roberts the following June, in the town of Ottawa, Illinois. The fruit of our marriage has been two sons and five daughters. We have buried one son and three daughters. The remaining two daughters and son reside in and near Mechanicsburg. My wife and self, and youngest daughter, a widow, live together."

BY GEORGE P. WEBER.

"I am not an early settler, according to the ruling of the association of that name in the county, as my days on the earth are not of sufficient number to entitle me to that honor. However, am a descendant of one. Was born on what is now South Sixth street, Springfield, Ill., about two score years ago. And, while we know nothing of our ancestry of which we feel ashamed, modesty forbids the mention of what we do know. Suffice it to say that, whatever claims we may have to the succession of European or other thrones, or rights to great wealthy estates, by rules of descent, are dismissed. Have lived here long enough to witness many important changes. Remember when I knew the face and name of every man, woman, boy and girl in Springfield; also most of the 'country jakes' who did their trading there. The free school system has grown up in my time, and if there is a man or woman in the county, thirty years of age, or under, who cannot read and write, some one is greatly at fault, and should be held criminally responsible, except in case of idiocy or physical disability. Even mutes are not excusable. My first school teacher was old Mr. Parks, but do not remember him so distinctly as good Mrs. Dean, who, shame to say it, I kicked on the nose with the first boot heel I ever wore, while she was plying her slipper where, no doubt, it was needed. Recollect quite well when the first railroad locomotive came into Springfield. * * * I was a little fellow, but do not forget when the troops left for the Mexican war, nor when Tom Hessey, an acquaintance of my folks, returned, having been wounded by a grape shot, which he brought home with him. I thought Tom was a hero and a martyr. Wondered if we should ever have another war that would afford me an opportunity to wear the dazzling blue with brass buttons. True, that grape shot and Tom Hessey's game leg would come up sometimes, and dampen my ardor. It came. I was there. Saw enough. Came home without glory, because I had the good fortune to bring my body intact. The public demand an arm, a leg, a hand; or there is no reward, no compliment, no cheer. But so it has always been, perhaps always will be. The sacrifice, not the service, is what we applaud. One of the really big things in the way of advancement was the scouring plows made by old John Uhler, on the corner east of where the town clock is now located. I never used a wooden mould-board plow, but in my thirty years practical experience, have used many different kinds. Plows of recent date have many advantages, but I have never seen a plow that would do the work as well as the old Uhler used to do it.

"The improvements in the way of farm implements is a matter of astonishment; but of all the improvements, nothing is more noticeable or important to an agricultural county like ours than that of farm animals. While all kinds have been greatly improved, the most marked improvement is among cattle, hogs and sheep. Horses have been by no means neglected, but there were some good horses about here more than thirty years ago. Do I forget Uncle Peter Van Bergen's 2:40 steppers? Not much. You never saw me sitting in Uncle Peter's sleigh, behind the first string team ever driven in Springfield to a cutter? Bells, little and big! I would have guessed more than a million in number! Talk about the wind. Our backs to it, a half second the start, and 'stand from under!' I was a very common boy, but a very enthusiastic one about that time on the trotting question. My father laughs now about a question, or rather a series of them, that amused him, but I am still of the same opinion. Said I, 'Father, if our horse was the biggest horse in the world, and was the best looking horse in the world, and could outrun any other horse, and could trot faster than any other horse; would he be the greatest horse in the world—if we had one?'

"In poultry also, the improvement is very marked. * * * But what does it all amount to? Is the condition of the human family really bettered by it? Do not all these improvements bring with them additional demands that must be complied with? Do they not excite a spirit of unrest, jealousy and selfishness? For all time man has been about the same. The physical, social and moral culture of man brings correspondingly increased necessities and responsibilities. After all, much of the labor-saving machinery in use, and many of the so-called conveniences are over-estimated. We pay for all our luxuries, sometimes dearly."

PIONEER WOMEN.

At the annual meeting of the Pioneers' Society, held in 1879, R. W. Diller read a number of letters received from pioneer women of the county. The following were among the number:

MRS. JAMES PARKINSON AND MRS. SARAH KING, OF CURRAN.

"FRIEND DILLER—In response to your request that you would like to hear from the women portion of the old settlers of Sangamon county, we will give you some of our experience. Our father moved from Kentucky to St. Clair county, Illinois, in the year 1816 or 1817—lived there till the fall of 1819; then moved to what was then called the Sangamo country, and settled on Spring creek, ten miles west of where Springfield was afterwards located. Our father built a camp, which we lived in until winter,—and considerable snow and very cold,—then built a cabin; had to thaw the snow and ice off the boards to lay the roof; then put poles on to hold the boards down. That done, they made puncheons and laid part of the floor, and put up bedsteads of some kind; then had to make beds under the bedsteads for us children to sleep on, there being nine children and three grown persons. The cabin where there was no floor, we used for hearth and fire-place, leaving a hole in the roof for the smoke to go out at. This way we lived the first winter. After that we done a little better; built a pen at one end of the house for the sheep, to keep the wolves from killing them, and the wolves serenaded us nearly every night. The principal part of the provender for our stock was elm and lin brush. Our men would cut down trees for the stock to eat the branches and bark off. Our breadstuffs had to be brought from near St. Louis, about one hundred miles. It was principally corn bread made up with cold water and baked in a skillet or oven—was commonly called corn-dodger. Our meat was in abundance, we had pork, venison, turkey and prairie chicken and wild honey for all that was out. Had coffee about once a week, generally of a Sunday morning, the balance of the time, milk and water mixed. This was for the first season, after that we had enough milk without mixing it with water. As for our clothes, we had to raise, pick, spin and weave cotton to make clothes for winter and summer; we also made linsey. The first indigo we had, we raised; used that, shumach berries, white walnut bark and other barks for coloring.

"Now for the cotton picking. Mother would every night fill a pint cup full of cotton in the seed for each one of us, and lay it down before the fire and tell us when we picked it we could go to bed, and we had it to do. Then we pitched in and warmed our cotton, and the warmer we made it, the better it picked, so we would take a good sweat. The next day that had to be carded and spun, so we would soap the cotton some card and some spin, and when we would get enough spun and colored to make a dress apiece, we would put it in the loom and weave it. It did not take fifteen or twenty yards to make a dress, nor thirty or forty days to make one, although they were made by hand. Now, to give you a more perfect idea of the cloth and fashion of our dresses at that time, we will here show you a sample of one of our mother's dresses, which she wore about fifty-five years ago—not only mother, but some of the rest of us young ladies. This is the only one we have saved, it being our mother's. We have often thought and talked of exhibiting this dress before to old settlers' meetings, but have failed to do it, but when our friend Diller gave us such a pressing invitation to take a part in contributing to the entertainment, we could resist no longer, so we thought we would give a little sketch of our doings for the first two or three years in this county. Now for our calico dresses. We cannot show you a sample, as we have not saved one for posterity, but it would be something similar to the cotton, one in number of years and make. Before we could get one we had to make jeans and swap for calico, or else dig ginseng and smat. We had a neighbor woman who had a small baby, and had no cradle, and she conceived the idea of substituting her apron for a cradle; tie the baby in it, then the apron around her neck, and spun on the big wheel in order to make clothing for her family. As for schooling, that was not very much. Our first school we went to after we came here was four miles, taught by a man named Andrew. Four or five of us went by turns. The youngest was nine years old. Went on foot, and the road was a path through the high grass and woods, and the stars were often shining when we got home, and there were wolves and panthers plenty. They were frequently seen, and you can well imagine how we felt when the stars began to shine. The oldest ones would form a front and rear guard, and put the smallest in the middle, and hurry them along, all scared nearly to death. Our school house was a log cabin; the windows were big cracks, with paper pasted over and greased to give light. Our seats were split logs, with legs put in to sit on. Our church was built of logs, and about four miles from us. It was a Methodist church, and when we had company we went on foot, one behind the other in the path.

MRS. JAMES PARKINSON,
MRS. SARAH KING."

MRS. CHARLOTTE JACOBS.

LOAMI, ILL., August 3, 1879.

"LADIES AND GENTLEMEN:—I was born April 19, 1797, in Winchester, Clark county, Kentucky.

My maiden name was Charlotte Webb, daughter of Adin and Mary Webb. I was married to Daniel Jacobs in the year of our Lord 1818. We lived in Kentucky until the fall of 1825. We then started to Illinois, and on the 7th of November arrived at Lick creek, and settled on the farm that we have ever since occupied. When we moved to Illinois our neighbors were scarce. Mr. Lindley, Mr. Darneille, Myers Campbell and my husband, with their families, moved into a little log cabin, fifteen by sixteen, with a puncheon floor and a clapboard door. The chimney had no back, or jams, or hearth. How friendly the people were in those days. They would go miles to see one another, and to take and return the hearty shake of the hand. As I look back on those days, I think of them as some of my happiest days. You must know that it took stout, hearty and resolute woman to settle a wilderness country like this was, and to buffet with the storms of life, but God's hand was over all, and he brought us safely through. I raised a large family, nine daughters and two sons, to be grown and married. They are all living and doing well. My children, grandchildren and great grandchildren living, are one hundred and fourteen. If all were living there would be one hundred and thirty-six. I am now in my eighty-third year, and can walk without fatigue, to my daughter's, Mrs. Frank Darneille, about two miles, and I feel thankful for my good health. We brought only one chair with us, so my brother made one for himself and my husband, with a gimlet and a draw-knife as the only tools. I have the gimlet yet. I brought with me three cows, and my husband bought five hounds. The first hogs we had I bought twelve shoats, and paid for them with linsey and jeans, of my own make. We had to raise flax and cotton to make our clothing. I made everything that we wore. I even made my towels and table cloths, sheets and everything in the clothing line. I have some of my towels and table cloths yet, and one sheet of my last flax spinning. We had a pretty hard time for a while, but we worried through. Our nearest trading place was St. Louis, and we had not much money to buy with. We had to go to the American bottom to get our bread stuff, and we paid one dollar per bushel for corn, until we raised some. Our meat was principally wild meat, such as deers, turkeys and prairie chickens. We put up with anything. What we could not make we did without. I made a churn by taking a keg and knocking one end out; made a dasher to fit, and presume made just as sweet butter then as our women do now. This is only a short sketch of my early life, and perhaps some of the young people will doubt its truth. But if you don't believe it, I can refer you to any of my old neighbors. Yours respectfully,

CHARLOTTE JACOBS."

ELIZABETH HARBOUR, DAUGHTER OF SIMON LINDLEY.

"I was born September 4, 1803, in Christian county, Kentucky. I came to Illinois Territory in 1807, and wintered on Wood river, in what is now known as Madison county. I then moved to Shoal creek, which is now Bond county. Remained there until the beginning of the war of 1812, when my father, with about forty other families, went into the fort called Hill's Station, where we remained until peace was declared. Hill's Station was near where Greenville, Bond county, now is. A guard, consisting of the militia and the rangers, was kept to guard the fort, on account of the numerous Indians. The Indians attacked the fort four different times. The fourth time the Indians nearly succeeded in their attempt, most of the militia being out on a skirmish. Thirteen men went out in the morning, and only thirteen men remained in the fort. While the thirteen were going away, they were attacked by the Indians, who were lying in ambush, and the Indians killed four and wounded one—Thomas Higgins. When he was wounded, he attempted to reach the fort, but he was overtaken by two Indians. One he knocked senseless with the breech of his gun, and with the other he had a fist fight, but men from the fort came to his relief, and he reached the fort, where my father took from him seven balls. During the battle, one of the women, Lydia Persley, took her musket and started out to kill an Indian, but she was stopped at the gate by the guard. She thought her husband had been killed, and she wanted to seek revenge, but her husband was not killed. This attack was made the 27th of August, 1813. The first murder was committed about two and a half miles from my father's house, at one of our neighbors', Mr. Cox, he himself being killed by the Indians. Rebecca, his sister, killed six out of the seven, while they attempted to enter the house. When we first came to Shoal Creek, game was abundant. My brother, John Lindley, and another man killed twenty-five deer one morning before nine o'clock. They took only the hams and hides, which they took to St. Louis.

"We next moved to what is now known as Madison county, on Silver creek, near what is now Lebanon, where we remained until 1820, when we came to Lick creek, what is now Sangamon county, which then consisted of Mason, Menard, Cass, Logan, Tazewell and part of Christian, a small part of Macon, part of McLean, part of Woodford, part of Marshall, and part of Putnam. When we came there were but six families near us—John Darnielle, Barton Darnielle, John Campbell, John Wycoff, Henry Brown and Levi Harbour. Our mill was near by—we had to go only about eighty or ninety miles, but shortly after there was a horse mill built on Sugar creek. The Indians were still here when we came, but they were somewhat friendly and not very numerous. I was married to Samuel Harbour July 28, 1826; have lived in the same place ever since, and raised nine children to be men and women. During the time I had many hardships, I had to weave and spin. It only took eight yards of calico to make a dress, and not twenty-eight, as at present. We had to make our clothing from cotton, flax and wool. During the winter of the deep snow when we got out of meal, we had to use pounded meal and live on hominy until we could break a road to the horse-mill. When we got out of groceries we had to resort to the woods for sassafras tea. I forgot to mention about the ranger who was wounded on what is now supposed to be Spring creek, and was brought to Sulphur Spring on Lick creek, where he died and was buried, at what is now Sulphur Spring Cemetery, he being the first man buried there. I am nearly seventy-six years old, and have a very sick daughter at present; my mind being frustrated I cannot say near as much as I could otherwise. This being a very, very short sketch of the troubles I have witnessed. I sincerely hope no other person will ever have to pass through the many hardships which I have experienced. Yours respectfully,

E. LINDLEY."

"R. W. Diller Esq.:—We were not pioneers of Sangamon county, but were pioneers of Vigo county, Indiana, and as my wife cannot write, I thought I would write a few lines for her and myself. Now if you think these lines will add any to the occasion, all right; if not, throw them into the waste basket. We settled sixteen miles north of Terre Haute, in the fall of 1819, on the outskirts of civilization. The Indians were quite numerous for years after, and quite troublesome, being terrible beggars. We located on up-land, where there was not a tree cut, and the nettles and pea-vines were so thick that we could scarcely see the ground, so we took a horse and brush and dragged them down for a considerable space around, went to work and put up a camp, moved into it, and in four weeks moved into a hewed log house, nineteen feet square, in which we lived the next winter without a chimney. The place for the chimney was cut out and the fire just outside, but we were well smoked that winter. While this work was going on, we had to grate all the meal for quite a large family. After corn became too hard we used the hominy mortar and pestle. There was no mill nearer than thirty miles, and then of a dry season it could not grind. A miller told us once to live on faith and dumplings, but we had nothing to make dumplings of. For clothing, many of the boys and some of the men had to wear dressed buckskin. In fact, I have seen Randolph Wedding, of Terre Haute, dressed in buckskin from head to foot. He became afterwards County Judge."

"And now a word about Miss Brown, who is now Mrs. Headley. She came a few years later from old Spencer county, Indiana, a poor girl, working about from place to place. She spent four months with two families, and received about two dollars. She often washed for families, and scrubbed the floor, for twenty-five cents. After she became older and more experienced, never received to exceed seventy-five cents per week. In those days many families made their own cotton. She states, when she went to school she had to take cotton in the seed with her, and pick it during play time. When she carded and spun cotton, six cuts were a day's work; spinning flax or wool, twelve cuts were required for a day's work. In those days our girls dressed very plainly. I never knew them to train their silks and satins in the dust. Their every-day dresses were homespun, but on Sunday they managed to have something nicer. She states, when she went to meeting she has often, in warm weather, carried her shoes and stockings, and when near the place, she would put them on. One other incident I will mention. I was invited by an uncle of mine, where she was staying, to assist him to bring in a deer he had killed. So we brought home the deer, quite tired and hungry. Miss Brown stepped around quite lively, and soon had a good dinner on the table. I then and there fell in love with her, and have loved her from that day to this. She was dressed in brown linsey on that eventful occasion.

"And now all honor and God's blessing be on the old pioneer fathers and mothers, who, through great difficulties, sickness, poverty and privations, laid the foundation for the prosperity we now enjoy.

JAMES and ELIZA HEADLEY."

EXPERIENCE OF MRS. JOHN LOCK, WRITTEN BY A FRIEND.

ROCHESTER, ILL., July 30, 1879.

"FRIEND DILLER:—At your request, I will try and give you a brief synopsis of my experience during the primitive times of Illinois, when Sangamon county was in its infancy. I will commence with an item of chronology. The place of my nativity was Fassenburg, Addison county, Vermont, August 31, 1802. That of my husband the same, January 10, 1799. In the spring of 1832, I and my husband first made our advent on these broad savannas. Oh! what changes have swept over these people in the swift flight of time since that day. My first experience upon landing was not calculated to enliven or to cheer, for immediately upon our arrival, ere we had time to unburden our 'prairie steamer' of our little effects, my husband had to stand the conscription for the Black Hawk war. That was indeed a sad and gloomy beginning. What my feelings were under those trying circumstances, none can know. The mental anguish that I suffered, tongue cannot tell or pen describe. But I presume that it was a necessity to expel from this beautiful land the original possessor, who, by his numerous and cruel outrages had rendered himself obnoxious to the march of intellect and the vanguard of civilization. Ye of Sangamon of 1879, who prate of hard times, what, prithee, would you think, if you had to remain at home alone, a stranger, in this vast wilderness, while your husband went to St. Louis in a two-horse wagon to purchase corn to make meal of, to satisfy the craving of nature? There were days and weeks of agony, of fear and suspense—not knowing at what moment the aborigines, who were still in contiguous proximity to us, might descend and desolate our homes. Those, indeed, were days of action and of vigilance, for at that time I had five little children to guard, and the hoarse cry of the wolf was the only musical instrument Sangamon furnished to lull them to sleep. But those days are numbered with the years beyond the flood. Great and important changes have taken place since that period, and we are now no longer necessitated to array ourselves in habiliments of our own handicraft, but in that day all that adorned our persons were the fabrics wrought by our own industry on the loom. Mothers of the Sangamon of to-day, who bedeck your little ones in costly fabrics that outvie the floral landscape, think not that our little ones were less near and dear to us, who, fifty years ago, clothed them in the homespun of our own manufacture. There may be in this assembly, some fair exotics, that will smile in derision at this humble picture of past experiences of one whose sands are running low—whose fastidiousness may be horrified to think that the hardy pioneers of Sangamon had to do as I have many a time—go to the field, gather corn and grate it, then wait till the cows come up at night, to make food of it. And we pronounced it good; not only good, but very good. At that time my husband plied his trade to get corn to live on while he raised his crop; and the first and most important order that he had was of one Robert Bell, for a pair of boots, for which he received the magnificent compensation of three pecks of corn meal. Thus did the early settlers of Sangamon learn habits of economy and frugality, and by patient industry their efforts have been crowned with success; for now, verily, the wilderness doth blossom as a rose. We have taken the bitter with the sweet, for adversity is a stern but wholesome teacher. We have suffered greatly at times from the malarious diseases incident to this latitude, and at that time our scientific resources were limited. The fell destroyer of mankind has visited us, and stolen from us several flowers of the group which we had gathered around us. Thus have we struggled on, looking forward and upward. We have seen old Sangamon in her infant wilderness; we now behold her in all her pride and grandeur, with her star of destiny still in the ascendant, and ranking with those of the first magnitude. What the next turn of the kaleidoscope will bring forth for us, or for Sangamon, naught but the future will reveal."

Yours truly, Mrs. JOHN LOCK."

MRS. ROBERT BURNS.

BUFFALO HART, ILL., Aug. 19, 1879.

"MR. DILLER: I have been too sick since receiving your request, to give my experience as an early settler of Sangamon county. However, I will give you a few incidents, and you can use them as you think best. We have been living here on this farm for fifty-four years next

October. I picked cotton out of the boll, then the seed out of it, carded and spun and wove the cloth in dresses; also made shirts from it for Mr. Burns, and he wore them several years. The first dishes I purchased in Illinois, rode to Springfield on horseback, taking my cloth to exchange for dishes. When returning home the prairie was discovered burning. Mr. Burns left me to put the fire out. My horse became frightened, threw me, and broke all my dearly bought dishes. There was not a fence or stump to get on, and I had to walk several miles. At last I came to a gopher hill and mounted again, rejoicing that I had escaped without seeing a wolf. We were here during the deep snow. Our house was so open that the snow blew in so much that we could track a rabbit across the floor. The bed would be almost covered in the morning. Prairie chickens were very plenty when we came. Mr. Burns made me a trap, and I amused myself during the day by catching and dressing the dainty game. The first table in the Grove was made of clapboards, given me by 'Squire Moore, about six months after we came; until then we ate off of a box. We had no chairs.

MRS. SARAH F. HUSBAND, OF AUBURN.

"Was born November 12, 1790, in South Carolina. Her parents moved in 1797 to Kentucky, passing by way of Crab Orchard Fort, stopping there a day or two for provisions, protection from Indians, etc., and going thence through Lexington to Christian county, where the family located. The journey from South Carolina to Kentucky was made on pack-horses, several persons riding on one horse. Sarah and another child rode with their mother on an old sorrel horse named 'Jack.' In 1811 she was married to Harman Husband (who died near Auburn, Illinois, February 15, 1848). The family moved to Sangamon county, Illinois, arriving in October, 1820. Numerous interesting incidents occurred on the journey, but only one will be mentioned, viz: While crossing the Ohio river a young calf jumped from the flat-boat; my husband seized the calf by one ear and held it until the boat reached the shore. The calf was brought on to Illinois and did its part in stocking the new county of Sangamon. Arriving in Sangamon county the family settled three miles east of Auburn, where the old lady still resides, aged eighty-nine years, and still active and anxious to live to be one hundred years old. Among early incidents it may be related that the Indians erected on the homestead, their bark wigwams, etc., and hunted over the farm. The subject of this sketch frequently gave them corn bread, having no wheat bread in those days. While encamped on the farm, an Indian child died, and the Indians made a box of bark in which they put the corpse and suspended it from the top of a tall tree, thus keeping it until the tribe was ready to return to the burying grounds. Many other incidents occurred, but similar ones are familiar to all early settlers. Corn cakes were baked on a board before the fire, and 'hoe cakes' were so called because they were cooked on an ordinary hoe, properly cleaned and greased, of course.

MRS. ANN H. McCORMICK

SPRINGFIELD, Ill., August 5, 1879.

"MR. DILLER, Dear Sir:—I came from Green county, Kentucky, arriving in Springfield May 5, 1822, and have resided in Sangamon county ever since, making fifty-seven years last May. The second summer we lived here the corn was killed by frost, and during the summer of 1823 we lived mostly on green corn, potatoes and bread once a day. I remember well the deep snow, and how we walked over stake and rider fences on the snow. At that time I lived three and a half miles southeast of Springfield, with my father, James Short. I was married to Andrew McCormick, and resided in Springfield since that time. I have attended several Old Settlers' meetings, and enjoyed them very much, and I intend meeting my old friends once more if the weather will permit.

Respectfully yours,

ANN S. McCORMICK."

"In the fall of the year 1828, in the midst of the soft and mellow Indian summer, the speaker left his native county of Fayette, Kentucky, emigrating to Springfield Illinois, and traveling on horseback, in two days arrived at Louisville, and crossing the Ohio river struck the great highway to the West, running from Louisville to Vincennes and St. Louis, and at Maysville, Illinois, branching to Central Illinois, known then as the Sangamon country.

"Having entered this great road, he was united to that mighty stream of emigrants moving westward, whose mission was to subdue the wilderness, to found States, to carry forward the banner of civilization, and whose sons were to return, at no very distant day, in arms under the gallant Sherman, to save the Union from disruption, as under Hardin and Bissell they saved the field of Buena Vista—a race never yet defeated in battle, or if defeated, who never knew it.

"That moving mass was composed of every specimen of humanity, men, women, children, black and white, old and young, some highly cultivated and refined, others at the very lowest round of the ladder of intellect and cultivation, and of every intermediate grade. There was the man of middle age, who had filled a high social position in his native State, accompanied by a family cultivated and refined, on the way to the West, to retrieve his fallen fortunes.

"There were young girls, then obscure, unknown, and poorly clad, but destined to fill princely mansions, and to become mothers of a race of fair daughters and gallant sons. Young men and boys were there who in their new homes would fill high offices of State, make and enforce laws, and impress their names and genius on the history of States then springing into existence; or whose destiny would be to fell the forest, to reduce the prairie to cultivation, to subdue the wilderness, and make it feed its millions of happy human beings; or would become lawyers, doctors, preachers, teachers and statesmen.

"All kinds of domestic animals, and of every age, were there, intermingled with men, women and children, following the family wagon or carriage. Every conceivable mode of conveyance; some were on horseback, or in carriages; others in wagons of every variety, and many on foot. Onward this varied mass moved by day, shouting, singing, laughing, jesting, cursing, cracking their whips, hallooing to their animals to press them forward. Merry they go, save here and there might be seen some serious faces of those who were thinking of their native homes and the friends they had left behind them.

"And to the traveler on horseback, belated in reaching his rest for the night, how enchanting the scene as he rides along. The camp-fires blazing everywhere, along the road, down every brook and every valley; the groups around the camp-fires, and at the evening meal; the cattle and horses being fed at the wagon trough, or tethered, or wandering about browsing on grass or shrubs; the whistle, the song, the merry laugh, the bustle, the salutation to the passer-by, 'Where are you going, stranger?' All is animation and joyous life; while over all shines the silver moon struggling to shed her silver light through the hazy Indian summer atmosphere. These road scenes, altogether made a spectacle never to be forgotten, and the like of which will never more be seen east of the Mississippi, and perhaps never again on this continent.

"Near Maysville, Illinois, the road separated, and the emigrant train divided, part taking the road for St. Louis, and part for Central Illinois. And now the Grand Prairie is reached. Pen cannot describe a large prairie; it must have been seen to be appreciated; it was grand and peculiar; its nakedness of everything except long grass and weeds, seared by the autumn frosts, or feeding yon long line of fires, or waving in the breeze; its silence disturbed only by the noise of small insects, the whirr of the prairie chickens, or the sighing of the breeze; its boundless extent, appealing to the imagination; you fancied it like the ocean; its undulating surface resembled the waves; the wavering grass is the water, agitated by the wind; yon emigrant wagon, rising the distant hill, is the ship upon the crest of the wave; yon outline of timbers is the rock-bound coast; but the herd of deer, which, frightened at the approach of man, bounds gracefully away to yonder hill, and stands, with head and tail erect, gazing at you with large, bright eyes, dispels the dream.

"As I am trying to make a picture of things as I saw them, I would recall to the memory of old settlers some of the scenes they witnessed when first crossing this same Grand Prairie, if not on this, on some other road.

"Riding along the gently rolling prairie, now you descend into a valley, and your vision is limited to a narrow circle. That herd of deer has taken fright at your coming, quits its grazing on the tender grass of the valley, and, following that old buck as leader, runs off with heads erect, horns thrown back, their white tails waving in the air, has circled around until yonder hillock is reached, when, turning towards you, they gaze with their dark, bright eyes, as if inquiring why you have invaded their free pastures. As you ride along, the rattlesnake is stretched across the road, sunning itself, and the prairie wolf takes to his heels and gallops off much like a dog, but slowly, as if to show you that he is not much frightened. That flock of prairie chickens has taken wings, and with a whirr flies away, and now has alighted yonder.

"And now you have reached this ridge, checking your horse you turn in your saddle and gaze around. As far as the eye can reach, and bounded only by the horizon, stretches the undulating prairie, covered with grass and resin weed. How grand, how beautiful the view! How like the sea with its rolling waves!

"And now again you have been overtaken by night; you reach that other hillock, and checking your horse, you again gaze around you. The prairie grass is on fire, here, there, everywhere, all around the horizon, and lighting up the whole heavens. The scene now, how unlike that other, but still how grandly beautiful! A vision of wondrous enchantment, the like of which is now gone forever. Few scenes on earth surpass such a prairie, either in the bright sunshine of day, or when in the night blazing with such fires.

"I have since stood at the foot of one of the Rocky Mountains, lifting its lofty head amid the clouds, its sides massive, rugged, treeless, without insect or fowl, silent as the grave. The scene of the mountains and of the prairie are widely different. The one grand and full of life, but impressing the first beholder with a sense of beauty; the other silent, grand, sublime, and impressing its first beholder with a sense of wonder and awe, but alike suggestive of the thought that none but God, One, Almighty, Allwise, could make them, and with wonder that anyone could doubt it, or believe that they came into existence by chance, by evolution or the aggregation of sentient particles of matter.

"The night of the tenth day of his journey the speaker passed at the house of Mr. Husbands, on Sugar creek, in Sangamon county, and early next morning was passing along the road through the Springfield prairie, and about where the junction now is. What a difference between 'now' and 'then!' Now may be seen by one, passing by the Junction, long lines of freight and passenger cars on the two roads crossing at that point from North to South, and from East to West.

"There is the coal shaft, the noise and smoke of its engine, and the huts of the miners; there are in view the spires and curling smoke of the Capital City; all around are well cultivated farms, well stocked with fine cattle, and everywhere around are life, activity, and progress.

"Then all around was unbroken prairie, the home of the wolf, the deer, and the prairie fowl; unmarked by civilization or cultivation, except the scattering farms and houses along the timber. The dwellers in those houses, if then asked, would have informed you that these prairie lands would never be purchased of the General Government, that they were not worth the taxes and would ever remain pasture grounds for those owning the lands near the timber.

"Traveling thence north, nothing yet met the eye, except the wild prairie, and its boundary of timber, and on that boundary on the east, the farms of Washington Iles and of Mason and Plank, and on the west, of Little and Lindsay. At the distance of one mile the high ground was reached, the rim of the valley in which Springfield was situated, where now runs the South Avenue. Thence descending into the valley, the only additional improvements to be seen were the farms of Lanterman and Lanswell on the west, and of Charles R. Matheny on the east, where Mrs. Robert Irwin now lives, and of Masters, in front of the traveler.

"Passing the Masters farm on the left (now Moran's addition), and the house of the Masters, near the residence of Mrs. Humphrey, and crossing the open prairie, the road running nearly where are now the residences of Mrs. Chestnut and N. W. Edwards, to the grove afterwards known as Mather's grove, where the new State House is being built, and following the road west of Mather's grove, with the grove on the right, and on the left the corn-field of Major Iles (now Edwards & Mather's addition), to the eminence, where now stands the residence of the late Mr. Tyndale, the little village until then hid by the timber and brushwood along the town branch, first burst upon the view.

"Reining in the horse, pausing on that eminence, to take a survey, the eye rested upon a dense grove of Black Jack, and undergrowth, east and west, all along the town branch, covering the entire hill on which Mr. Lamb's house is situated, while in front lay the little village of Springfield, made up of a string of small houses, mainly extending three blocks, along Jefferson street, from First to Fourth streets, with some few scattered elsewhere.

"The houses were generally small, unpainted, and some daubed with mud; the rain of the morning had given to all a dreary and cheerless look, bringing a fit of blues to one who remembered the pleasant home of his boyhood, and then surveying for the first time, the home of his manhood, which then promised so little and has proved so full of happiness.

"The village of Springfield was built in a valley about two miles wide; it was drained by a stream, since known as the Town Branch, which heads in the southeast corner of the city, and runs west-northwest, and empties into Spring creek. Into the Town Branch on either side, in flood time, at intervals of three or four hundred yards, the water had washed deep gullies, or ruts, which drained the entire valley into the Town Branch, one of these wet weather drains ran from the northeast corner of the square to the southwest corner, and thence to the Town Branch, near the railroad bridge.

"This surface drainage has entirely disappeared, being displaced by the admirable underground drainage adopted by the city. On both sides of the Town Branch as high as Sixth street, was a dense forest of small trees and undergrowth, the harbor of deer and wolves. The remains of this forest may be seen in the yards of Mrs. Goodell, of the Governor's Mansion, and of Mr. Eastman. Parallel with the Town Branch are two ridges, the rims of the valley, at an elevation of from twenty to thirty feet above the branch. The North and South Avenues run very nearly upon the summit of these ridges.

"The central points of intercourse, at that day, in the Northwest, were St. Louis on the south, and the lead mines near Galena on the north; and the leading road of the Northwest was between these two points. The road from Vincennes by the way of Vandalia, united with this road at Macoupin point, and entered Springfield as above described, over the hill where the new State House is building, and running on First street, to Jefferson, and passing the Abrams Hotel, the principal hotel of the city, on the corner of First and Jefferson, continued on Jefferson to Fourth street, where the St. Nicholas now stands, there turning to the north, in a nearly straight line, to the present residence of Mr. Converse, thence to the Sangamon river, very nearly on the line of the present road, and thence north by Musie's Bridge and Peoria to Galena. This was then called the Fort Clark road. The next road in importance was the road to Beardstown, which running west, on Jefferson street and crossing the Town Branch at the tan-yard and old mill, followed very near the present line of road to Beardstown. The east and west road from Jacksonville, very near its present line, united with the Beardstown road at the Town Branch and passed through Springfield on Jefferson street to the square, and thence east through an open prairie, and crossed Sugar creek, near Major Iles' farm.

"In 1818, Elisha Kelly visited the present site of Springfield, there then being no white inhabitants north of Edwardsville. He was pleased with the situation because it abounded with game and was a good hunting ground. He returned to North Carolina and induced his family connection to move, and in the year 1819 John Kelly built a cabin north of the Town Branch, near where it is crossed by Jefferson street, the present site of the residence of General Anderson. With John lived his father and several unmarried brothers. William Kelly built a cabin north of John, on a tract owned afterwards by Archer G. Herndon, now the residence of C. A. Gehrman, the merchant. Andrew Elliot built still further north at the place where he died, now Elliot's addition; all these cabins were near the timber of the Town Branch. These were the first settlers of Springfield, if not of Sangamon county. It may well be wondered why those primitive settlers, having the choice of the whole country, should select these inferior sites for cultivation, rather than the higher and better lands in the vicinity. The answer is found in the wants, and opinions of that early day. They needed water and fuel, these were found on the Town Branch. They needed shelter from the wind, they found it in the timber of Town Branch; above all other things, they wanted a good hunting ground; that they also found on the Town Branch and Spring creek, one of the very best of hunting grounds, and moreover in the opinion of the early settlers, they who occupied the land bordering on the timber, would become practically, the owners of the outside prairie, as their pasture ground forever.

On the 28th day of October, 1823, he entered Springfield by First to Jefferson street. At the crossing of First and Jefferson, looking west, on the margin of the timber and Town Branch, stood the old horse-mill of John Taylor, then abandoned, and the tan-yard of William Procter, now living at Lewiston. Both of these buildings were on the north of Jefferson street, and intermediate between them and First street was a corn field. On the south side of Jefferson, and west of First street, stood the houses of John Sherril, a shoemaker, and John Moor, who had married Mrs. Hawley, the estimable mother of E. B. Hawley and Isaac Hawley; and west of Moor were the cabins of Uncle Billy Fagan and of William Baker. Going thence east on Jefferson street, first stood the hotel of Mr. Abrams, on the south side, and adjoining was the dwelling and store of John Taylor, next the Buck Tavern, kept by Andrew Elliot, next the grocery and adjoining dwelling of William Carpenter. On the opposite side of Jefferson was first what was once the old tavern, but then the dwelling of Colonel Cox and family. Next east were five or six small two-room frame buildings, with ends to the street: the first occupied by Jessie Cormack in the front room as a tinner's shop, while Asa S. Shaw occupied the rear room as a justice's office; next was the store house of Mordecai Mobley; next the grocery of Ebenezer Capps, and the two next on the corner were occupied as the store of General James D. Henry, with Philip C. Latham as clerk. Following east on Jefferson and across Second street, at the corner, on the right, stood the store where Elijah Iles sold goods, and John Williams performed well the duties of clerk. The family of Major Iles resided in the same house. Next was a two-story log house, in the lower room of which Jabez Capps had a shoemaker's shop, the upper room being the residence of his family. Opposite, on the north side of Jefferson, and on its corner with Second street, stood a small log house, occupied as a store and dwelling by Archer G. Herndon; next east was a two-room frame house, with end to the street, the front room occupied by Hooper Warren as a printing office, and the rear room as the dwelling of his family; next, and on an eighty-foot lot, stood a two-story house, with two rooms below, with a hall between, occupied as a residence by Paschal P. Enos and his family, except the east lower room, which was used as a land office. Continuing east on Jefferson, and crossing Third street, and as you looked south on Third, not far from the south end of the Chicago & Alton Depot, stood another two-room frame building, with end to Third street, occupied by a carpenter named Fowler as a residence; next was Levi Goodin in a cabin on the south side of Jefferson, while on the corner of Fourth and Jefferson, on the south side, stood the residence of General James Adams. On the north side of Jefferson, between Third and Fourth streets, stood a double log building, the residence of Gorden Abrams. Next, on the corner of Fourth and Jefferson, stood the residence and shop of Dr. Jayne. This house still stands, and is occupied by Mr. Baum as a stone and marble establishment. Still going east on Jefferson, and crossing Fourth street to the right, on the eighty-foot lot on which the St. Nicholas now stands, was a two-story double log house, the residence of Charles Boyd, a tailor. On the north side of Jefferson, and opposite to Boyd, was the residence of Thomas Strawbridge and his sister, Mrs. Anderson. Jacob Plank resided in a two-room frame house, on the corner of Sixth and Jefferson, and crossing Sixth street, on the corner lot of Jefferson and Fifth streets stood the blacksmith shop of John White, and his residence adjoining. On the opposite side was the cabin of the Tuckers, and these were the last houses on East Jefferson. Crossing to Washington street, and beginning again on First street and moving east between First and Second and on the block south and on the site of the present residence of Major Orendorff, stood a two-story frame house, the best in the village, the then residence of Dr. John Todd. This frame house was afterwards removed and still stands nearly opposite, across the street. Going still east on Washington near the corner of Washington and Third and near the present site of the flouring mill, stood a log cabin, the residence of Polly, a colored woman, and her family. Still east, on the corner of Washington and Fourth, stood a double frame house then occupied as a residence by Joe Thomas, afterwards purchased by and made the residence of Dr. John G. Bergen, while on the same block, and near the corner of Washington and Fifth, stood the residence of Asa S. Shaw. On the opposite block, and on the corner where now stands the Chenery House, there stood the cabin of a colored woman, called familiarly Aunt Creecy, and these were the only houses on Washington street. There were but two houses of Adams street, the blacksmith shop of Aleck Humphreys, and his residence adjoining, situated on the corner of Adams and Third, on the north side, opposite to the Episcopal Church, and the residence of Dr. Garrett Elkin, on the two lots on the south side of Adams, where it corners with Sixth street, now occupied by the magnificent stores of C. M. Smith and others, the very centre of business. Washington lles and family live in a two-room frame house on the corner of Monroe and Fourth streets, the present site of the Second Presbyterian Church. Rivers McCormack, a Methodist circuit rider, had built and lived in a cabin on Monroe, on part of the Tyndale hill, but he had ceased to occupy it. Fronting the public square, on the corner of Sixth and Adams, stood a two-story frame building, the lower rooms of which were used as a court room, while the upper was used by Charles R. Matheny as a clerk's office. Fronting the public square on the west, and on the lot now occupied by Joel Brown as a book and drug store, stood another two-room frame house, with end to the street, then occupied by Dr. Darling as a family residence. On the east side of the public square was the whipping post.

I saw two men punished at the whipping post. The last was named Watson, who was sentenced to receive eighty lashes for an attempt to rob Mr. Bouge. General Henry, the sheriff, inflicted the punishment, and it was doubted by those who saw it, whether Henry or Watson suffered most. Henry was very pale, and I hope never to see another such a sight. I believe I have enumerated all the buildings in the village of Springfield; all north of Jefferson, all east of Sixth street, and south of Adams, except as above mentioned, was unbroken prairie, except that Charles R. Matheny and family lived on the corner of Sixth and Cook streets, now the residence of Mrs. Irwin, and there cultivated about forty acres; and Edward Mitchell resided with his family northeast of the public square, on a small farm, which afterwards was laid out into Mitchell's addition.

"The town of Springfield then had not exceeded five hundred inhabitants, and they were from every section and State in the Union, generally young people, except where the father or grandfather had come out with some younger branch of his family. They were, as a rule, poor, and had moved West to better their fortunes. It required some courage and nerve then to emigrate to the West, and therefore they were generally energetic and enterprising. They were persons who had come from good families East; had seen good society, and were as well educated, cultivated and refined as were the inhabitants of towns of the same size East or West. All had traveled more or less to reach Illinois, and some had come from the remote States. This gave them an advantage over citizens of the old States, in the knowledge of men and things which travel brings along with it. All were on equality, the only distinction arising from superior intelligence or better moral character. This equality rendered them social, hospitable and kind to each other, and ready to receive strangers with open arms. Their social intercourse was free from forms and restraint, which wealth and more extended social circles bring along with them. They met together on the street, in the offices, or around the family circle, and were happy in their intercourse with each other. The young lady who wished to have company in the evening did not send out elegant cards, but placed a lighted candle in her window; the young men, collected around the four corners at the crossings of Second and Jefferson, would see the light, accept the invitation, and assemble for social enjoyment. I remember well the first time this occurred after my arrival. Miss Clarissa Benjamin, now Van Bergen, placed her candle in the window of the parlor room, above the store of Major Iles. Phil. Latham gave notice by exclaiming: 'Boys, Clarissa's candle is in the window; let us go over.' The young men assembled there, and found Miss Clarissa Benjamin, Misses Hannah and Margaret Taylor, the Misses Dryers, and Miss Jane Bergen. It was a pleasant, social evening, and these ladies were as handsome, refined, and entertained as well and gracefully, as the young ladies of the present day.

The people then in Springfield were moral and honest; there was little stealing or cheating. There was no occasion then to lock up the doors and bar the windows at night; they had no fear of sleeping with all open. The use of ardent spirits was perhaps more general then than now, but there was less drunkenness. To drink was then fashionable, and the wonder is that all did not become drunkards. I have remarked that all the early settlers of the town who habitually used ardent spirits, and especially those who used them to excess, have made no mark in the world, but died young, and are forgotten; while the sober men, as a rule, have become heads of large and respectable families, lived respectably, and contributed to the building up of the city and the advancement of all its social interests.

"Grouping the business men of that day, the lawyers were Gen. James Adams, Gen. Thos. M. Neale, Col. James Strode, Thomas Moffitt and Jonathan H. Pugh, men of mark then, but now all dead and forgotten, overshadowed by that brilliant galaxy of lawyers, their successors, which adorned the Sangamon Bar between the years 1830 and 1840. The physicians were Dr. John Todd, Dr. Gershom Jayne, Dr. Garret Elkin, Dr. Ephram Darling. They were good physicians in any country, were men of intelligence, estimable in all their social relations; besides they were men of splendid physique, and able to endure the arduous labor of the practice of the day which required them to ride night and day, on horseback or in the sulky, for fifty miles around. The merchants were Elijah Iles, Gen. Henry, Mordecai Mobley, John Taylor, Archer G. Herndon, while Ebenezer Capp kept the grocery; they were all good men then, and enjoyed the confidence of the community. Charles R. Matheny was clerk of the Circuit and County courts, and in fact filled all the offices of the county. He emigrated from Virginia, was a lawyer by education and a Methodist preacher by practice. He had been Clerk of the House of Representatives, and a member of that body.

He was a good and useful man, had a pleasant, smiling countenance, beaming with benevolence as if the light of Heaven was shining on him, singling him out from the others. Jonathan H. Pugh was born in Bath county, Kentucky; a lawyer by profession. Emigrating to the West, he settled in Bond county, Illinois; removed to Springfield, Illinois, about the year 1824, where he lived until his death in 1834. He was possessed of a remarkably pleasant address, and was, in the fall of 1828, the most prominent and popular man in Northern Illinois. He had a good and showy intellect, was brilliant in his wit, and sparkling repartee, and for his social qualities was beloved by his friends. He was ambitious, and was elected three times as a Representative in the legislature. He was a candidate for Congress in 1832, and defeated by Gov. Duncan. His mortification was so great that he surrendered to a habit which became his fatal enemy, died about the age of thirty-five years, and fills an unknown grave.

"General James D. Henry was a shoemaker by trade, which he followed at Edwardsville; removed to Springfield, and became a merchant; was sheriff of the county two or three terms; was first a Colonel and then a Brigadier General in the Black Hawk war, and at the battle of Wisconsin proved himself the hero of that war. He was a man of good understanding, of fine person, brave and generous, of wonderful magnetic influence and power to attach men to him. He went to New Orleans in the spring of 1834 for his health, and died and was buried there. At the time of his death he could have been elected to any office in the gift of the people of Illinois, and the only question he debated, was whether in the election of 1834, he would be a member of Congress or Governor. He died aged about forty years, possessed of a good constitution and a bright future before him, the victim of the same bad habit. Asa S. Shaw was from the State of New York, where he had been a merchant and failed; settling at Springfield he became emphatically the Justice of the Peace, possessed of a very strong intellect, good judgment, and superior business qualifications, and capable of great usefulness; but he, too, succumbed in the meridian of life to the same fatal enemy.

"I have singled out these three men because they were my friends, to whom I was sincerely attached, and whose memory to-day, after the lapse of more than forty years, is still green and fragrant, and I mean no wrong to them when I would use this occasion to impress upon all, and especially upon the young, that ardent spirits, habitually used, will soon become the master of the man; will undermine the strongest constitution; it will quench the brightest genius; blight the fairest prospects, and will dig for him an early, if not a dishonorable grave.

"No attempted picture of Springfield would be complete in which Major Elijah Iles had not a prominent place. Emigrating from Bath county, Kentucky, to Missouri in 1818, and to Springfield, Illinois, in 1821, where he yet lives, at the age of eighty-seven years, when the site of Springfield was a prairie, with the exception of the cabins of the Kellys and of Elliott. He became a boarder in the cabin of John Kelly, and then repeatedly saw Elliott and one of the Kelly's return in the morning from hunting up the town branch, with a deer which had been shot near where the Governor's house now stands, and off which he breakfasted. He opened a store and sold goods for many years; was a Major in the Winnebago war, and a captain of a spy company in the Black Hawk war. He served the county of Sangamon two terms in the State Senate, and could have served longer had he not preferred to retire. He was one of the original proprietors of the town, and at that early day contributed largely to its growth, while his home, presided over by his estimable wife, assisted by her graceful sister, Miss Benjamin, was the pleasant resort of the young people. By his sagacity and industry he has acquired a large fortune, without wrong or suspicion of wrong to any one. His name was without a stain—modest and unassuming, through his long life, he has had the love and respect of his friends, and now, amid the sorrows of his old age, has the respect and sympathy of the entire community.

"Sangamon county was settled originally, with some exceptions, by a class of men known on the frontiers as bee-hunters; men who were the advance guard of emigration, following fast upon the flight of the bees. These were a hardy and honest race of men, who loved adventure, the freedom and independence of frontier life, and did not love to be crowded by close neighbors, or offended by the accompaniments of civilization. This class would emigrate to a new country, establish a claim of some sort to a piece of land, build a cabin, raise corn enough to feed their horses and hogs, and for bread, and spend the leisure time hunting and fishing, and when a second and better class of emigration flowed in, would sell out their claims and move still further west to the still advancing frontier. That change, to a great extent, had taken place in

Sangamon in the fall of 1828, and was then going on. The bee-hunters were going west to Brown, Adams and Pike counties, Illinois; then to Iowa and Missouri, and are doubtless still hunting the frontier, if indeed there is now any frontier. Their place had been supplied, and was being supplied by emigrants of a different class, from almost every State in the Union, but principally from Ohio, Kentucky, Virginia and the New England States.

"Those came mostly from the middle classes of society, which embraces the bone and sinew of every country. They were generally from the mountainous sections, and were large in person, moral, honest, and hospitable; the latch-string of their door was always out. They were manly, brave, generous, frank; when, with a warm smile on their face, they clasped their hands in yours, you instinctively felt the heart went with it. These early settlers of Sangamon were a race of good and noble men, worthy to be the fathers of our great country, and their sons should remember their ancestry, and never disgrace them.

"As the result of their labors, early toils and hardships, we have the great county of Sangamon, with its wealthy, thriving, peaceful and happy neighborhood. I say peaceful, and in proof, I would mention the fact that the law docket of Sangamon has always shown less litigation than other counties. It is sometimes said that the docket of a county is a very true index of its wealth and business; not so with Sangamon. In wealth and business, and traffic, it will compare favorably with any other county in the State.

"It may be invidious to single out any of these early settlers, as all cannot be mentioned here, but as representatives of the whole, I would mention the Darneils, the Wycoffs, the McGwins, the Morris's, the Kinneys, the Cloyds, of Lick creek; the Pattons, the Husbands, the Crows, the Fletchers, the Drennans, the Dodds, and Isaac Keys, of Sugar creek; the Elkins, the Constants, the McDaniels, the Pickrells, and the Dawsons, of the North Fork; the Casses, the Burns, the Lawsons and St. Clairs, of Buffalo Hart; the Cantralls, the Councils, the Powers, of Fancy Creek; the Irwins, the Cartwrights, the Carsons, the Purviances, the Andersons and the Harrisons, of Richland; the Sims, the McCoy's, the Morgans, and the Earnests, of Spring creek; and the Beckenridges, the Bakers, the Neals, and the Staffords and Sattlys, of Fork Prairie; Samuel Williams, the Fouches, the Ellises, the Yates, the Wilcoxes, of Island Grove; the Iles, Charles R. Matheny, Drs. Todd, Jayne and Elkin, Pascal P. Enos, John Taylor, Archer G. Herndon, Philip C. Latham, John Williams, Gen. Henry and Jonathan H. Pugh, and Peter VanBergen, of Springfield.

"Further singling out, I would present to your memory as a fair sample of the whole, Captain John Durnell, a man about six feet in height, handsome and well-formed, easy in his manner, because by nature a gentleman, frank, generous and true; you felt in his presence as with one who was every inch a man.

"These early settlers, I owe them much, when almost a boy and a stranger they received me with open arms, and have, in a thousand ways, showered upon me favors beyond my deserts; I owe them a large debt of gratitude, and would do all I might to honor their memories. Most of them are dead and gone, and I hope have settled for all time, in a better country, around the throne of God, and along the banks of the 'beautiful river.' Some few of us old settlers still linger on these coasts of Time; one by one they are passing away, and those of us who remain are fast becoming strangers amid the new generations around us.

"We are taught in the story of the Cross, and we believe that a great scheme of redemption has been provided for our race by the Great Father, and if we do our duty here to our country, our fellow men, and to our God, that somewhere in His great universe a heaven has been provided as our happy, eternal home, and the thought is a consoling one, that although fast becoming strangers here, yet, when we cross the great river of Time which divides that happy land from ours, we will meet more friends than we leave behind us; that we will know them, and they us; and that then the reunion of old settlers will be joyous, complete, and without end."

BY DR. ALEXANDER SHIELDS.

"It is said that I first breathed the atmosphere in the year of 1797, in Franklin county, Pennsylvania. Although I was there at the time, and took an active part in the affair, I have no recollection of the transaction, and have to depend on the declaration of others for the truth of my statement.

"I was brought up on a farm until about eighteen years of age; went to a common school in the winter; did all kinds of work that is done on a farm, and that, I believe, gave me a strength and vigor of constitution that has enabled me to resist the physical elements with which we are surrounded, and are at constant war against the functions of life. At eighteen, I became impressed with an ardent desire to acquire knowledge; went nine months to a Latin school; pursued my studies with a resolution that knew no failure, and at the expiration of seven years, graduated at the University of Pittsburg, Pennsylvania. In my literary pursuits, I read a motto that was placed over the door of a heathen temple—'Genosko se auto' (Know thyself)—that made a strong impression on my mind. I became fascinated with the idea of knowing myself. Anatomy and physiology appeared to be the proper branches for that purpose, consequently I devoted myself to the study of medical science, and after the lapse of seven years, graduated at the University of Pennsylvania, in Philadelphia, in 1833.

"During all these years I never thought of the 'mighty dollar,' only when necessity forced it upon me. It will appear from these statements that I did not creep in at the back door and foist myself on the profession, without, at least, making an effort to acquire a knowledge of the high and responsible duties pertaining to it. I devoted myself two years to my profession in Pennsylvania, and then directed my destiny toward the setting sun, in the Far West. Before bidding a long farewell to good old Pennsylvania, I will state a couple of incidents that occurred during my stay in Pittsburg. In 1824, General Lafayette and son visited Pittsburg, and the city became wild with enthusiasm. Of course he was tendered the hospitality of the city. The reception was grand and imposing. At least one hundred thousand people gave him an enthusiastic welcome. I, in conjunction with thousands of others, had the pleasure of shaking his hand. It is human nature to feel pleasure in shaking hands with a patriot like Lafayette.

"The other incident was a visit of Henry Clay, Secretary of State, under John Q. Adams. His reception was cold, and forbidding; in fact the people were bitterly opposed to him in consequence of his vote in favor of Adams against General Jackson. A few friends called to see him at his hotel, and being enlisted in his favor, induced others to call, until it became general; strange to say, he 'swallowed' all that called to see him. He remained four or five days, and visited our manufacturing establishments, and the tables were turned so much in his favor that a public dinner must be tendered. There were no public buildings suitable, and Henry Hildship was requested to give the use of his paper mill, one day for the purpose. Rapp, the head of a colony, eighteen miles below Pittsburg, sent up two or three barrels of wine for the occasion. The building was crowded to its utmost capacity. We had a feast worthy the city, and worthy the man to whom it was given. Many toasts were given and drank; finally, a toast was given in honor of Henry Clay, and his responding closed the feast. The toast was as follows, as near as I can recollect: 'Here's to Henry Clay, of Kentucky, who on his way home from Washington, stopped at Pittsburg, and had the power to stop Henry Holdship's paper mill one entire day, which never stopped before on any occasion.'

"He (Clay), boldly went over his political actions, in relation to Adams, and declared he would do so again under the same circumstances. Such eloquence I never heard; such enthusiasm I never saw; perhaps the wine helped to increase it.

"Early in April, 1835, I got on board a steamboat for St. Louis; remained there a few days; wandered about seeing the country, and at last wound up my travels at Springfield, Illinois, on the 15th of May, 1835. The next day it commenced raining and rained about forty days and nights, until the prairie east of town was about a foot deep with water, and no outlet; the water disappeared by evaporation and sinking in the soil. The sidewalks were composed of mud about three inches deep, and when crossing the streets, we rolled our pantaloons above our boots and waded through. Disgusted with the mud, I went up north to a place called Tremont, a town of stakes and grass. A colony from the east had purchased of the Federal Government a quantity of land about three months before, laid out a town, and called it Tremont. A part of the colony were living in their stables which they built first, and carpenters were busy framing their houses. They received me very kindly and expressed a desire for me to locate there, to examine the location of their town, and pick out a lot anywhere not already taken. I commenced taking a view of the place, and every few minutes a rattlesnake gave me warning to keep off, and I abandoned the examination. They declared that their object was to settle the country and develop the resources of the soil; that speculation with them was out of the question. I made choice of a lot, perhaps the one-eighth part of an acre, on the northeast corner of the square. I applied to the agent for his terms for the lot. He proposed to let me have the lot for $200, twenty cash, give note for $180, drawing twelve per cent. interest, and bind myself to put a house on worth $2,000. I denounced them as a set of speculators and gougers; mounted my horse; hastened to Springfield, regardless of the mud.

"When I returned to Springfield great changes had taken place; the sidewalks and streets were dry and pleasant. The waters had subsided within the banks of the streams, and sickness to a great extent set in, in consequence of decaying vegetable matter; intermittent, remittent and typhoid fevers prevailed, and for a number of years that summer was known by the name of the 'sickly season.' I hung out my 'shingle,' and was called upon to see a sick family near Clear Lake, and had to cross the river at Denma's ferry, about a quarter of a mile above Riverton; after being ferried over three or four days, I concluded to ford the stream. I had a very spirited 'nag,' and strange as it may appear, I rode with a spur on my heel. When I reached the river a large drove of cattle were entering the water, and a man was mounted on a very large ox in front. I went into the water about twenty yards above. The water rose to the sides of my 'nag,' and I raised my feet to avoid getting wet; sunk the spur into her flank; she made a sudden spring forward, and pitched me over her head into the stream. I requested the man on the ox to come and take me on behind him; he, with a grin and squeaking voice, informed me that his horse wouldn't carry double. There I was baptized a citizen of Sangamon county, and, by some superior power, have remained so to this time.

"In the summer of 1835, the State Bank and branches went into operation. We had State banks, local banks, and 'wild cat banks,' and paper money was as plenty as blackberries. Times were prosperous, and the people entered the public lands to a great extent with paper money, causing serious loss to the Government. In 1836, General Jackson issued a specie circular, requiring the lands to be paid for in specie. This caused a run on the banks, and in a little while all the banks in the country burst up and went to 'pot.' Our currency became worthless; distress and hard times came upon us; business of all kinds was depressed, and I bought corn in Springfield, delivered at five cents per bushel. The State also commenced building railroads. Every road must be completed at the same time; consequently, in a little while she became bankrupt in the sum of seventeen millions, and no roads. Another question enlisted the public mind. The temporary seat of government at Vandalia was about expiring, and the permanent location was agitated with a great deal of zeal by different parties. We had the celebrated 'long nine' to engineer our claims. They finally accomplished the end by Springfield giving a bribe, in the name of a bonus, of fifty thousand dollars to the State. The County Commissioners donated to the State the public square, and the building of a State House commenced. The legislature met in the churches and passed laws for the good of the people. Springfield numbered at that time perhaps six or seven hundred people, and being simply a corporation, it must be elevated to the name of a city. A charter is framed, and presented to the legislature for its sanction.

"The framers of the Charter found that there would be considerable opposition to it, when submitted to a vote of the people, inserted a clause excluding all unnaturalized citizens from voting for or against its adoption, when, at that time, persons that were here six months were entitled to vote, even for President of the United States. Colonel Baker was a member of the legislature, and, as I understood, voted for it, with this objectionable clause in it. That gave rise to a difficulty between him and me that has never been understood. He, being an Englishman, from the same country where two of my brothers-in-law came from, excluded them from voting. I, boiling over with indignation at the idea of his excluding his own countrymen from voting, declared that I would challenge his vote. He, being aware of the fact, came on the day of election prepared with his father's naturalized papers, which naturalized him, he being a minor at the time. When he came to vote, I challenged it, and that gave rise to a good deal of insulting language. At length, he used an expression that was not true, and I called him a liar. That ended the war of words. He then requested me to go out on the street, and he would 'lick' me as soon as he polled his vote. I went out and waited for him. When he came, he quietly asked what I said at the polls. I said he was a liar. Expecting him to strike with his right, he gave me a lick with his left fist, on the side of my head, that knocked me wild; then the 'ball' opened. I tried for some time to hit him, but he fended off so well that I was unable to touch him.

"His fist was soft; my head was hard, and by the time he raised some five or six knots, his fist was useless. Unable to hit him with my fist, I changed my tactics, and commenced kicking. After two or three kicks he caught my foot and hoisted me over; while falling I caught him and drew him down upon me, and then reached to get him by the throat, and my thumb landed in his eye. I concluded to let it remain there. The Democrats thought I might 'fight it out on this line if it took all summer,' but the Whigs thought differently, and pulled us apart, and that pulled my thumb out of his eye. This affair closed up by each of us paying fifteen dollars for fracturing the law. I can justly say that Colonel Baker was a most eloquent and formidable political opponent, and three or four months after, when our passions cooled down, we shook hands and made friends, and then I came to the conclusion we had both been a pair of great fools.

"The charter was adopted, and William May was elected Mayor of the city. Josiah Lamborn was States Attorney. At that time a man by the name of Archibald Trayler, as upright and good a citizen as can be found anywhere, lived there. William Trayler and his brother, with them a man named Fisher, came on a visit to their brother, Archibald Trayler, who lived near Captain Ransdell's Hotel. The captain had a niece living with him, and William Trayler had an inkling towards her, and the captain was bitterly opposed to him, and set spies to watch their movements. Their movements were mysterious, as usual when a woman is mixed up in the affair.

"Two of the Traylers and Fisher were seen going northwest into the timber and remained there some time; at length two returned, and Fisher was not with them; the next day the Traylers started for home, and took the same route through the timber, and, according to the spies, wound round in by-roads until finally they came into the Beardstown road. Four or five days after, the Traylers came back in search of Fisher. This gave rise to the suspicion that Fisher had been foully dealt with, and caused the greatest excitement among the people, William May and Lamborn engineered the matter; seized the Traylers, and had the timber searched for four or five days, in order to find Fisher. They soon found the place, where it was supposed Fisher was killed, and search was continued in order to find the body. In the afternoon of the third day, I went down in the timber, and met two men, who inquired if I had seen the place where Fisher had been killed, I replied that I had not; they then led me into the brush about fifty yards, where there was a circular spot, perhaps twelve or fifteen feet in diameter, cleared off, and near the center was a stump with a number of sprouts growing round it, and close by the stump there was an impression in the soil, resembling exactly what the back of a man's head would make in falling with considerable force. Directly after, Dr. Merriman and six or eight others came into the circle opposite; some one wondered if there was any hair or blood about the stump; Dr. Merriman examined it critically on his hands and knees; no hair or blood was found, the next day quantities of hair, even the man's whiskers, were found about the stump.

"In the evening I went down town, and the street opposite the Mayor's office was crowded with people, and Lamborn among them. Being well acquainted with him, he took me to one side, and informed me that he had told William Trayler that he had testimony to hang the whole three of them, and the only way of escape was to turn State's evidence; he became so alarmed that he was willing to give testimony to the killing of Fisher. The next morning, I and five or six others went to the lower road, to see Hickox's mill pond opened, in order to find Fisher. When opposite the spot where Fisher should have been killed, a young man came running down, shouting 'they found plenty of hair, even the man's whiskers.' I informed him that game would not work, as Dr. Merriman had examined the spot the evening before, and no hair could be found. This circumstance led to the suspicion that a conspiracy had been formed to encompass the death of Archibald Trayler. Five or six hundred people met at the mill. William May mounted a log and made a speech, urging the necessity of drawing off the water, in order to find the body. It was a dry season, and water was valuable to Hickox. I opposed it, without first paying a just compensation. He then appointed a committee of five, Morris Lindsay, chairman, to wait on Hickox and ascertain the damage. Two hundred dollars were demanded. The committee reported, and May thought it too high, and sent them back with instructions to offer fifty dollars or nothing; so Hickox was compelled to submit.

"When the water was reduced about four feet, we went up to where the Beardstown road crossed the stream, and a number went into the water in search of the body; the crowd on the bank and Archibald Trayler, under bonds, stood off about forty yards from the crowd, a forlorn spectator of the scenes. I went to him, with the desire to find out what grudge May and Lamborn had against him; but he appeared so depressed that I gave it up and went back to the crowd on the bank. It so happened that I had lost an axe at that point, in getting ice, and I proposed to give a dollar to the man that would find it, and that they would be more likely to find the axe than Fisher. They looked 'daggers' at me, and a low murmur went through the crowd, and I discovered my imprudence when it was too late. About sundown we left without Fisher. When we arrived at Springfield, a doctor in the vicinity of Wm. Trayler's home, hearing of the excitement, was there declaring that Fisher was at home and well. They seized the doctor, declared him an accomplice, and demanded that Fisher must be presented in person. Archibald Trayler's partner and Mr. John Maxcy, I was informed, went for Fisher. They returned late in the evening, and the next day the trial came on. After an elaborate train of circumstantial evidence, together with Wm. Trayler's positive testimony, were given, Judge Logan, Archibald Trayler's attorney, stated that he would introduce just one witness. He made a sign, and introduced Fisher, to the consternation of all present.

"The result was that Archibald Trayler's usefulness was destroyed, and he wandered about like a person in a dream. About two years after, a messenger came for me at twelve o'clock at night, to see Trayler, who was very sick; when I saw him he was exhausted, and in a few hours departed this life. The plain, natural and just solution of this mysterious affair appears to be simply this. Wm. Trayler had a great fancy for Capt. Ransdell's niece, and she had a fancy for him, and the Captain was intensely opposed to it. Trayler was determined to steal the girl, and she was willing to be stolen, and in order to be prepared for the theft, the three men went down into the timber to find if there were any by-roads that would lead into the Beardstown road; then Fisher is sent home on foot, and arrangements made with the girl to meet him in the timber. When he departed for home he took that direction, and the girl being unable to escape the vigilance of the Captain and his spies, did not appear; after waiting a reasonable time, he then went to the Beardstown road on his way home.

"This unfortunate affair had a good deal of truth and falsehood mixed up together, and demonstrates that when people become greatly excited they lose all their reasoning powers; that mobs and strikes and factions are developed in like manner; that they contain more or less fanatics, and cannot possibly exist without leaders, and when political factions become strong in numbers they are dangerous to civil government.

"From the fourth of March, 1837, to the fourth of March, 1841, Van Buren was President. The State was sunk to the lowest depths of embarrassment; she could not pay the interest on her bonds; they depreciated to a mere nominal value; emigration ceased, and repudiation appeared to be inevitable. Governor Ford then made arrangements to call a convention, to amend the Constitution so as to provide for the payment of the interest and principal of the State debt. The convention provided that two mills on the dollar (twenty cents on the hundred dollars) of the State tax should be set apart for the express purpose of paying the interest and principal of the State debt. It was submitted to a vote of the people and adopted. The people declared, by their vote, we will pay the debt, to the last dollar, let it cost what it will. That act of the people fixed the destiny of the State; the bonds began to rise; emigration flowed in, and wealth increased to such an extent that Governor Matteson, in his last message to the legislature, declared that from the ratio of increasing population and wealth, the State of Illinois would not owe a dollar in 1868. The increase in population and wealth was even greater than Matteson's estimate. Notwithstanding, when 1868 came around we were millions in debt. It is said the State is now—1881—out of debt; but the people, failing to profit by experience, and getting railroads on the brain, have embarrassed counties and towns to a great extent.

"In 1840, the Democratic party nominated Van Buren a second term for President, and the Whig party, General Harrison for the same office. In that campaign, the leading principles of the Whigs were 'coon-skins, log cabins, with the string of the latch never pulled in, and hard cider; two dollars a day and roast beef.' The side issues were the extravagance of the White House, with its gold spoons, and a high protective tariff on foreign importations. A member of Congress, by the name of Evans, made a speech in favor of protective tariff; it was printed in pamphlet form, and sent broadcast over the country; the Whigs thought it a 'stunner,' and exulted to a great extent over it. There was a Democrat over the Illinois river, named Bob Burton, who had a mill, and the Whigs thought to convert him, if he would read the speech; after reading it carefully he made a new toll dish, according to the reasoning in the speech, double the size of the one he used, and he called it Whig, the other he called Democrat. He placed them side by side, and when a Whig came he pointed out the two measures, and informed him that he would toll his corn with the Whig measure because it was made according to Evans' speech, and that is, the bigger the toll the less you pay for grinding, and the more meal you get. It was said that he, by this practical illustration of the speech, converted a number of Whigs to the Democratic party. The speech appeared to be a tissue of sophistry, and the gist of it was simply this, the higher the prices, the more you paid for merchandise, the less it cost you.

"In this campaign, great excitement prevailed over the country. A man came to Springfield, announced himself as 'General John Ewing, from Vincennes, Indiana,' and challenged the whole Democratic party on the issues of the day, threatening to annihilate it by the power of his eloquence. The leaders of the party, Edwards, Stewart, Baker, Lincoln, and Logan, as talented men as Indiana or any other State in the Union could boast of, concluded to let this boaster try his hand. We had Douglas and Calhoun. We pitted Douglas against him. At that time there was no 'red tape,' as it is now, in our public meetings. The contesting parties arranged and timed their speaking. In this case, each one was to speak an hour alternately, and be timed by one from each party; to begin at eight o'clock, adjourn at twelve; meet at two, and continue to sundown each day, until the contest would be ended. At the close of the fifth day, 'General John Ewing, from Vincennes, Indiana,' threw up the 'sponge,' and a vigorous shout was given by the Democrats. On the northwest corner of the public square stood a market-house. There we met, and each speaker, mounted on a butcher-block, rolled out his eloquence. E. D. Baker, mortified at Ewing's defeat, mounted a butcher-block, and began to address us. We protested that that game of 'two pluck one' could not be tolerated. He persisted, and immediately the cry was raised, 'Pull him down,' 'Pull him down.' At length he yielded, otherwise it would have ended with a number of broken heads. General Harrison was elected; but the 'two dollars a day and roast beef,' promised the laboring man, never came.

"In 1844 I became impressed with a strong desire to live in the country; I bought eighty acres of land, eight miles southeast of Springfield, and in the spring of 1845 moved on it, and then commenced farming and the practice of medicine; right here I made the great mistake of my life, when I left Springfield. It is thought by many, that if a doctor locates in the country, he loses all the brains and mental acquirements he ever had, as if location determined a man's ability, when, in fact, the most notorious 'quacks' that disgrace the profession, congregate in cities and towns.

"The National Democratic Convention nominated James K. Polk in 1844, under the operation of the two-thirds rule, and many Democrats were enquiring 'who's James K. Polk?' demonstrating the fact that an obscure man was put in nomination, and the prominent leading men of the party cast aside. Having studied Thomas Jefferson's doctrines of a Republican form of government, his great fundamental principle, that the fairly expressed will of a majority of the people, expressed their sovereign will, and that the minority should yield implicit obedience to the will of the majority, I opposed the two-thirds rule as a direct violation of his principles, and being a zealous and sincere friend of Stephen A. Douglas, I came to the conclusion that he never could be President under its operation. The South, being in a large minority, dictated terms to the North through its power, and the North yielded for the sake of power and control of the Government.

"In 1852, General Pierce was nominated, another obscure candidate, and Douglas' political head cut off. My zeal for Douglas carried me, a 'high private,' beyond the bounds of discretion, and caused me to offer a series of resolutions, in a county convention, denouncing the two-third rule as anti-Republican, anti-Democratic; and, to my utter astonishment, the friends of Douglas voted them down, and denounced them 'another firebrand.' The resolutions, seventeen, are recorded in the Sangamon Journal of October, 1852. I felt then that Douglas might justly exclaim, in the language of Julius Caesar, 'May the gods protect me from my friends, and I'll take care of my enemies.' This action of mine brought me in 'bad odor' with a number of Democrats, and 'if I did not like the way they conducted political affairs, I was politely invited to leave the party.' I had, at that time, great faith in the party, and did not feel justified in leaving. In 1856, the National Democratic party nominated James Buchanan, one of the prominent leaders, who afterwards turned out to be a kind of a milk and water 'dough-face,' but suited the South, as it was preparing to bring on a crisis. In 1860, it met at Charleston, South Carolina, and it was said that Douglas received a majority on the first ballot, but the two-third rule defeated him in getting the nomination. The friends of Douglas clung to him with great firmness, as it was the last chance, but they were ten or twelve years behind time.

"The South was preparing for rebellion, and Douglas was too patriotic, too energetic, too firm a man to be at the head of the Government. The consequence was that the convention burst into two factions, the South and the North; they adjourned to meet again in Baltimore. When they met there the friends of Douglas would not yield, and they burst up again, and each faction nominated its candidate; the South, Breckenridge, and the North, Douglas. It appeared to me, from the aspect of affairs, that it was impossible to elect Douglas, and when Lincoln was nominated, I then placed my hope in his election to save the Union, and bid a long farewell to the Democratic party. Some men boast that they never changed, that is, they never split their ticket when a convention told them who they should vote for, and aspirants for office frequently use it as an argument in their favor. It is an old saying that 'wise men change, but fools and idiots never change.' If a man discovers that he is in error, it is his right, it is his duty to change; but if a man changes through sordid, selfish motives, he is dishonest and corrupt.

"The Republican party had a grand rally on the eighth of August, 1860, in honor of Lincoln, and a procession said to be eight miles long was formed. Mr. Armstrong, a manufacturer, had a platform on a wagon and a loom with a web in it; in passing Lincoln's house, a tailor took his measure; cloth was woven, and a pair of pantaloons made and presented to him on the return of the procession. In that procession I carried a banner with the motto: 'Free labor elevates, Slave labor degrades'."

PIONEERS AND PIONEERING.

The following is a portion of a lecture delivered by William H. Herndon, shortly after the close of the rebellion. In the Life of Lincoln, by Mr. Holland, the biographers used these words: "When inefficient men become very uncomfortable, they are quite likely to try emigration as a remedy. A good deal of what is called the pioneering spirit, is simply the spirit of discontent." Mr. Herndon combats this idea in this address, which was re-delivered at Sweet Water, Menard county, Illinois, at the Old Settlers' meeting, August 31, 1881:

"There have been four distinct and separate waves—classes of men, who have followed each other, on the soil we now daily tread. The first is the Indian. The second is the bee and beaver hunter, the embodied spirit of western and south western pioneering; they roam with the first class, nomads, wandering Gipsies of the forests and the plains. The third class, with sub-classes and varieties, is composed of three distinct varieties of men, coming as a triple wave. The first is the religious man, the John the Baptist, preaching in the wilderness; the second is the honest, hardy, thrifty, active and economical farmer, and the third class is composed of the wild, hardy, honest, genial and social man—a mixture of the gentleman, the rowdy and roysterer; they are a wild, rattling, brave, social and hospitable class of men; they have no economy, caring only for the hour, and yet thousands of them grow rich; they give tone and caste and character to the neighborhood in spite of all that can be done; they are strong, shrewd, clever fellows; it is impossible to hate them, and impossible to outwit or whip them. The fourth class, with sub-classes and varieties, have come among us seeking fortune, position, character, power, fame; having ideas, philosophy, gearing the forces of nature for human uses, wants and purposes. They come from the east, the middle states, from the south; they come from every quarter of the globe, full grown men. Here are the English and the German, the Scotch and the Irish, the French and the Scandinavian, the Italian, the Portuguese, the Spaniard, Jew and Gentile; and here and there and everywhere is the universal, the eternal, indomitable and inevitable “Yankee,” victorious over all, and I as a “Sucker,” say welcome all. All, all, however, have their divine purposes in the high, deep, broad and wide extended, the sublime economy of God.

“I am necessitated, as it were, in self-defense, to speak some words of the second and third class, with sub-classes and varieties. The fourth class needs none. The original western and southwestern pioneer—the type of him is at times a somewhat open, candid, sincere, energetic, spontaneous, trusting, tolerant, brave and generous man. He is hospitable in his tent, thoroughly acquainted with the stars in the heavens, by which he travels, more or less; he is acquainted with all the dangers of his route—horse flesh and human flesh. He trusts to his own native sagacity—a keen shrewdness, and his physical power—his gun and dog alone. This original man is a long, tall, lean, lank man; he is a cadaverous, sallow, sunburnt, shaggy-haired man, his face is very sharp and exceedingly angular; his nose is long, pointed, and keen, Roman or Greek as it may be; and his eyes are small, grey or black, and sunken, are keen, sharp and inquisitive, piercing, as if looking through the object seen, and to the very background of things; he is sinewy and tough, calm or uneasy, according to circumstances; he is all bone and sinew, scarcely any muscle; is wise and endless in his determinations—obstinate. He wears a short linsey-wolsey hunting shirt, or one made from soft buck or doeskin, fringed with the same; it is buckled tightly about his body. His moccasins are made of the very best heavy buck. His trusty and true rifle is on his shoulder or stands by his side, his chin gracefully resting on his hand, which covers the muzzle of the gun. The gaunt, strong, hungry cur, crossed with the bull dog, and his hound, lie crouched at his feet, their noses resting on and between their fore paws, thrown straight out in front, ready to bound, seize master and defend. The lean, short, compact, tough and hardy, crop-eared, shaved-mane and bob-tailed pony browses around, living where the hare, the deer, mule or hardy mountain goat can live. It makes no difference where night or storm overtakes him, his wife and children sleep well and sound, knowing that the husband, the father, protector and defender, is safe from all harm. He sleeps on his rifle for pillow, his right hand awake on the long, sharp, keen hunting-knife in the girdle, carved over and over with game and deer. The will in the hand is awake. Such is the conscious will on the nerve and muscle of the hand, amid danger of a night, placed there to watch and ward while the general soul is asleep, that it springs to defense long before the mind is fully conscious of the facts. How grand and mysterious is mind! The family makes no wild outcry—“He’s shot or lost!” This man, his trusty long rifle, his two dogs—one to fight and one to scent the trail—the long, sharp and keen butcher knife, that never holds fire or flashes in the pan, are equal to all emergencies. As for himself, his snore on the grass, or brush-pile, cut to make his bed, testify to the soul’s conscious security. Whether in a hollow tree or log, or under and beneath the river’s bank for shelter—screen or fort—in night or daytime, his heart beats calm; he is a fatalist, and says “what is to be will be.” He never tires, is quick and shrewd, is physically powerful, is cunning, suspicious, brave and cautious alternately or all combined, according to necessity. He is swifter than the Indian, is stronger, is as long-winded, and has more brains—much more brains. This man is a bee-hunter, or trapper, or Indian fighter. He is nervous, uneasy, and quite fidgety in the village where he goes twice a year to exchange his furs for whisky, tobacco, powder, flints and lead. He dreads, does not scorn our civilization. Overtake the man, catch him, and try to hold a conversation with him, if you can. His eye and imagination are on the chase in the forest, when you think you are attracting his simple mind. He is restless in eye and motion about towns and villages; his muscles and nerves dance an uneasy, rapid, jerking dance when in presence of our civilization. He is suspicious here, and dangerous from his ignorance of the social world. This man is a man of acts and deeds, not of speech; he is at times stern, silent, secretive and somewhat uncommunicable. His words are words of one syllable, sharp nouns and active verbs mostly. He scarcely ever uses adjectives, and always replies to questions asked him—'yes,' 'no,' 'I will,' 'I won't.' Ask him where he is from, and his answer is—'Blue Ridge,' 'Cumberland,' 'Bear creek.' Ask him where he kills his game, or gets his furs, and his answer ever is—'Illinois,' 'Sangamon,' 'Salt creek.' Ask him where he is going—'Plains,' 'Forest,' 'Home,' is his unvarying answer. See him in the wilds, as I have seen him, strike up with his left hand's forefinger the loose rim of his old home-made or other hat, that hangs like a rag over his eyes, impeding his sight and perfect vision, peering keenly into the distance for fur or game, Indian or deer. See him look and gaze and determine what the thing seen is—see him at that instant stop and crouch and crawl toward the object like a hungry tiger, measuring the distance between twig and weed with his beard, so as to throw no shadow of sensation on the distant eye of foe or game—the thing to be crept on and inevitably killed. See him watch even the grass and brush beneath his feet, as he moves and treads, that no rustle, or crack or snap, shall be made by which the ear of foe or game shall be made aware of his danger. See him wipe off and raise his long and trusty gun to shoulder and to cheek—see him throw his eye lockward and along the barrel—watch him, see first upcoil of smoke, before the crack and ring and roll and roar comes. The bullet has already done its work of death. Caution makes this man stand still and reload before moving a foot. Then he eyes the dead keenly. 'There's danger in the apparent dead,' he whispers to himself, cocks his gun and walks, keeping his finger on the trigger.

"The third class which I am about to describe—the brave, rollicking roysterer—is still among us, though tamed by age into a moral man. He is large, bony, muscular, strong almost as an ox. He is strongly, physically developed. He is naturally strong-minded, naturally gifted, brave, daring to a fault. He is a hardy, rough-and-tumble man. He has a strong, quick sagacity, fine intuitions, with great good common sense. He is hard to cheat, hard to whip, and still harder to fool. These people are extremely sociable and good-natured—too much so for their own good, as a general rule. They are efficient, ready, practical men, and are always ready for any revolution. I wish, I am anxious, to defend these men, as well as the God-given spirit of pioneering. One of the writers on Mr. Lincoln's life says, in speaking of Thomas Lincoln, 'When inefficient men become very uncomfortable, they are quite likely to try emigration as a remedy. A good deal of what is called the pioneer spirit is simply the spirit of shiftless discontent.' But more of this hereafter, not now and just here.

"These men, especially about New Salem, could shave a horse's main and tail, paint, disfigure, and offer for sale to the owner, in the very act of inquiring for his own horse, that knew his master, but his master recognizing him not. They could hoop up in a hogshhead a drunken man, they being themselves drunk, put in and nail down the head, and roll the man down New Salem hill a hundred feet or more. They could run down a lean, hungry wild pig, catch it, heat a ten-plate stove furnace hot, and putting in the pig, could cook it, they dancing the while a merry jig. They could, they did, these very things occasionally; yet they could clear and clean a forest of Indians and wolves in a short time; they could shave off a forest as clean and clear as a man's beard close cut to his face; they could trench a pond, ditch a bog or lake, erect a log house, pray and fight, make a village or create a State. They would do all for sport or fun, or from necessity—do it for a neighbor—and they could do the reverse of all this for pure and perfectly unalloyed deviltry's sake. They attended church, heard the sermon, wept and prayed, shouted, got up and fought an hour, and then went back to prayer, just as the spirit moved them. These men—I am speaking generally—were always true to women—their fast and tried friends, protectors and defenders. There are scarcely any such on the globe for this virtue. They were one thing or the other—praying or fighting, creating or destroying, shooting Indians or getting shot by whisky, just as they willed. Though these men were rude and rough, though life's forces ran over the edge of its bowl, foaming and sparkling in pure and perfect devilry for devilry's sake, yet placed before them a poor, weak man, who needed their aid, a sick man, a man of misfortune, a lame man, a woman, a widow, a child, an orphaned little one—then these men melted up into sympathy and charity at once, quick as a flash, and gave all they had, and willingly and honestly toiled or played cards for more. If a minister of religion preached the devil and his fire, they would cry out, 'To your rifles, oh boys, and let's clean out the devil, with his fire and all; they are enemies to mankind.' If the good minister preached Jesus, and him crucified, with his precious blood trickling down the spear and cross, they would melt down into honest prayer, praying honestly, and with deep feeling and humility, saying aloud, 'would to God we had been there with our trusty rifles, amid those murderous Jews.'

"I wish to quote the author's sentence again. It reads: 'When inefficient men become very uncomfortable, they are quite likely to try emigration as a remedy. A good deal of what is called the 'pioneer spirit,' is simply the spirit of shiftless discontent.' Here are two distinct allegations, or assertions, rather charges: first, that the inefficient men, through the spirit of discontent at home, emigrate as a remedy for that uncomfortableness; and, second, that a good deal of the spirit of pioneering comes from the spirit of shiftless discontent. I wish to say a few words on this sentence, first, as to fact, and secondly, as to principle. It is not, I hope, necessary for me to defend the particular man spoken of—Thomas Lincoln, the father of President Lincoln. It is not necessary that I should flatter the pioneer to defend him, yet I feel that other men and women in New England, possibly in Europe, may be grossly misled by such an assertion, such an idea, as is contained in this sentence. It is admitted by me that man's condition at home sometimes is exceedingly uncomfortable. To throw off that condition of uncomfortableness, is the sole, only, and eternal motive that prompts and drives men and women to pioneering. Men of capacity, integrity, and energy—for such are the generality of pioneers in the West—emigrate to this new land from their old homes, not because they are inefficient men, men unable to grapple with the home condition, but rather because they refuse to submit to the bad conditions at home. Their manly souls and indomitable spirits rise up against the cold, frigid, despotic caste crystalizations at home—a glorious rebellion for the freedom of man. All men emigrate from their homes to new lands in hope of bettering their conditions, which at home are sometimes chañgly uncomfortable. The spirit of pioneering is not a spirit of shiftless discontent, nor any part of it, but is the creating spirit, a grand desire, wish, and will to rise up in the scale of being. It has moved mankind—each man and woman—since God created man and woman and placed them on the globe, with genius in their heads and hope and faith in their souls. God's intentions, purposes, and laws, as written on the human soul, forever interpret themselves thus: 'My child, my good children, man, woman, and child, each and all—hope, struggle; I am with you, and will forever be; go on, go upward, go westward, go heavenward, on and on forever.' Good men and women do not, from the spirit of shiftless discontent, quit the sacred ashes of the dead loved ones, and wildly rush into a cold, damp, uncleared, gloomy, unsettled, wild wilderness, where they know they must struggle with disease, poverty, nature, the wild wolf and wilder men, and the untamed and ungeared elements of nature, that sweep everywhere unconfined. They do not go for game, nor sport, nor daring adventure with wild beast, nor daring sport with wilder men. They go or come at God's command—'Children, my good children, and all, man, woman, and child, all, all—hope, struggle, to better your condition—onward, forward, upward—and on and on forever, or miserably perish, and quit the globe, to be re-peopled by better beings.' Men, tender and lovely women, do not quit their homes, where are comforts, luxuries, arts, science, general knowledge, and ease, amid the civilized and civilizing influences at home, to go westward, from a spirit of shiftless discontent. What! are these brave men and women all through the West, and such as these the world over, inefficient men, inactive consumers, unenergetic inefficients, lazy and do-nothing people, bursting westward from the spirit of shiftless discontent, where they involuntarily clap their hands to their heads, and spasmodically feel for their crowns, in order to preserve their scalps, as the quick flash and fire-steel gleam of the Indian's knife glints and glistens against the western sky! What! are Grant and Jackson, Douglas and Benton, Clay and Lincoln inefficient men, coming west from the spirit of shiftless discontent? Is fire efficiently hot? Is lightning efficiently active? Is nature efficiently creative, massing and rolling up all these visible worlds to heat and life and light, and holding them suspended there by God's will—called by men gravity—for a human idea's sake? If these things are so, then these men and women whom I have described, the pioneers, with their brave hearts and their defiant and enduring souls, are and were efficient men and women—efficiently warm, for they consumed and burnt the forest, and cleared and cleaned it. They had and have energy and creative activity, with capacity, honesty, and valor. They created States, and hold them to the Union, to liberty, and to justice. They and their children after them can and do point with the highest pride and confidence, to the deep, broad-laid, tolerant, generous, magnanimous foundations of these mighty several Western States, whereon our liberty and civilization so proudly and firmly stand, that they, the pioneers, in the spirit of pioneering embodied in them, made and created, and hold up to light and heat and life, suspended there rolling, by the electromagnetic power of the intelligent popular will.

"My defense has ended. The wild animals that preceded the Indians are gone, the Indian treading closely on their heels. The red man has gone. The pioneer, the type of him, is gone, gone with the Indian, the bear, and the beaver, the buffalo and the deer. They all go with the same general wave, and are thrown high on the beach of the wilderness, by the deep, wide sea of our civilization. He that trampled on the heels of the red man, with his wife and children, pony and dog, are gone, leaving no trace behind. He is the master of the bee and beaver, the Indian and the bear, the wolf and buffalo. He and they are gone, never to return. God speed them on their way, their journey and destiny. As path-makers, blazers, mappers, as fighters and destructives, they have had and have their uses and purposes in divine plan. Such are succeeded by the Armstrongs, the Clarys, the Rutledges, the Greens, Spears, and Lincolns, who too have had their uses and purposes in the great idea, and are succeeded by others, now among us, who are forces in the same universal plan. And let us not complain, for the great Planner knows and has decreed what is best and wisest in his grand and sublime economies. The animal is gone; the Indian is gone. The trapper, bee and beaver hunter is gone—all are gone. A few of the third class still remain among us, standing or leaning like grand, gray old towers, with lights on their brow, quietly inclining, leaning, almost dipping in the deep, the unknown, the unknowable and unfathomable deeps of the future, that roll through all time and space, and lash up against the Throne. They did not come here from the spirit of shiftless discontent, nor shall they take up their soul's greatest pioneer march on to God, through the cowardly spirit of shiftless discontent. They are fast going one by one. Respect them while living, reverence them when dead, and tread lightly on their sacred dust, ye all. The children of such may be trusted to preserve and hand down to all future time what they created, wrought and planted in the forest. The fourth class is ready to clasp hands with the third, taking an oath of fidelity to liberty, sacred as Heaven. We thus come and go, and in the coming and going we have shaded—risen up, progressed—during these various and varied waves of immigration, with their respective civilizations, through force, cunning and the rifle, to dollars, the steam engine, and the idea. We have moved from wolf to mind. We have grown outward, upward, higher and better, living generally in more virtue, less vice, longer and more civilized, freer and purer, and thus man ever mounts upward. So are the records of all time."

In concluding his address, Mr. Herndon gave a description of Illinois, giving its geography, length, breadth, its good people, etc. He declared that Illinois was the real Eden of the world, and that the central portion of Illinois was the best part of that Eden. He closed by showing by facts and figures the extent of the Union, its area in 1790 and its area in 1880; said that its present population of fifty-one millions would be increased in 1901 to one hundred millions of souls—the wisest, most intelligent, richest, bravest and most patriotic people, as a mass, on the face of the globe.

CHAPTER XI.

THE PRESS.

There is no instrumentality, not even excepting the Pulpit and the Bar, which exerts such an influence upon society as the Press of the land. It is the Archimedian lever that moves the world. The talented minister of the gospel on the Sabbath day preaches to a few hundred people; on the following morning his thoughts are reproduced more than a thousand fold, and are read and discussed throughout the length and breadth of the land. The attorney at the bar, in thrilling tones, pleads either for or against the criminal arraigned for trial, often causing the jury to bring in a verdict against the law and the testimony in the case. His words are reproduced in every daily reached by the telegraphic wire, and his arguments are calmly weighed by unprejudiced men and accepted for what they are worth. The politician takes the stand and addresses a handful of men upon the political questions of the day; his speech is reported and read by a thousand men for every one that heard the address. Suddenly the waters of one of our mighty rivers rises, overflowing the land for miles and miles, rendering thousands of people homeless and without means to secure their daily bread. The news is flashed over the wire, taken up by the Press, and known and read of all men. No time is lost in sending to their relief—the Press has made known their wants and they are instantly supplied. “Chicago is on fire! Two hundred millions worth of property destroyed! Fifty thousand people rendered homeless!” Such is the dread intelligence proclaimed by the Press. Food and clothing are hastily gathered, trains are chartered, and the immediate wants of the sufferers are in a measure relieved.

The power for good or evil of the Press, is today unlimited. The short comings of the politician are made known through its columns; the dark deeds of the wicked are exposed; and each fear it alike. The controlling influences of a Nation, State or county is its Press, and the Press of Sangamon county is no exception to the rule. Since Hooper Warren started the Sangamo Spectator, in 1826, the Press of Sangamon county has been an important factor in all things tending to the general welfare of the county. Not only in the county, but throughout the State its influence has been recognized and acknowledged, and even beyond the borders of the State has its opinions been eagerly sought after, especially in the political world.

The local Press is justly considered among the most important institutions in every city, town and village. The people of every community regard their particular newspaper or newspapers as of peculiar value, and this not merely on account of the fact already alluded to, but because these papers are the repositories wherein are stored the facts and the events, the deeds and the sayings, the undertakings and achievements that go to make up final history. One by one these things are gathered and placed in type; one by one the papers are issued; one by one these papers are gathered together and bound, and another volume of local and general, individual and local history is laid away imperishable. The volumes thus collected are sifted by the historian, and the book for the library is ready. The people of any city or town naturally have a pride in their home paper.

As already intimated, the Sangamo Spectator was the first newspaper printed in Sangamon county. Hooper Warren, who had been publishing a paper at Edwardsville, called the Edwardsville Spectator, removed his office to Springfield in the winter of 1826-7, and immediately commenced issuing from that place. So far as is known not a copy of the paper is now in existence. Mr. Warren, in a letter to P. P. Enos, Secretary of the Old Settlers' Society, dated October 20, 1859, says of this paper: "It was but a small affair, a medium sheet, worked by myself alone most of the time, until I made a transfer of it in the fall of 1828 to S. Meredith." Mr. Warren was considered a good writer, an intelligent man, but a not very successful manager.

The Springfield Journal and Sangamo Gazette was built upon the ruins of the Spectator, the first number bearing date February 16, 1829. This number was chiefly occupied with the message of Governor Edwards. It was a five column folio, well edited, but never received sufficient encouragement to make it a paying institution, and therefore after the expiration of a few months it ceased to exist.

The Illinois Herald was the next attempt in the newspaper line, and was commenced some time in the year 1830. Samuel S. Brooks and Mr. Fleming were the publishers, Mr. Brooks being the editor. Like the previous attempt in the business, the Herald was short-lived, going out with the melting of the big snow.

ILLINOIS STATE JOURNAL.

On the 10th day of November, 1831, the first number of the Sangamo Journal made its appearance, with S. & J. Francis, editors and publishers. The paper was a six-column folio, and presented a neat appearance. The salutatory of the editors was short, containing no special promises easily broken. Says the editors: "We know that it is usual on occasions like this to eulogize the advantages of the Press—to make promises that can never be realized. All we have now to say is—give us a fair opportunity; and we doubt not that the reasonable wishes and expectations of our patrons will be gratified. We have cheerfully embarked in the establishment of the Journal, a good portion of the little means at our command, with a firm determination to apply ourselves to the duties of our office with unremitting industry, and it now rests with others to say whether our hopes shall be blasted, or our exertions rewarded with the cheering confidence and patronage of the citizens of this part of Illinois." In addition to the salutatory appears well written editorials on the "Missouri Election," in which strong ground is taken in favor of a national bank, protective tariff and internal improvements; "The Eatonian Controversy," a controversy that arose in regard to the exclusion of Mrs. Eaton, the wife of a member of President Jackson's cabinet, from Washington society; "Calhoun on Nullification," "Anti-Tariff Convention," and several shorter articles.

A fair number of advertisements appeared, among them being one of Mr. Wadley, in which he proposed to show his mode of teaching English grammar; John Williams, H. F. Hill & Co., H. Yates, William P. Grimsley, Jabez Capps, Fell & Tinsley, Thomas D. Potts, general merchandise; H. M. Armstrong & Co., hat manufactory; E. S. Phelps, watch repairing; John H. Ebey, potter's ware; Bennett C. Johnson, groceries and liquors; Drs. Merryman & Rutledge, physicians, Smith & Moffett, cabinet makers, and several legal notices.

The first issue of the paper was creditable to the proprietors. The types were good, the miscellany well selected, the editorial vigorous and to the point. The pledge modestly implied in their salutatory was more than fulfilled, as the early history of the paper proved. This paper, thus founded in a new country, had many serious obstacles to overcome; but its twenty-four columns of reading matter went out among the people every week, and by their excellence won the favor of all readers. These men, who had made Springfield their home, and had embarked in this enterprise, were determined to succeed, and they did. Their office was in a two-story brick building, on the southwest corner of Washington and Fifth streets. Here they put up their cases, fixed their primitive press, issued their paper, and waited for the verdict of the people. That verdict was not favorable at first, but the decision was speedily reversed. It must be remembered that the Sangamon county of that time was not the Sangamon county of today. It included the present counties of Logan, Mason, Menard and Cass, with portions of Morgan, Christian, McLean and Marshall. The inhabitants were few and scattered, the population of Springfield being only about six hundred. Mail facilities were of the poorest description. There were no railroads, and no telegraphs. The wagon roads were unimproved, and constantly liable to the damaging effects of wind and water. The mails were brought in stages—sometimes on horseback—from Vandalia, then the capital of the State, and from Edwardsville, Carrolton and Terre Haute. The people were without news, and, from habit, were willing to remain so. A newspaper was not a necessity then, as now, and the new paper especially was not acceptable. The inhabitants of Central Illinois at that time were chiefly from the Southern States. The new paper was edited by Connecticut "Yankees." That was enough. Even in those days a Yankee was distasteful to people from South of the Ohio. Certain persons at once raised a cry against the paper, and went so far as to say there some people in the county who would not give the Francis brothers a place to be buried in, if it was known where they came from. Prejudice was thus fed, and the hundred and fifty names on their subscription book did not receive speedy increase. But the curiosity of the people was at last excited by the reports about the paper and its proprietors, and many new subscribers came in, who "wanted to take the thing just to see what it was." The result was natural. Each person for his two dollars and a half received fifty-two papers filled with good reading. They were pleased, subscribed again, and told their friends to do likewise. The storm was thus weathered, and the prosperous future of the Journal established.

It has already been stated, the first number of the Journal was issued November 10, 1831. The paper was full of news. The very latest from Washington and New York was from two to three weeks old; from St. Louis four days, and the last from England was dated September 9. The clippings were from papers published weeks before, and just at hand, while the letters of correspondents had been longer on the way from different parts of the country than a letter now is in going from New York to Omaha. Yet it was news, the latest news, and relished as much by the readers as the Washington, London or St. Petersburg telegrams in our morning papers of events happening the evening before.

In principles the Journal was from its commencement the opposer of the Democratic party. It was Whig throughout during the existence of the party. In 1832 it mainly supported Henry Clay for the Presidency, fought its battle to the best of its ability, and submitted to defeat with the expression, "The Presidential game is up and the day is not ours." It opposed the spirit of nullification with its might. It advocated all needed reforms, supported all measures of public improvement, and sought to promote the interests of all classes of society.

The partnership between S. & J. Francis continued until February 21, 1835, when J. Francis retired. Simeon Francis continued as sole proprietor until April 28, 1838, when Allen and J. Newton Francis were admitted to the firm, which took the name of S. Francis & Co. The young men learned the printing trade in the Journal office, and were therefore not strangers, at least to the local patrons of the paper.

The manner of conducting a newspaper at that early day was not such as it is at the present time. The patronage of the office was necessarily limited, and it became necessary at times for the proprietor to be editor, compositor, devil, and man-of-all-work generally. Under the head of "Editorial Comforts," Mr. Francis thus narrates his experience for one day: "Editor at the case. Enters A. 'I wish to get a handbill printed immediately. I intend to give them scoundrels their dues.' 'It is impossible, sir, we have as much as we can do until Monday.' 'Confounded strange if I ain't allowed to defend myself. Will you do it then?' 'Yes, and sooner if in our power.' Goes out in a huff. Click, click, click, goes the type. A pause of ten minutes. Enters a lad. 'Pa wants the last handbill printed to-day. [It was during a political campaign, and candidates were setting forth their claims by means of handbills.] 'We have printed no handbills to-day—we are sorry we can't supply your father with a new handbill.' Click, goes the type, and after a free breathing of an hour, B. comes in in great flirtation. 'Sir, I want you to keep my manuscript out of sight, and not give a copy of my bill to any human being until you deliver the same to myself.' 'Very well, sir.' Exit last visitor. Again the operation of setting type is resumed. 'Mr. F.' says another visitor, 'have you any news of the cholera?' 'None in particular. We believe the atmosphere is choleric.' 'Have you any handbills that I havn't seen?' 'We don't know; all we have are on the line. Help yourself.' 'Good morning,' as C enters the office. 'I have prepared a communication for your columns, at the request of several friends, and which I think is perfectly unexceptionable. It reads:—(Reads part of the communication.) The writer then states that the remainder of his article is made up of an argument founded on divers considerations, designed to show that 'Old Mac' should be made Governor. We regretted to state to our friend that we could not possibly publish his communication—our columns were then filled, corrected and ready for the press. 'Well, sir, it will create a rumpus among Mac's friends.' 'We do not see how we can avoid it.' 'Have you done my bill?' 'No, sir.' 'There are six men waiting for it. Can you have it done in two hours?' 'It cannot be done before ten o'clock at night.' Leaves grumbling. 'Well, you must be making your fortunes.' 'Making our fortunes! Do you suppose that money is any consideration for the mental torture we are compelled to suffer?' 'Mr. F., I want to have added a little to your account against me. I suppose you would as lief print for me as anybody. I want to have you get my bill done so I can start for Athens early in the morning. Only two short certificates, with a few remarks. 'We can't possibly do your work until Monday.' 'Can't you do it?' 'It is impossible.' 'Well, then I must wait until Monday.' Enters M. in great haste. 'If there should be a handbill printed against me I want you to give me a chance to make an immediate reply.' 'You must wait your turn.' 'What! do you intend to deny me the use of your press?' 'No, sir; we only intend to give every man his regular chance.' Such is the epitome of our editorial history for one day. We retire at ten o'clock—to sleep on a 'bed of roses' which Guatemozin would have hardly envied—but supported by the consideration that amid all the conflicting views and passions of the parties by which we are surrounded, we have aimed to do right."

On the twenty-fourth day of October, 1835, the Journal was enlarged to a seven column folio and otherwise improved. No further change was made in the paper until the death of J. Newton Francis, which occurred on the tenth day of November, 1843. Mr. Francis had started out on a business tour in the eastern part of the State, and had taken his rifle with him to beguile the hours of his journey. While near Monticello, he saw some game, and springing out of the vehicle in which he was riding, he drew the rifle toward him by the barrel, when it accidentally exploded, carrying the charge into the neck, causing instant death. Simeon Francis, the elder brother, had this to say of the deceased: "We know it might well be left to another hand to record his virtues. They are written in our heart. Yet why should we not give expression to thoughts common to all who knew him? He was manly and generous and just; in his friendship, firm; in his duties, constant; in his manners, frank; in his feelings, kind. No man was more free from selfishness, and falsehood was utterly foreign to his nature. He died young, but he has left a void in society, which will not be easily filled; and in the circle of his friends and kindred there is a grief which words cannot describe. We have seen him grow from youth to manhood and take his place in the business and conflict of life. Together we have struggled with misfortune, and rejoiced in prosperity. Together we have formed plans for the future, which death has dashed in pieces; and now, whatever of trial or disaster is in store for us, must be sustained without the aid of his counsel, or the consolations of his sympathy. But all these words are vain. He is dead! Already the mould rests upon his bosom, and to-night the wind sighs mournfully over his grave. When the bitterness of grief is past, his friends will feel a mournful pleasure in speaking of his blameless life and upright character; and to hearts that are quivering with anguish now, it will be a consolation to feel that—

'The ashes of the just Smell sweet, and blossom in the dust.'

The name of the firm as publishers of the Journal remained unchanged, it being continued by S. and A. Francis, under the firm name of S. Francis & Co. In September, 1847, the name of the paper was changed from Sangamo to Illinois Journal, and Albert T. Bledsoe became associated with Simeon Francis as editor. This relation was continued for some time.

In 1835, the Francis brothers erected a two-story frame building, forty-four by twenty feet, on the lot at the northeast corner of Washington and Sixth streets. This was the first Journal building, and was occupied for about eighteen years, until the completion of a new and better building erected on North Sixth, between Washington and Jefferson, and used until November, 1879.

On the twenty-third day of September, 1847, the name of the paper was changed to the Illinois Journal, and on the thirteenth of August, 1855, to the Illinois State Journal, its present name.

Simeon Francis was born in Wethersfield, Connecticut, May 14, 1796. At an early age he entered a printing office in New Haven, Connecticut, and served a regular apprenticeship; after which, in company with Mr. Clapp, he published a paper in New London, in the same State. After his marriage in New London, he sold his interest in the newspaper, and moved to Buffalo, New York, where he formed a partnership under the firm name of Lazevell & Francis, and published the Buffalo Emporium, until it was forced to suspend in 1828, in consequence of the excitement in reference to the abduction of Morgan, charged against the Masonic fraternity, of which Mr. Francis was a member. In 1831, he came to Springfield, and soon after engaged in the publication of the Journal. On retiring from the Journal, Mr. Francis started the Illinois Farmer, which he continued as publisher and then editor for some three years. In 1859, he closed his business in Springfield, and moved to Portland, Oregon. Here he engaged in the publication of the Oregon Farmer, and was President of the Oregon State Agricultural Society. In 1861, President Lincoln appointed him Paymaster of the United States Army, with residence at Fort Vancouver, Washington Territory. This position he held until 1870, when he was retired on half pay. He then returned to Portland, Oregon, where he died October 25, 1872.

Josiah Francis was born January 17, 1804, at Wethersfield, Connecticut. After severing his connection with the Journal, he was married to Margaret Constant, near Athens, Illinois, and in 1836 engaged in mercantile pursuits in Athens. While there, he represented Sangamon county in the State Legislature, in 1840. A few years later, he returned to Springfield, and was elected Sheriff of Sangamon county, and still later Mayor of Springfield. He died in 1867.

Allen Francis, brother of Simeon, and associate in the publication of the Journal, was born in Wethersfield, Connecticut, April 12, 1815, and came to Springfield in 1834, and subsequently entered into partnership with his brothers. He remained in connection with the office until its disposal to Baker & Bailhache. He was married December 25, 1838, in Springfield, to Cecilia B. Duncan, by whom he had six children. Mr. Francis was for several years a member of the City Council of Springfield, from the first ward. He erected the old Journal buildings on Sixth street, north of the square. In 1861, President Lincoln appointed him Consul at Victoria, Vancouver's Island. He left for that point February, 1862, and remained in official connection until 1871, when he resigned, and with his two sons engaged in the fur trade with the Indians, on the Pacific coast.

In July, 1855, Messrs. Francis sold the establishment to Bailhache & Baker, who had formerly been publishers of the Alton Telegraph. In their valedictory the publishers say: "On an occasion like this—on leaving a business and an establishment in which we have been engaged the best years of our lives—we might say much. We indeed feel that it is our privilege to do so; but we will only now say that we have labored for what we conceived the best interests of our town, our State and our common country, and for the success of Whig principles, which we believed were connected with those interests. Our work, our labors, are before the public. We will not say that we have not erred, and that often. We would not be mortals if we had not. If we have injured, we ask to be forgiven. If, on the whole, we have merited favor, we ask that our labors be kindly considered."

On assuming control of the Journal the new publishers said: "While we are well aware that there are few callings or professions so thankless, so little appreciated or so little understood, as that of the conductor of the public Press, we believe there is no newspaper in the State which has since its establishment sustained itself so uniformly, 'borne its faculties so meekly,' as the Illinois Journal, and the simple fact that it has been in profitable existence for fully twenty-four years, under the retiring proprietors, speaks for them a volume of commendation. In taking upon ourselves the ownership and management of the Illinois Journal, we dare promise but little. Our own experience tells us that it will be difficult, if not impossible, to please or meet the views of all; for in these days of political freedom, every man thinks independently and acts for himself. We shall, however, give our undivided attention to making the Journal an interesting newspaper, which will not be exclusively devoted to mere politics, but which will likewise advocate and sustain all the great interests of society, and lend its aid to the cause of virtue, morality and education. In its politics, the Journal will continue to wear much the same general features which have distinguished it in the past, but in its strictures upon the present administration, or upon the tendency of the measures of opposing parties, it will be found occupying national conservative ground, in every emergency upholding the Constitution and the Union, and opposed to fanaticism and extreme views, wherever they may be found. The most casual observer cannot fail to perceive that the political cauldron is at the present time in a state of violent commotion. Into what distinctive forms the elements will eventually be resolved, cannot now be determined; but in every event we shall do battle fearlessly and independently for the right, exposing error and falsehood wherever they may show their heads, and approving and encouraging what is good and true in all political organizations."

As stated in their salutatory, the political elements at this time were in a state of violent commotion. The Whig party was in process of disintegration; the American or Know-Nothing party, which had been formed some years previous, was gaining strength, especially in the South; the newly organized Republican or Anti-Nebraska party was absorbing all the anti-slavery elements in the Whig and Democratic parties, and much ill-feeling was engendered in consequence of the repeal of the Missouri Compromise. The Journal, under its new management, was rather cautious in the expression of its views. Its sympathies were doubtless with the American party, and on the nomination of Millard Fillmore for the Presidency by that party, it advocated his endorsement by all the elements opposed to the Democracy. As the canvass proceeded, the anti-slavery views of the editors were strengthened, and when John C. Fremont was nominated by the Republicans, it instantly hoisted his name, and became an earnest and enthusiastic advocate of his election. From that time to the present, the Journal has never wavered in its advocacy of Republican principles.

Baker & Bailhache continued in partnership as publishers of the Journal until December, 1862, when Mr. Bailhache received a Government appointment, and sold his interest to D. L. Phillips, who continued its publication under the firm name of Baker and Phillips.

W. H. Bailhache was born in Chillicothe, Ohio, in 1825, and was brought by his parents to Alton, Illinois, when quite a small boy. He received a thorough English education in Shurtleff College, at Alton, and when about eighteen years old entered his father's office to learn the trade of printer. Subsequently he became associated with his father in the publication of the Alton Telegraph. As already stated, he came to Springfield in 1855, and purchased an interest in the Journal. He served in the army as Assistant Quartermaster, with rank of Captain, and was with the Army of the Tennessee. After his retirement from the Journal, he went to Quincy, and engaged in the newspaper business for a time, and finally received an appointment in the Quartermaster's Department, and is now at Santa Fe, New Mexico. He was married in 1859, to a daughter of General M. Bryan.

Edward L. Baker was born in Kaskaskia, Illinois, June 3, 1829. He was educated at Shurtleff College, Upper Alton, and graduated in 1847. After graduating, he read law two years with his father, David J. Baker, after which he attended Harvard Law School, graduated therefrom, and was admitted to the Bar in 1855, at Springfield. After leaving he returned to Alton, which had been his home for some years, and in connection with W. H. Bailhache, he published the Alton Telegraph for some five years. In 1857, as already stated, he became part owner and editor of the Illinois State Journal. In 1869 he was appointed United States Assessor for the Eighth District of Illinois, remaining in that office until it was abolished. In December, 1873, he was appointed United States Consul at Buenos Ayres, Argentine Republic, S. A., which office he still retains.

When Mr. Phillips became connected with the Journal, it was at a time when our army had suffered several defeats and treason was rampant. In his salutatory, he said:

"I am a cordial supporter of the present administration—as I would be of any other in its hour of trial and peril—and in favor of employing all the means known to the Constitution and laws to suppress effectually and forever, the existing rebellion against the Government. In the prosecution of the war I recognize no distinction between Democrats and Republicans in arms against the assassins who are attempting to destroy the heritage bequeathed to us by our fathers, and seal up in endless night all hopes of human progress and human liberty. The meed of praise will be alike given to men of all parties who peril their lives for the preservation of that government which we hold as a common trust for posterity. I am a Republican, yet I pledge myself to no stereotyped line of politics. The future is too dark and uncertain to define with any degree of certainty, a political course to be pursued by any true lover of his country, other than so far as I have already indicated. My best efforts will be employed in giving the public a paper free from the taint of treason, corruption and immorality, and unalterably devoted to the interests of our brave Illinoisans who are shedding imperishable lustre upon our arms in all parts of the Republic, cursed with the views of secession and rebellion."

On the 28th of August, 1865, W. H. Bailhache, having retired from the army, purchased a share in the Journal, and again became identified with the paper. Previous to this, however, the legislature of 1863 passed an act incorporating the Journal Company, and in February of that year the company was organized and some twenty thousand dollars in stock issued. Baker and Phillips retained by far the larger portion of this, and the paper as before was published in their name, the entire management of the concern being in their hands.

On the 7th of March, 1866, Mr. Phillips retired from the Journal, disposing of his stock to Mr. Bailhache. In his valedictory he said: "While I have been connected with the Journal, we have passed through a great civil war—a war for the Union made by our fathers—a war in defense of humanity, law, and order, and against disunion, barbarism, and universal disorder. The Journal in the darkest hour of the past four years has never faltered in its stern, unflinching support of the Government, the vigorous prosecution of the war, and words of cheer to the brave men who saved the Nation. It will be my proud recollection that in those long, dreary years of blood and carnage, not one disloyal sentence ever found utterance in the columns of the Journal, nor one discouraging word to the heroic men who fought the great battles of the Union."

Baker and Bailhache, as principal stockholders, continued the publication of the Journal until February, 1873, when Mr. Bailhache retired, and the stock was purchased by Edward L. Baker, D. L. Phillips, Charles Edwards, and J. D. Roper. Mr. Phillips was elected President, Mr. Baker Secretary, and Mr. Roper Treasurer. No further change was made in the management until September, 1878, when the stock of the company was purchased by Paul Selby, M. F. Simmons, and H. Chapin.

David L. Phillips, who so long held the position of managing editor of the Journal, was of Welsh descent, his parents emigrating from that country prior to the Revolutionary war. David L. was born October 28, 1823, near the present town of Marion, Illinois. In common with the mass of young men of that time, he had only those opportunities of education afforded by the common schools of the period, which were none of the best; but, gifted with an active mind and a strong thirst for knowledge, he made such good use of them by study during the winter, while laboring on the farm during the summer, that by the time he had attained to manhood, he was fitted to teach, and acquitted himself with credit in that profession for several years. About that time the learned and able Dr. John M. Peck, the distinguished pioneer teacher and preacher of the Baptist denomination, was in the very prime of his manhood and usefulness, and from the seminary which he founded at Rock Spring was exerting a vast influence upon the young men of the State, and even in other States. It was no doubt due to the direct influence of this able and gifted man, that at the age of eighteen years young Phillips was received into the Baptist Church, and some two years later entered the ministry of that denomination with all the zeal and fervor peculiar to his youth and sanguine temperament. He remained in this profession probably eight years, teaching and preaching at intervals in St. Clair, Washington, Union, and perhaps other counties in Southern Illinois. In the early part of his career as a minister, he was married to Miss Charlotte Tate, of St. Clair county, who still survives him, and the young couple began life together at Elkton, in Washington county. Mr. Phillips possessed elements which made him a popular pulpit orator, and it is not too much to say that his zeal, earnestness, and enthusiasm had attracted attention to him widely in that section of the State. This finally resulted in his being called to take charge of the Baptist Church at Jonesboro, where he acquitted himself with his usual ability.

About 1854, having withdrawn from the charge of the church at Jonesboro, on account of a disagreement on political questions, Mr. Phillips became associated with the management of the Jonesboro Gazette, then, as it is now, a Democratic paper. The excitement over the "Kansas-Nebraska Bill," removing the restriction against the introduction of slavery north of the parallel of thirty-six degrees and thirty minutes—known as the "Missouri Compromise,"—was at its height, and Mr. Phillips took strong ground against it. Into this contest he entered with all the fervor of an ardent, zealous nature. As a result he soon found himself arrayed against his party as he had previously been against his church. His partner withdrew and, for a time, the Gazette dispensed to its readers the most radical Republican doctrine, although the Republican party had not then been organized.

One of the earliest acts of Mr. Lincoln, after his accession to the Presidency, was to appoint Mr. Phillips United States Marshal for the Southern District of Illinois, to which position he was re-appointed in 1865. He continued to hold the office until removed by Andrew Johnson in 1866. The administration of this office during the dark and troublous period of the war, brought Mr. Phillips in close and intimate relations with the most trusted and confidential agents of the Government, and imposed upon him many delicate and responsible duties, in the discharge of which he was not found wanting, in either ability, courage or integrity.

In the fall of 1875 Mr. Phillips made a visit to California, spending seven months in that region. He bore a commission as Special Agent of the Treasury Department, empowering him to enquire into the management of custom houses and internal revenue offices in that section of the Union. During his stay on the Pacific Coast, he wrote a series of letters to the Journal, descriptive of places visited, scenery, climate, customs, and public works, which were subsequently issued in book form, and which impart a more vivid and comprehensive idea of that interesting region than can be obtained from almost any other source. The following touching extract is from a letter bearing date January 1, 1876:

"Since my last letter was finished, another year has been numbered with the unreturning past. Its joys and sorrows, its successes and failures, its lights and shadows, are all garnered in the storehouse of Eternity. Each of my readers, and the writer of these Pacific Coast letters, stand another year nearer the portals of the Unknown. But, through the infinite goodness, mercy and wisdom of God, while our steps may be sobered and our gray hairs increased, we are permitted to look outward and onward to the end, stimulated by hope and unawed by fear; standing in the right as it is given us to see it, and rejoicing in the evening glories of the nineteenth century. Renewing my faith in the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man, from the shores of the Pacific I send to my readers, and the tens of thousands of good friends and loved ones of and about whom my thoughts are busy to-day, my ardent, earnest wishes for a happy New Year for them and theirs."

In the fall of 1876, Mr. Phillips received the Republican nomination for Congress, but was defeated, the district being overwhelmingly Democratic. His canvass was an able one, and as a slight appreciation of his services, he was appointed Postmaster of Springfield, by President Hayes.

Paul Selby, in a "Memorial Address on the Life, Character and Public Services of David L. Phillips," delivered before the Illinois State Press Association, held at Springfield, February 16, 1881, pays him the following tribute:

"With the exception of about two years, between the early part of 1868, up to his retirement from the Journal, in 1878, it was my fortune to be associated with Mr. Phillips almost continuously. The opportunity I thus had of knowing our brother journalist has, I think, given me the right, as well as the ability, to speak of him as a man, as a journalist, as a politician, and as a public officer. In all that period, our friendly relations were never interrupted for a moment. It was necessary that, in such a relation, there should be mutual trusts and confidences; in these he was never found wanting. Whatever may have been his imperfections—and he was a man, and no man is perfect—he was as true in his journalistic relation to those associated with him as he was patriotic in his political relations, and honest and faithful in the discharge of his official duties.

"Mr. Phillips was essentially a self-educated, self-made man. While, with the majority of the youth of his day, he possessed few advantages in early life, he distanced the great mass of his associates in the progress which he made and the results he achieved. He was entitled to all the more credit for what he accomplished, though his achievements were necessarily unequal. He possessed natural qualities of intellect which fitted him for wide and profound research. His official duties during most of the period when he was associated with the public Press, did not permit him to engage in general journalism for any length of time. His tastes led him rather into special fields. In these he was full, comprehensive and exhaustive. Inclined to the discursive and florid in style, a strong and vivid imagination still enabled him to clothe his thoughts in a garb which never failed to command the attention of the reader, whether the latter agreed with him or not. He was never dull or prosaic—never wrote commonplace merely to fill up the page, but his utterances came from a mind overflowing with living facts and arguments. Gifted with a memory that surprised those who knew him by its extraordinary sweep and tenacity, his mind was the repository of an amount of knowledge of men and things, gained from reading and observation, possessed by few men of his time."

Mr. Phillips died in Springfield, June 19, 1880.

Under the management of the present proprietors, the Journal has been made a success in every particular, and the office is well supplied with material for any kind of work, from a visiting card to a mammoth poster.

Paul Selby, editor-in-chief of the Illinois State Journal, was born in Pickaway county, Ohio, July 20, 1825. His father, Dr. William H. Selby, was a native of Anne Arundel county, Maryland, while his mother, Mary (Young) Selby, was born at Fairfield, Connecticut. The former grew to manhood, when, having qualified himself for the practice of medicine, he removed to Western Pennsylvania, where he made the acquaintance of, and married, Miss Young, whose parents had emigrated to Uniontown, in the latter State, while she was yet in her infancy. Soon after marriage, the young couple removed to Eastern Ohio, residing for a time at Zanesville, Marietta and Mt. Vernon, in that State. During their residence at the latter place, Dr. Selby engaged for a time in the mercantile business. The war of 1812-15, with England being then in progress, he went as surgeon with a body of volunteers raised for the relief of the scattered remnants of General St. Clair's defeated army.

Some years after the close of the war the Selbys removed to Pickaway county, where the subject of this sketch was born, being the fifth of a family of six children (five sons and one daughter), all of whom grew to manhood and womanhood, but of whom he is now the only survivor. In 1837 the family moved West, settling in the Des Moines Valley (Van Buren county), in what was then the Territory of Iowa. Both in Ohio and Iowa, Dr. Selby pursued the business of a farmer, and thus Paul grew up as most farmers' sons do—working upon the farm in summer and going to school in the winter, when opportunity offered—though his parents being intelligent, reading people, his advantages may have been somewhat better than the average. The common schools, especially in the latter State, were none of the best, but furnished the only educational advantages then open to him except those which he enjoyed at home or by means of independent study, until after he had reached manhood.

In 1843, Paul's father died, and in the following year, at the age of nineteen, he left home to make his way in the world, and while contributing to the support of his mother, determined to acquire an education. The following winter and spring were spent in teaching in Washington county, Illinois, when, more liberal inducements being offered him, he removed to Madison county, where he engaged in the same occupation. He spent about three years in Madison, half of the time being at the same place, a few miles above St. Louis, on the Alton road. In 1848, having acquired some means, he determined to carry out his long cherished purpose of acquiring a more liberal education, and then went to Jacksonville, entering Illinois College for a classical course. Here he remained three and a half years, but before the expiration of his course (in March, 1852,) he formed a business connection for the publication of the "Morgan (now Jacksonville) Journal," assuming editorial charge as successor to Col. E. R. Roe, late Marshal of the Southern District of Illinois. He then had no intention of abandoning his studies, but finding his time fully occupied, he reluctantly withdrew from college in the middle of his junior year, though subsequently honored by his Alma Mater with the honorary degree of A. M.

Mr. Selby's connection with the "Morgan Journal" continued nearly seven years, covering a period of great political excitement and agitation, during which the Republican party came into existence. Though a Whig in politics, his tastes were rather literary than political, and he preferred an independent position in journalism. This was in part due to the fact that he foresaw the breaking up of the organization of parties, which occurred on the passage of the bill removing the restriction against the admission of slavery north of thirty-six degrees thirty minutes, introduced by Mr. Douglas. New questions having thus been brought to the surface, he entered with zeal into their discussion, and, as was inevitable, soon took a position on the side of the Republican party—in fact, was among the first to be identified with the new party organization in Central Illinois. In the fall of 1855, the paper with which Mr. Selby was connected, suggested a meeting of the anti-Nebraska editors of the State, to be held at some central point in the State, for the purpose of giving form and direction to the sentiment of the new party and agreeing upon some general line of policy. The suggestion was approved by others, and in the next few months the proposition took form, the convention being called at Decatur, February 22, 1856. When the convention met, in view of his agency in securing it, Mr. Selby was, by unanimous consent, chosen to preside over its deliberations. In an address delivered by him before the Illinois Press Association, at its winter meeting held at Springfield, February 6, 1879, under the title of "A Quarter of a Century of Journalism," he made the following allusion to this assemblage as an incident in the political and journalistic history of the State:

"On the 22d day of February, 1856, an Editorial Convention of a somewhat different character was held at Decatur, in this State. The number in attendance was small—not amounting to over fifteen or twenty, all told—a sort of 'forlorn hope,' so to speak—but they assisted to set in motion agencies which have left their impress on the political history of this State and the Nation. The Convention was composed of representatives of newspapers opposed to the so-called Kansas-Nebraska Bill, which had passed Congress in 1854, and which had produced a degree of popular excitement seldom known in the previous history of the country, proving a fore-runner of the war of the rebellion which followed a few years later. It was called for the purpose of outlining a policy for the Anti-Nebraska party—as the opponents of the repeal of the Missouri Compromise called themselves—and was one of the first and most effective steps towards the formal organization and consolidation of the Republican party of the State, which took place in May following. The printed record does not show a full list of the names of those present, but from the list of committees and officers I am able to find the following: V. Y. Ralston, Quincy Whig; Dr. C. H. Ray, Chicago Tribune; O. P. Wharton, Rock Island Advertiser; T. J. Pickett, Peoria Republican; George Schneider, Chicago Staats Zeitung; Charles Faxon, Princeton Post; A. N. Ford, Lacon Gazette; B. F. Shaw, Dixon Telegraph; W. J. Usrey, Decatur Chronicle; Paul Selby, Jacksonville Journal.

A platform was adopted at this meeting which would now be regarded as very conservative Republicanism, but it was assailed by the opposition Press of the day as the wildest Radicalism—or rather “abolitionism.” Resolutions were adopted recommending that a State Delegate Convention be held at Bloomington, May 29th following, for the purpose of organization, and a State Central Committee was appointed to fix an apportionment of delegates and issue the formal call. That Committee performed its duty; the convention was held at the time and place designated; General John M. Palmer, then a rising young lawyer and liberal politician of Carlinville, present proprietor of the Register in this city, presided; a ticket composed of General W. H. Bissell, for Governor; Francis Hoffman, (afterwards replaced by Hon. John Wood, of Quincy,) for Lieutenant Governor; O. M. Hatch, for Secretary of State; Jesse K. Dubois, for Auditor; James Miller, for Treasurer, and W. H. Powell, for Superintendent of Public Instruction, was put in nomination and was elected in November following. And thus the Republican party sprang at once into political ascendancy in this State—an ascendancy which it has never since wholly lost.”

In May, 1858, while still residing at Jacksonville, Mr. Selby was married to Miss Erra A. Post, an amiable and worthy young lady who had been a pupil, and for a time, a teacher in the Female Seminary at that place. During the following fall he severed his connection with the Jacksonville Journal, and the next spring removed to Springfield, where he spent the summer of 1859. Though not immediately connected with the Press during this period, he did considerable political writing for the State Journal, and otherwise. One of his principal labors during this summer was the preparation of a pamphlet giving the history of the celebrated “Canal Scrip Fraud” which was brought to the attention of the public soon after the retirement of Joel A. Matteson from the Governorship of the State. This pamphlet was widely distributed throughout the State, and exerted no small influence upon the elections of the next few years.

In September, 1859, in compliance with the urgent solicitation of friends already in the South, Mr. Selby accepted an invitation to take charge of a boys' school at Plaquemine, Louisiana, and removed there with his family. After remaining here one year he was offered strong inducement to take charge of an institution for the education of young ladies and gentlemen, at Amite City, in the same State, which he accepted. Before the close of this year, the war between the North and South, which had been gradually coming on, opened with all its bitterness and fury. Perceiving that he could no longer be of any service there in the profession which he had chosen, and that the safety of himself and family would be in peril by longer remaining in the South, at the close of the term of 1860-61, Mr. Selby determined to return to the North, and disposing of what property he could, and leaving his library, which, in the condition of the country at that time, could not be transported, and which was plundered and scattered during the war, on the evening of the 3d of July, 1861, he left New Orleans for Illinois. The journey was made by railroad, by way of Columbus, Kentucky, and Cairo, though many persons then seeking to reach the North were meeting with serious trouble, and all communication was cut off between Columbus and Cairo, by the seizure of the steamer running between those two places, by the rebels, a few days after. Almost immediately after his arrival in Springfield, leaving his family here, Mr. Selby returned to Cairo, to accept a position which had been tendered him in the employment of the Government.

After a stay at Cairo of about eight months, and a short period spent in the Transportation Department at Paducah, Kentucky, during which the movement up the Tennessee river to Pittsburg Landing took place, Mr. Selby returned to Springfield, and in July following was offered and accepted a position upon the editorial department of the State Journal, which continued unbroken up to November, 1865. At this time he was called to suffer a deep affliction in the loss of his wife. His household having been broken up, he severed his connection with the Journal, and soon after went to New Orleans, where he spent the winter. Returning north in June, 1866, after a few weeks' rest, he was offered and accepted a position on the editorial staff of the Chicago Evening Journal, but soon after taking a similar position on the Chicago Republican now the Inter-Ocean.

In 1868, Messrs. D. L. Phillips and William H. Bailhache, of the State Journal, purchased the Whig, at Quincy, Illinois, and Mr. Selby was invited to take editorial charge of it. Subsequently he became the successor of Major Bailhache in proprietorship of the Whig, at the same time retaining the position of managing editor. At the close of the year 1873, the Whig was sold to its present proprietors, when Hon. E. L. Baker, editor of the State Journal, having been appointed Consul to Buenos Ayers, Mr. Selby was offered his old place upon the Journal. He accepted, entering on his duties January 1, 1874, and his connection with the paper has remained unbroken ever since. In September, 1878, the Journal became the property of the "Springfield Journal Publishing Company," of which Mr. Selby is a member, being a director and secretary of the board. Mr. Selby was married a second time in December, 1870, to Mrs. M. J. Hitchcock, a gifted lady of Quincy, who still survives. Two daughters born to him of his first wife still live; but a daughter and a son born to him of his present wife, died in December, 1878, within a few days of each other.

In June, 1880, Mr. Selby received from President Hayes the appointment of Postmaster for the city of Springfield, in place of Hon. D. L. Phillips, deceased, entering upon the duties of the office July 4, and on the assembling of Congress, in December, was nominated, confirmed and re-commissioned.

Horace Chapin, Treasurer and Business Manager of the Journal, was born in Springfield, Massachusetts, December 27, 1827, and emigrated to Morgan county, Illinois, in 1851, and settled near the present village of Chapin, the junction of the Wabash and Chicago, Burlington and Quincy Railroads. The early life of Horace was spent on his father's farm, and in attending the public schools and academy of his native place. On coming to Morgan, he engaged in farming in connection with his brother Lyman, which occupation he continued until August, 1861, when he enlisted as a private in Company K., Twenty-Seventh Illinois Infantry. On the election of officers of the company, Mr. Chapin was elected First Lieutenant. The regiment shortly after was ordered to Cairo, where it became a part of General McClernand's brigade. After the battle of Belmont, Lieutenant Chapin was promoted to Captain of Company D. During the three years of his service, Captain Chapin participated in many of the important battles of the war, including Island No. 10, Union City, Farmington, Corinth, Nashville, Laverne, Franklin, Stone River and Chicamauga. In the battle of Chicamauga, Captain Chapin lost a leg, and was sent to the hospital at Nashville, where he remained four months and then received a furlough home. He was mustered out of service on the twenty-seventh of September, 1864, his term of service having expired. In 1865 he moved to Jacksonville, and in April, 1867, received the appointment of Postmaster of that city, which position he held for four years. About the time of his appointment of Postmaster, he purchased an interest in the Jacksonville Journal, but was not actively engaged in its management until his retirement from the post-office. Captain Chapin severed his relationship with the Journal in 1876. On the formation of the present State Journal Company he was elected Treasurer and Business Manager, which position he yet retains.

Horace Chapin and Augusta Swazey, of Bucksport, Maine, were united in marriage January 9, 1859, at St. Anthony, Minnesota.

Captain Chapin was originally a Whig, and was afterwards identified with the Free Soil movement. On the organization of the Republican party, he became an active worker in its ranks, and no man has ever been a more enthusiastic one.

Milton F. Simmons, President of the State Journal Company, was born in Schoharie county, New York, December 21, 1842. He received an academical and collegiate education in his native State, and subsequently read law with Lyman Tremaine, of New York City, and was there admitted to the Bar. After receiving a license as an attorney, he moved to Mexico, Missouri, where he engaged in practice for some six years, with success. In 1871, he purchased the office of the Mexico Messenger, which paper he edited and published until his removal to Jacksonville, Illinois, in 1876. While in Mexico he was elected to the State Legislature, and served one session. On his arrival in Jacksonville, he became associated in the publication of the Jacksonville Journal, which relation continued until 1878, when he came to Springfield, and became one of the Journal Company.

Milton F. Simmons and Philena Eliza Humphrey were married at Mexico, Missouri, November 11, 1867. Four children have resulted from this union—Ida Mabel, Anna Maggie, Minnie Myrtle, and Katie Maud.

Mr. Simmons has always been a Republican in politics.

THE DAILY JOURNAL.

The Journal first appeared as a daily Monday, June 13, 1848, containing twelve columns, twelve inches long. That paper printed the first telegraphic dispatch ever received directly by the Press in Springfield. Diminutive as was the sheet, its advent marked a new era in the history of the Press of that city. It seemed a hazardous undertaking to establish a daily, but the paper met with immediate support, and when but eleven days old was enlarged to a sixteen column sheet, of respectable size. Its news columns were well filled, and in all respects it was fully up to the demands of the times. It was issued in the evening, as most of the mails left early in the morning, and the clumsy hand press could not have a morning paper ready in time.

The conduct of a daily at that time was widely at variance with what it is to-day. Printing appliances were unwieldy; labor was scarce; expenses heavy, and the people at large found a weekly enough for their wants. Notwithstanding these and other obstacles, the Journal succeeded well. On the first of January, 1850, the daily was again enlarged, by increasing the length of its columns and adding four to their number. No change was made thereafter until the 22d of December, 1853, when it was again enlarged. It then became a twenty-four column paper. These changes were made to meet the demands of advertisers. Again about the beginning of the war, first to a seven and then an eight-column folio. This form was continued until July, 1880, when it was changed to a six-column quarto, its present form.

THE ILLINOIS REPUBLICAN.

The Republican was established May, 1835, by John A. Roberts and George R. Weber, who continued its publication until the summer of 1839. The Republican was a firm supporter of the Jackson policy, and dealt some powerful blows to the opposition. It was a fearless and radical sheet in its utterances, and gave no uncertain sound. Its enemies always knew where to find it. In the spring of 1837, Stephen A. Douglas was appointed by President Van Buren, Register of the Land Office at Springfield, and thus became a resident of the place. At this time he was very boyish in appearance and manner; was a ready wit, and a bold and fluent speaker. He made politics his chief study, to the neglect of his profession. He wrote much for the columns of the Republican, which appeared both as editorial and communicated. The paper, in political circles, was therefore generally regarded as the organ of young Douglas. Under the nom de plume of an "Old Settler," a well known citizen of Springfield contributed to a local paper of the city, in 1871, the following interesting reminiscence of the Republican, and Stephen A. Douglas' connection with it:

"A law providing for the removal of the seat of government from Vandalia to Springfield had passed the legislature of 1835-36, and three commissioners appointed to superintend the building of a new State House at the latter place. Dr. Henry was the acting commissioner. He was an able political writer, and contributed largely to the columns of the Sangamo Journal, both editorially and otherwise; hence, the newspaper fights of that day between the Journal and Republican, were mainly between Douglas and Dr. Henry, as the champion writers of their respective parties.

"Douglas, in several anonymous communications, attacked Dr. Henry as acting State House Commissioner, denouncing him, with much bitterness, as being unqualified for the position, and burlesquing many of his official acts, advising the Governor to remove him for incompetency, and to appoint a practical builder—a mechanic or architect, as doctors and lawyers knew but little about building State houses. Dr. Henry and many of his friends, believing Douglas to be the author of the offensive articles, determined to demand the name of the author by calling on the editor. A committee was appointed for that purpose, which, armed with cane and pistols, waited upon the editor (until then supposed to be a meek man), and made the demand. Douglas happened to be in the printing office when the committee arrived. The demand was made with threats and a flourish of the cane, when the meek man of the press planted his fist in the face of the chairman of the committee, informing him that he was responsible for everything that appeared in his paper. The committee was thus dispersed. Douglas being an eye-witness of the disastrous defeat of the committee, gave a highly colored description of what had occurred in the next paper, which, when the paper appeared, resulted in a determination of certain aggrieved parties to destroy the printing establishment of the Illinois Republican.

"On the evening of June 27, 1837, while the editor and hands were at supper, a mob appeared before the office door which was locked. The leader, being the Sheriff of the county on a 'spre'e,' picked up a stick of cord wood and burst open the door, and ordering his men to throw the printing materials into the street, promising to pay all damages. By this time the Weber brothers—three in number—Douglas, Dr. Early (afterwards assassinated), and a few others, rushed into the office, and kicked and flung the mobocrats from the building. Several other personal conflicts ensued. The next day the mob rallied and made another attack, in which the leader of the mob, the Sheriff, was stabbed, and fainting fell, covered with blood, he was carried home. Thus ended the mob. These things gave notoriety to the paper. The spicy and able articles of Douglas, like pure and good Democratic seed sown in good ground, resulted in his nomination for Congress by the Democratic party of the Third Congressional District."

George R. Weber was born in Baltimore, Maryland, May 29, 1808. He was taken, when an infant, to Shepherdstown, Virginia, by his parents, and remained there until after he reached his majority. In 1832, he was married to Miss Susan Shepherd, and soon after moved to New York City, where his wife soon died. Mr. Weber then returned to Shepherdstown, and from there came to Springfield, Illinois, arriving here April 15, 1835. He was married in Springfield to Catherine Welch, by whom he had eight children. Mr. Weber learned the trade of a printer before coming to Springfield, and has worked at the case off and on for a period of nearly sixty years. In 1839, he suspended the Republican, and shortly after became a partner in the Register, retaining his connection therewith until 1846, when he sold out to Mr. Walters, and enlisted in Company A, 4th Illinois Infantry, under Colonel E. D. Baker. While encamped on the Rio Grande, in Mexico, news of Mr. Walter's death reached there, and Mr. Weber, being interested in the State printing, it became necessary that he should return. Accordingly he was detailed to return home with those soldiers who were unfit for duty, and was never recalled. After the time expired for which he was elected Public Printer, he severed his connection with the office, and moved to his farm.

Mr. Weber served six months as State Commissary, in our late civil war, and was subsequently appointed as Commissary at Camp Butler, which position he retained until the close of the rebellion.

ILLINOIS STATE REGISTER.

The Illinois State Register was started in Vandalia, February, 1836, under the name of the Illinois State Register and Vandalia Republican, by William Walters. Mr. Walters was a native of Delaware, and for some years was a journeyman printer in Washington City, and foreman in the office of the old National Intelligencer. While occupying this position he contributed a number of articles to the Press of that day, and thus attracted the notice of the Democratic or Jackson members of Congress from this State. Desiring a strong newspaper advocate of the Jacksonian school at the capital of the State, Mr. Walters was induced to make the venture. He arrived in Vandalia in January, 1836, and on the 10th of February, the first number of the new paper appeared. At this time Judge John York Sawyer was publishing the Illinois Advocate at Vandalia, and was State Printer. Judge Sawyer died during this year, and the Advocate suspended publication.

The legislature, at its session of 1836-37, elected Mr. Walters State Printer, and made the Register the official paper of the State. During this session the vote was taken on the removal of the State capital to Springfield, and carried.

In 1839, the offices of the State Government were removed to Springfield, and were followed a few weeks later by the State Register, Mr. Walters removing the office to this city. Here the paper assumed the double name of Illinois State Register and People's Advocate, with William Walters and George R. Weber as editors and publishers. The name of the Advocate was quietly dropped out some months afterwards, and the name of Illinois State Register alone appeared as the name of the paper. The first number of the Register printed in Springfield, dated August 10, 1839, made the following announcement:

"TO OUR PATRONS:—We have the pleasure to address the patrons of the State Register from Springfield, the new seat of Government of the State of Illinois. The most of our readers are aware that, until within a few weeks past, the Illinois Republican (the leading and spirited Democratic paper) has been published in this place for several successive years. The removal of the seat of Government to Springfield made it the duty of the public printer to remove with it; and hence, as there was not a probable demand for two Democratic papers in the same place, Mr. Weber, the editor of the Republican, discontinued that journal, and purchased an interest in this paper. The change will, no doubt, be advantageous to our subscribers. To the subscribers of the Illinois Republican, this paper will henceforth be sent, unless otherwise instructed by them."

In 1845, Mr. Weber sold his interest in the Register to his partner, Mr. Walters, who continued it until 1846, when the war with Mexico broke out, when he leased the office to Charles H. Lanphier, and enlisted as a private soldier in the Second Regiment, Illinois Volunteers. Mr. Walters confidently expected the position of Major of the regiment, but it was given to another. His friends in Washington, learning this fact, secured a commission as Commissary for him, and mailed it to him at St. Louis. Mr. Walters never lived to reach the front, but died in St. Louis before the departure of the regiment.

Mr. Walters was a very able political writer, and was very popular with the people; and his loss was deeply felt.

On the death of Mr. Walters, Charles H. Lanphier became proprietor of the office, and continued the publication of the paper one year, when he associated with himself George Walker, and the Register was published from 1846 to January 1, 1858, by Lanphier & Walker, when Walker withdrew, as appears from the following:

DISSOLUTION OF PARTNERSHIP.—Notice is hereby given that the partnership under the style of Lanphier & Walker, in the printing business and publication of the Illinois State Register, is this day dissolved, by mutual consent. * * *

CHAS. H. LANPHIER,
GEO. WALKER.

Jan. 1, 1858.

George Walker was born in Vermont, in 1821, and in 1836 came with his parents to Belvidere, Illinois. His father was the original proprietor of that town. Mr. Walker came to Springfield at an early day; studied law with Ebenezer Peck, and was admitted to the bar. Subsequently, he was appointed deputy by Mr. Peck, who received the appointment of Clerk of the Supreme Court. He acted as Deputy Clerk until 1847, when he became connected with the Register, as editor and publisher.

Mr. Walker was a fine scholar and a brilliant writer. While he wrote or spoke in a manner not to be misunderstood, he was choice of his words, and every sentence showed the scholarly man. After retiring from the Register, he engaged in no active business, and died at the house of Mr. Lanphier, in 1864.

On the breaking out of the war, in 1861, the following article appeared in the Register, from the pen of Charles H. Lanphier, on the duty of the hour:

"The fratricidal blow has been struck! Civil war is upon us. The rebels have opened their batteries upon Fort Sumter, and the prospect of a long and bloody strife is before us. It has come as the consequence of causes so often and emphatically deprecated by Democrats and other conservative men—as the consequence of sectional agitation by Northern and Southern extremists. But it is useless and unprofitable now to discuss the causes which have placed the country in its present unhappy condition. The Government has been resisted in the performance of its legal functions. Rebels to the National authorities have fired upon the flag of the country, and assaulted one of its garrisons, when an effort was being made to re-inforce and provision the noble Anderson and his gallant little band. Most gallantly have they resisted; bravely have they defended their country's flag and their country's rights. But they have been overcome by the superior force that has surrounded them.

"The news has been productive of the most intense feeling and excitement here, as it will be throughout the land, but whatever may be men's opinions as to the causes which have brought war upon us, there is but one feeling, and that is in behalf of the Government and the flag of the Union. This is as it should be. With the true patriot, whatever may be his opinions of the causes of war with his country's enemies, he is for his country and his country's flag; and his hearty support, morally, and physically if necessary, should be rendered to the country's cause."

In an article on "The National Trouble," the editor says:

"We are proud to record that Douglas and his counsels, now that blows have ensued, are with the Government. Ever faithful, ever true, the champion of popular rights is for the cause of his country—of the Constitution and law. Whatever may be our party leanings, our party principles, our likes or dislikes, when the contest opens between the country, between the Union, and its foes, and blows are struck, the patriot's duty is plain—take sides with the stars and stripes! As Illinoisans, let us rally to one standard. There is but one standard for good men and true. Let us be there. Through good and through evil report, let us be there—first, last, and all the time."

Upon the retirement of Mr. Walker, Edward Conner was associated with Mr. Lanphier in the publication of the Register until June 10, 1859, when the following announcement was made:

DISSOLUTION OF CO-PARTNERSHIP.—Notice is hereby given that the partnership in the publication of the Illinois State Register, heretofore existing under the name of Lanphier & Conner is dissolved by mutual consent. The business will hereafter be conducted by Chas. H. Lanphier.
June 10, 1859.

CHAS. H. LANPHIER,
EDWARD CONNER.

Mr. Lanphier alone, continued the publication of the Register until 1864, when he sold out to certain parties and the "Illinois State Register Printing Company" was organized, with George Judd, Esq., business manager, and I. N. Higgins editor. (Mr. I. N. Higgins is now editor of the Morning Call, San Francisco.)

Charles H. Lanphier was born in Alexandria, Virginia, April 14, 1820. His father, Robert Goin Lanphier, was a native of the same place. His grandfather, Goin Lanphier, was one of the first settlers of that ancient town. He was of Irish birth, coming to Virginia an infant, with his father, Thomas Lanphier, in the year 1732, from County Cork, Ireland, where the family (French Huguenots) had emigrated in 1650. At the age of four years, the parents of Charles H. Lanphier removed to Washington City, where Mr. Lanphier received a plain, English education, in the primary schools of the day. In May, 1836, just turning his sixteenth year, Mr. Lanphier came to Illinois with his brother-in-law, William Walters, who, in January of that year, had established the Illinois State Register at Vandalia, then the seat of government of the State. Mr. Lanphier entered that establishment as an apprentice to the printing trade, and when the paper was moved to Springfield, he came with it. Completing his apprenticeship, he continued in the concern as printer, clerk or reporter, until 1846. On the breaking out of the Mexican war, Mr. Walters entered the volunteer army, leaving Mr. Lanphier in charge of the paper as editor and manager. Mr. Walters died at St. Louis, soon after his regiment reached there, en route for Mexico. Mr. Lanphier then attained the proprietorship of the paper. At the next session of the legislature (1846-7) he was elected Public Printer, being the last person to fill that office, which was thereafter abolished by constitutional provision. In 1847 he took into partnership, in the publication of the Register, Mr. George Walker, one of the most accomplished scholars and journalists of his day. This partnership continued until January, 1858, when Mr. Walker withdrew, and Mr. Lanphier continued the publication of the paper, until the fall of 1863, when he sold out the establishment, after a connection with it of nearly twenty-eight years. In 1860, on the breaking out of the Southern rebellion, Mr. Lanphier was appointed by Governor Yates a member of the "Board of Army Auditors," in connection with Judge William Thomas, of Jacksonville, and Hon. James H. Woodworth, of Chicago. In 1864, Mr. Lanphier was elected Clerk of the Circuit Court, of Sangamon county, and in 1868, was re-elected. Before the expiration of his last term, in 1872, Mr. Lanphier was nominated as the Democratic candidate for State Treasurer, but with his whole party, was defeated.

In February, 1846, Mr. Lanphier was married to Margaret T. Crenshaw, daughter of John Hart Crenshaw, of Gallatin county, Illinois, one of the early pioneers of the State, settling with his parents and family in that county in the year 1812, from North Carolina. After the adoption of the present city charter, Mr. Lanphier was chosen a member of the City Council for three terms, and as Chairman of the Ordinance and School Committees, was largely instrumental in shaping the city laws under the new charter, and in organizing the present system of city schools. During the ascendancy of the Democratic party in the State, as the editor of its leading exponent at the Capital, Mr. Lanphier bore a conspicuous part, and through the Register, was influential in shaping the policies of the State. Contemporary and intimate friend of Judge Douglas during his whole public career, he was an earnest champion in nearly all his public efforts, sharing his confidence and possessing his highest respect and esteem. As editor of the Register, while it was controlled by him, he was bold and fearless in giving expression to his views of men and principles. His quick perception enabled him to judge almost unerringly of the motives of the former, and while respectful to his opponents, if he thought them sincere, he was unsparing in his criticism of those he believed unprincipled and corrupt. His integrity was unquestioned and in these days, when venality so far pervades the Press, however lamentable the contemplation, it would not be time illy spent, to compare the course of the Register under his management with the latter day political journalism. As a writer, Mr. Lanphier was terse and pointed in style. He never indulged in fanciful phrases at the expense of clear, lucid expression. When he meant to say a thing he said it, and there could be no misunderstanding his meaning. In short, his entire editorial career was as able and consistent as his private life has been upright and honorable.

In December, 1864, J. W. Merritt & Sons purchased the Register, and by them it was continued something less than two years, when J. W. Merritt retired, and the paper was then run by E. L. Merritt & Bro., as publishers, with J. W. Merritt, editor, and E. L. Merritt, associate editor. In 1873, on account of advanced age, J. W. Merritt resigned editorial charge, and E. L. Merritt became editor-in-chief.

In June, 1877, E. L. Merritt & Bro., disposed of their interest to a stock company composed of John M. Palmer, E. L. Merritt, J. M. Higgins and John Mayo Palmer, forming the State Register Printing Company.

John W. Merritt was born in New York City July 4, 1806, and died November 16, 1878. The Register, with which he was so long connected as editor, thus speaks of the man:

"John W. Merritt was born in New York City in 1806, and had the benefit of a common school education. Before arriving at manhood he evinced a decided literary taste, and his contributions to the magazine and newspapers of the time were greatly admired. He studied law and built up a very lucrative practice in connection with Hon. James T. Brady, the profits of which were invested in real estate. He made himself independent at a comparatively early period in life, and was in a fair way to become wealthy when the financial revulsion of 1837, in a short time destroyed the value of his earnings and investments. That he must have been greatly disheartened by his misfortunes seems certain, but it is true that none of his most intimate friends ever heard him repine. With his wife and a young dependent family he removed with the remnant of his goods to St. Clair county, in this State, in 1841. His culture and energy soon gained him friends, and he purchased the Belleville Advocate, which paper he conducted with considerable success from 1848 to 1851. He also carried on a farm, and wrote letters for New York papers and contributed to eastern magazines. During this period, also, he wrote and published a novel called Shubel Darton. The style of this work now seems antiquated, and its construction more complicated than pleases modern taste, but the plan of the story shows considerable skill, and the composition is remarkable for power in many passages. About this time he formed a strong personal friendship for Judge Breese, which continued to the close of Breese's life.

"Some years later, Mr. Merritt moved to Salem and established the Advocate, which paper he conducted for many years, and where he had his sons instructed in the art and mystery of printing. In 1861, he was elected a member of the Constitutional Convention, and in 1862, a member of the legislature. In 1864, the State Register, as the organ of the Democracy of the State, suffered the fate of the party it had so long represented. The efforts of powerful political opponents, and the treachery of pretended adherents, had reduced the party to what seemed a hopeless minority, and upon the State Register fell the stigma of copperheadism and disloyalty. Mr. Merritt resolved to attempt the task of re-establishing the paper, and supported by his son, took editorial charge January 1, 1865. The enterprise was not a prudent one, but it was gallantly undertaken, and, like most bold projects, succeeded. By hard work, and by the aid of business skill and editorial talent, the paper was set upon its feet again.

"For some years Mr. Merritt conducted the editorial columns of the Register with great ability; and although it may be said that he was not always temperate in his expressions, the fault will be pardoned by those who know how high the tide of political and personal feeling swelled after the war was closed. For some years, in addition to editorial duty on the Register, Mr. Merritt supplied the St. Louis Republican with its Springfield correspondence. But years of great labor began at last to tell against the veteran, and in 1873, he retired from active duty, and since then has spent his time in well earned and honorable repose. His children are Hon. Thomas E., who for several terms has represented his district in the House of Representatives, and who was at the late election chosen a State Senator; General Wesley, who graduated at West Point in 1861, and who rose to distinction in the Union army, and who is Colonel of the Fifth United States Cavalry; John H., who at one time was editor of a Democratic paper at Carlinville, and who is now one of the editors of the Marion County Herald; Charles W., who, in 1873, was appointed a Second Lieutenant in the Ninth United States Cavalry; Edward L., of this city; Joseph D., clerk of the Southern Penitentiary; and William W., conductor on the Ohio and Mississippi Railroad, and two daughters.

"In politics, Mr. Merritt was a sound, uncompromising Democrat of the old school, and his faith he never hesitated to declare or defend. He lived his allotted period in the fear of God, and always acted with due regard to the rights of man. He commanded the respect of his fellow-men by adherence to principle, and he won many friends through life. He was a devoted member of the Episcopal Church, and he died in its full communion, and in an abundant faith in its doctrines. The world is better for his life and actions, and those who survive him, though not able to surpass him in ability, may emulate his virtues, respect his integrity, and learn an example by his industry. The State Register casts its sprig of rue and myrtle on the bier of one of its most able and brave of the long succession of its editors."

The Salem Advocate, in its obituary notice of Mr. Merritt, says: "John W. Merritt is dead, but his amiable character and kind acts will long be cherished and remain green in the memory of those who knew him best. He had hosts of friends, whose hearts are saddened because he has been called from the busy scenes of earth. But all should rejoice that he has entered upon a life beyond death's dark river, in the ever-green shades of Heaven's rich domain. He was pleasant, courteous and genial in manners, and his friendship extended to men in all the walks and stations of life."

Edward L. Merritt was born June 25, 1836, in New York City, and came with his parents to this State in 1841. He received but few advantages in the way of an education in the public or private schools, the whole time of his attendance probably not exceeding twelve months. But at a very early age he was placed in the "Poor Man's College," a printing office, to learn the trade of a printer. His first work at the case was when about eleven years of age, in the office of the Belleville Advocate. When his father removed to Salem and commenced the publication of the Salem Advocate he took a position in that office, and soon became a thorough, practical printer. Subsequently and previous to 1858, he served about four years as Civil Engineer on the Ohio & Mississippi Railroad. In 1858, in connection with one of his brothers, he became the proprietor of the Salem Advocate, his father, J. W. Merritt resuming editorial charge. In 1861, E. L. Merritt became sole proprietor of the paper, continuing its publication until he became connected with the publication of the State Register. As already stated, as editor and publisher Mr. Merritt was identified with the Register for many years, and as such became known not only throughout the State but throughout the Union, the Register always being the recognized organ of the party of the State.

In 1866, President Johnson appointed Mr. Merritt United States Pension Agent. Being an avowed Democrat, it is thought his appointment had much to do with hastening the passage of the tenure-of-office act, necessitating the presentation of his name to the United States Senate for confirmation. It was accordingly sent in; and that body being strongly Republican, he was rejected. It was again sent in by the President, and again rejected. The third time did the President present the name of Mr. Merritt for confirmation, and the third time was it rejected. No other reason was assigned for his rejection, but that he was not of the political faith to suit the majority. His ability to discharge the duties of the office was not doubted.

In 1875, Mr. Merritt was appointed a member of the School Board of Springfield; was re-appointed in 1878, and again in 1881, for the term of three years.

On December 13, 1879, the sale of the State Register to Geo. W. Weber, J. R. Weber, J. H. Oberly and Chas. Edwards, was consummated. Mr. Oberly did not remain in the new company, which was organized January 5, 1880, with Geo. W. Weber as president. The editorial chair was temporarily filled; and finally, the permanent editorial arrangement was announced, in the statement that thereafter the paper would be "edited by the proprietors." George W. Weber was the acknowledged editor-in-chief, and succeeded in making an interesting paper.

George W. and J. R. Weber are the sons of George R. Weber, the founder of the Republican, and one of the original proprietors of the Register, on its removal from Vandalia. They were both born in Springfield, and are both practical printers. George W. has had much experience in editorial life, having edited the Taylorville Democrat for some time, and assisted on other papers. He is a ready and graceful writer.

The Illinois State Register has been owned and published since June 18, 1881, by Messrs. Smith, Clendenin & Rees, who purchased it of Governor Palmer and the old State Register Company.

The firm as above named is constituted of George Smith, Henry W. Clendenin, and Thomas Rees. These gentlemen are all old newspaper men, having been engaged in editorial and practical work in the States of Ohio, Illinois, Iowa, and Missouri for from twenty to thirty years. For the past five years, they have been engaged in publishing the Keokuk (Iowa) Daily and Weekly Constitution, which under their management became the leading Democratic paper of Iowa. Mr. Clendenin acted as editor-in-chief of the Constitution under his firm's proprietorship.

George Smith was born in Newark, Ohio, February 28, 1827. He began his career as a printer and publisher early in life. He has followed it without variation until the present time. Mr. Smith has no superior as a journalist in his department. He brings to the Register the experience of thirty-five years and the natural energy and acquired skill that always placed him at the top in every newspaper enterprise with which he has been connected. Mr. Smith has general supervision of the practical department of the Register.

H. W. Clendenin was born in Bedford county, Pennsylvania, August 1, 1838. His father, Sam. M. Clendenin, an old-line Jeffersonian Democrat, removed to Iowa in 1839, and settled at Burlington, where he occupied various offices of trust and profit in the gift of the Democracy. Mr. Clendenin received an academical education at Burlington, and served his time as a printer on the Burlington Hawkeye, which was under the management, a portion of the time, of James M. Broadwell, a brother of Judge Broadwell, of Springfield. Mr. Clendenin has occupied various practical and editorial positions in this and other States. He had charge of the Metamora (Illinois) Sentinel for one year, and of the Burlington Gazette for about the same length of time. He entered the army from Philadelphia, enlisting in the Twentieth Pennsylvania Infantry, serving a portion of his time under General McClellan. Mr. Clendenin has editorial charge of the Register as editor-in-chief, the same position he occupied on the Constitution. His articles attract attention, and are widely quoted; and under his management the Register is fast attaining the leading position which it should occupy as the central organ of the Illinois Democracy.

Thomas Rees comes of a family of journalists. His father, the late Wm. Rees, Sr., was an editor of many years standing, and several of his brothers are at present following the "art preservative of all arts" in different portions of the West. Mr. Rees was born in Pittsburg, Pennsylvania, May 13, 1850, and came with his father to the West when a small child. He served his time as a practical printer in his brother's office at Keokuk. Since his manhood he has ever occupied responsible positions in connection with various newspapers in Missouri and Iowa. When the firm of which he is a member, and which own the Register, purchased the Keokuk Constitution, he became business manager, and has gained and deserves the reputation of being one of the best business managers in the West. He occupies the position of business manager of the Register, and under his skillful and honorable tactics the business department of the paper is kept up to the highest and most successful standard. The Register, under its present proprietors, has been improved in every department, until it is one of the handsomest, ablest and best conducted papers in the State. The daily has a large and increasing circulation. The proprietors have enlarged the weekly to an eight column quarto, each page being twenty by twenty-six inches in size—eight pages, eight columns to a page. A new dress has been put on. It is now the largest paper in the State, not excepting the Chicago papers; and will bear comparison in appearance, make-up and general character of its contents with any paper in the country. No men ever met with a warmer or more cordial reception than they met from the people and Press. Every Democratic paper in the State felt and expressed satisfaction that the recognized organ of the party at the State Capital had fallen into the hands of men with capital, brains and backbone to make the paper a true representative and worthy exponent of Democratic views. The Republican papers, while not wishing them any success politically, wished them every pecuniary success. In the "Proprietor's Announcement," the publishers said:

"In assuming control of the Illinois State Register, its new proprietors take off their hats to the citizens of Springfield and the people of Illinois, in acknowledgment that they are the obedient servants of a great constituency, entrusted with the guardianship of great interests. We profoundly feel the importance of our new position. We do not mean to be prolific in promises, nor boastful of our ability; but we desire with becoming modesty to take possession of a field of labor that has been enriched and adorned by the culture, the talents and the genius of the distinguished gentlemen who have preceded us in conducting the paper during the many years of its useful life. The responsibilities of conducting the Register, in view of its past history and the important possibilities of the future, are manifold and great, and in assuming them we shall endeavor to perform the duties devolving upon us with earnestness, zeal, industry and courage. In doing this we trust too, and are confident we shall, receive the cordial support and warm sympathy of the business community and the citizens of Springfield and the State of Illinois.

"We have purchased the Register and paid for it. It is our property so far as the material is concerned; but in a broader, wider sense we want the Register to be the people's paper. We intend to be its defender of their rights and a conservator of their interests in every contest waged against the people, either by monopolizing corporations, corrupt political parties or selfish individuals. Above capital, above parties, above the most conspicuous man or men, above the Nation with a big N, tower the PEOPLE, every letter big, every right belonging to them inviolable. We are convinced that it is not only important, but absolutely essential to the safety of the republic and to the preservation of the liberties of the people that pure Democratic principles shall prevail. We shall maintain the courage of our convictions. The Register will, therefore, ever be found advocating those pure and patriotic Democratic principles, handed down through generations of freemen from the founders of the republic. In doing this, it shall respect those who honestly differ with it as to methods. While waging an unrelenting warfare upon every form of encroachment upon popular liberty as a Democratic paper, it will recognize that in every party there are good and pure men, battling for what they conceive to be the best interests of humanity, and will deal courteously with its unerring opponents. Strongly, intensely Democratic, the Register will be the organ of no man or set of men. With cliques and factions it will hold no fellowship.

"The new proprietors of the Register have come to Springfield to become citizens and to identify themselves with the interests of the city, the county and the State. The 'Springfield idea' and the 'Illinois idea' will be the object of our most earnest exertions. Our efforts will be largely devoted to making the Register a valuable local paper—an indispensable visitor at every home in the city, and a most influential factor in the growth and prosperity of the city and State. We come among the people of this section of the State comparative strangers, but with such indorsements as but few newspaper men have ever received at the hands of a generous Press throughout the states of Illinois, Iowa and Missouri. We are confident we shall soon feel at home, locally and socially. We shall strive to prove worthy of the confidence and esteem of the people.

"The business of the Register will be conducted on business principles. Thomas Rees, the junior member of the firm, becomes manager, and will make his own announcements in the local department of the paper. Mr. George W. Weber, who has filled the editorial chair for a year and a half, retires, and H. W. Clendenin becomes managing editor. Mr. Weber has our best wishes for success in whatever field he may select.

"No change is contemplated in the local or mechanical departments, except that Mr. George Smith, the senior proprietor, will have general supervision of the mechanical work of the establishment."

As soon as all necessary arrangements could be completed, both the Daily and Weekly Register appeared in new type, presenting a very handsome appearance. The weekly was enlarged to an eight column quarto, making it the largest paper in the State.

As a printing office, the Illinois State Register establishment is mammoth and complete. It occupies a building erected especially for the business, fronting on Monroe street, between Fifth and Sixth, and extending back to the alley, one hundred and fifty-seven feet. On the ground floor are located the business office, subscription department, job room, press room, stock room, and boiler room; also a fire-proof vault for the preservation of the files of the paper. On the floor above are located the editorial rooms, and back of same, the composing room. The building is well lighted with windows on both sides the entire length, and heated by steam, conveyed in pipes throughout the entire structure. In addition to the newspaper, an extensive book and job business is carried on, which gives employment to a large number of persons.

The whole establishment is laid out on a scale for carrying on a large business. The press room is supplied with six first-class presses, a steam paper cutter, and other suitable conveniences. Four of the presses are expensive cylinder machines, three being of the world-renowned Hoe pattern.

There are about forty hands employed in the business, besides a corps of correspondents scattered throughout the country. The pay-roll is in proportion to the business carried on, and amounts to thousands of dollars more, every year, than the amount collected from the citizens of Springfield; so, that the city is constantly receiving a greater financial benefit from the Register, than the Register receives from all the people living in the city,—to say nothing of the indirect benefit that a live paper is to any community.

The Daily Register is issued every day in the week, except Monday, and the Weekly is issued every Wednesday.

Under the management of Smith, Clendenin & Rees, the daily has more than doubled its circulation, and the already large list of the weekly has received many new names. The list will be at least trebled the first year.

DAILY ILLINOIS STATE REGISTER.

The Daily Register was commenced in 1848, and its history is substantially that of the weekly, already given. The same editors and publishers of the one have been publishers of the other. It is now under the control of Smith, Clendenin & Rees; a large eight-column folio, printed on new type, and filled each day with general and local news. In every department it shows good management and business tact.

SANGAMO MONITOR.

On the first day of May, 1873, the first number of the Sangamo Monitor appeared, with T. W. S. Kidd, editor and proprietor. The Monitor presented a very neat appearance, being an eight-column folio, and filled well with readable matter. The editor was well known to every citizen of Springfield and Sangamon county, and not altogether unknown throughout the State, especially by those having had business in the United States Court or the Supreme Court of this State, having been Crier of the United States District Court for many years. Being a capital story-teller, of the Lincoln school, he made many friends. Of course the people looked for something spicy in the newspaper line, nor were they disappointed. The salutation of the editor read as follows:

"We would rather the readers of the Sangamo Monitor would watch the course pursued for the first year of its existence and draw their own conclusions in reference to our position on matters of public interest, than to set ourselves about defining the same. Custom has made the practice of newspapers foreshadowing the course pursued by them, obligatory upon us to intimate where we may be found on the questions of the day.

"We will be independent—we won't occupy a neutral position on any question, if we have concluded as to the right course. We know the truthfulness of the old adage, 'Wise men change, fools never,' too well however to say that we will not change front on matters of public interest, when convinced of error.

"Our predilections may, and as all well know will, have much to do in forming our opinion on public topics, and we are perfectly willing to trust them. American all over, in our National pride—Democratic (not in a partisan sense) to the marrow, in our sentiments and principles,—educated by an honest woman, and naturally disposed to take the golden rule as our guide, and the side of the underdog in the fight, in the relations of life, we will ask an indulgent public to credit us in the outset with a reasonably good basis, on which they can rest assured that the chances for our being right in the main are at least good. 'No pent up Utica' shall confine our power to wield what influence we have on the side of the people. Springing ourselves from the forge, used to the hard knocks of the apprentice, then the jour, and lastly having 'bossed' it a little, we think we possess, in a reasonable degree, such sympathies as will lead us not to forget the 'pit from whence we have been digged.'

"Politically, the honest man, when placed by his party friends upon a ticket, or struggling independently for a place in the service of the people, can fully expect justice at our hands, while the manipulator of cliques and the cat's-paw of rings, need expect no mercy, let him be the nominee of any convention held by whatsoever party. We naturally detest deceit, whether practiced by cliques or individuals, under the cloak of religion, politics, law, or morals, and we intend to wage war against all such with all the energy and vim of our nature, regardless of greenbacks or relations, leaving consequences to take care of themselves.

"In a word, the Monitor will aim to be just what its name indicates, watching the acts and doings of the world at large, and reporting the same with impartial truthfulness to the readers every week; the iron-clad and double-turreted coaster, watching our National and State prosperity; ready with shot and shell to do battle for the 'greatest good for the greatest number.'"

The Monitor from the beginning has made war against monopolies, and in favor of the rights of the people. Starting at a time when the people, especially the farming community, had raised the standard of anti-monopoly, the Monitor naturally sided with those battling for this cause, and its columns will bear witness of the many points made in defense of the doctrines advocated.

In the fall election, in 1873, the Monitor advocated the election of the Democratic nominees, and has since continued to support the men of that party, though feeling and exercise ing the liberty of criticising the acts of every public officer.

The Monitor was started under what might be termed very unfavorable circumstances. Possessed of but little capital, as regards dollars and cents, but with plenty of pluck and perseverance, its editor and publisher has triumphed over every obstacle, and has made the Monitor a success in every particular. Few daily or weekly papers in this country have been established without sinking a large amount of capital, but the Monitor can boast of no such experience. From the start, it has had a living patronage, and from its profits has been gathered together the material of a complete newspaper and job office. Both the daily and weekly pay the publisher a fair profit, having each a large circulation and a good advertising patronage.

SANGAMON DAILY MONITOR.

The Sangamo Daily Monitor made its first appearance Thursday, June 28, 1877. The following characteristic editorial appeared in the first number:

"SHAKE—FATHERS, GIVE US A GRIP—SONS, PASS US YOUR PAW—MOTHERS, ACCEPT OUR MOST PROFOUND BOW—SISTERS, WE EMBRACE YOU—R DELICATE DUKE—BLESS AND BELIEVE US, FOR WE MEAN BUSINESS.—Like the gaily bedecked merry-maker of the big show, we bounce into the ring of daily journalism, hoping to be able to hold our own for another 'thirty days' trip into the sea of journalistic troubles, and a daily change of programme. We have grown tired of seeing and unfolding our bosom and budget to you but once a week. We want to talk to you daily, and tell you all we know of war, of crops, of politics, of religion, of law, and what we have heard in our rambles, about news and matters transpiring during the fast-unfolding events of twenty-four hours. We have grown chafed and weary of seeing those whom we hope to stir up to a little more evidence of life, have six words to our one, when 'talk's cheap,' and printers can be had for nothing; when paper-makers and type foundries furnish freely and gratis, and when close corporated monopolistic champions of the freedom of the Press are gaining such enviable notoriety by furnishing news to the people at a penny a line.

"We are among you. You all know us, and can trust us or not, as you like; of this we have no fear. Our motto, 'Do your best, with correct motives; then let the consequences take care of themselves,' has seen us through so far, and we hope will to the end. We propose to take a hand in 'posting the people,' not to prejudice them, but letting everybody know what everybody else is doing who don't, won't or can't behave themselves according to the old ten, or new or eleventh commandment. Naughty humanity, behave yourself, if you don't desire a blast from the Monitor. 'Hold your horses,' fast youth, or crooked beauty, unless notoriety is more precious than the quiet calm of virtue's peaceful abode, and the joy of domestic felicity irksome to the speed of untamed nature, when without the balance wheel of wisdom and the pleasure-producing quality of proper motive. Remember us editorially, bearing in mind the fact that if you desire your hens to be emulated, 'lay your largest egg' on our editorial table. We are ever ready to chronicle events; our journalism teaches us a broader and more general definition than the style of making reading only to the few, 'personal' distinction to fewer, while those upon whom the smile of total endorsement is to be 'smolen' are fewest. If you want to know a little bit of everything, dive into your breeches pocket, get a three-cent piece, and stop the cry of the newsboy by buying a Daily Monitor.

"We ask and shall expect your encouragement, not as a craven, but as an honest man who knows he will give an equivalent in every respect. It may seem a trifle; it is—but remember your 'littles' are our 'nickels,' and while you are many and we few, a stoppage of your little for a week or two, by enough of you, might make a hole big enough to sink even a Monitor. Much depends upon trifles in this world; the ocean would cut but a sorry figure swimming fellows like our Grant or Tom Hendricks to England to show our bully old relative how we have 'skipped out' of our 'short frocks and things' since we swelled up his left optic in 1812, if not for trifles; and a great many big fellows around our own neighborhood were once very trifling little trifles. 'Despise not the day of small things!' Small beginnings make heavy endings, as the fellow said of the avalanche; and it may be that the little Monitor may yet be big enough to defy a torpedo. Give us your hand; your helping hand is the one asked for—we have several of another kind now pressing close on our skirts—and it might be while entertaining the Monitor you may be entertaining several small angels in disguise, floating around the homes and firesides of the boys depending for their bread upon the success of this enterprise.

"For ourselves, we are carrying a big load, going up a steep hill, and each little fifteen cent drawback is 'the feather that breaks the camel's back' of our success, and the welfare of our set of printers. When we get to the level plain and the load is not so burdensome, we will have lots of time and take bushels of pleasure in returning you our grip of satisfaction at your action by our frequent notices of your 'style,' business, 'gait,' etc., in an occasional send-off on business, pleasure, when you marry, run for office, trade horses, swap dogs, or get into jail. We stand ready with the Monitor to fight to the blue for the honest in life matters, whether clothed in 'purple or fine linen,' or the scanty wardrobe of a tramp, while you live, and when dead will do just as we would you should do with us, bury our faults and foibles, and string together among life's cherished ornaments the sparkling beads of worth found in every nature. Shake!

Thomas W. S. Kidd, editor and proprietor of the Monitor, was born in New Castle, Delaware, October 22, 1828. His parents were John and Ann (Smith) Kidd, both natives of Delaware, but of Irish descent. His grandfather Kidd, was a farmer, and grandfather Smith, a Presbyterian minister. Both families came across the water on the same vessel; being four months on the ocean. The mother of Thomas died about three years after his birth, quite suddenly after giving birth to his only brother; and his father, about one year after, partly from a cold contracted by exposure, and partly by grief from the loss of his wife.

On the death of his father, young Kidd was taken by a most estimable aunt, Mrs. M. J. McPherson. Remaining in New Castle about one year, the family moved to Quarryville, where his aunt had taken the contract to board a large number of hands who were employed by the Government, in getting out stone for the Delaware Breakwater, then being constructed by the Government. Here they remained four years, and where Thomas attended a school about six weeks, which comprised the entire time spent in the school room. Returning to New Castle when he was about nine years old, he spent the next four years in such labor as a boy could do, in order to help the family to a comfortable existence. In 1840, the family moved to Philadelphia, where Thomas engaged as an errand-boy in a merchant-tailoring establishment, and served about two years. At this establishment T. S. Arthur and other literary celebrities were wont to congregate, and young Kidd, in listening to their conversation, first conceived the idea of learning something of books and of the world. At the expiration of his two years' ser-vise as an errand-boy, he entered the printing office and stereotype foundry of John Fagin, to learn the trade. At this time he could scarcely read, and knew nothing at all about writing. By patient endeavor he learned to read well and write a fair hand, and before many months expired he was made one of the proof-readers in the establishment; but the life of a printer did not suit him. He had for many years a desire to learn the trade of a machinist, and when two years had passed of his printer's life, he ran away to Wilmington, Delaware, and applied for a situation in the railroad and machine shops of that city. He was told they could not give any attention to his application without recommendations. He then went on foot to New Castle and asked old friends of his father, and those who had known him when a small boy, to recommend him. This they did; and armed with his recommendations he returned to Wilmington, to be told that he must wait three weeks before an opening could be made. This he could not do; he was away from home, without money and without friends. Starvation was staring him in the face; he must get work—and at once. He therefore bound himself to the firm of Hollingsworth & Teas, to learn the trade of blacksmith and machinist. Before the expiration of his term of service the firm failed, and he then engaged with Elliott & Huston, locomotive builders, of Wilmington. Here he remained until 1849, when he received an invitation from Mr. Hollingsworth, who had removed to Chicago, to come to that city and take charge of the iron-shops that he was about to establish. He accepted the invitation and entered upon the work, where he remained a short time, and then received and accepted the appointment of traveling agent of an agricultural firm. In this line of business he continued with success until 1857—save for a short period in 1853-4, when, his health having failed him, he returned to his old home in Delaware. While east he was married, July 1854, to Charlotte, daughter of Jesse Janney, of Cecil county, Maryland. Six children have been born unto them, two of whom are now living—Lizzie G. and Presco Wright.

In February, 1856, Mr. Kidd brought his family to Springfield, where they have since continued to reside. In 1857, he served as bailiff in the United States Marshal's office. In 1858, he was elected Coroner and was also appointed Deputy Sheriff. In the winter of 1858-9 and 1859-60, he served as Sheriff of the Supreme Court of Illinois. In 1860, he was appointed by Judge Treat, Crier of the United States District Court, which position he continued to hold until the spring of 1877. In addition to the offices mentioned, Mr. Kidd served as Assessor in Springfield for a period of fifteen years, and Collector by election, two years.

While serving as Deputy Sheriff, Mr. Kidd read law, and passing a successful examination before Judge Walker, of the Supreme Court, was licensed to practice. He never opened an office and tells upon himself that he never had but two cases, in the latter one he took offense at the answers of a colored witness, and struck him over the head with an iron square, and was fined by the Justice of the Peace three dollars for contempt of court. He then retired from active practice.

As a writer Mr. Kidd has a peculiar style of his own. He follows the model of no man. When he writes a sentence, no man can mistake its meaning. It is plain and to the point, yet so worded that it cannot be thought to be from the pen of another.

THE SPRINGFIELD TIMES.

In 1844, the Democratic party in Sangamon county was somewhat divided on purely local issues. The Register espousing the side of one faction, left the other without representation. This necessitated the starting a second Democratic paper in Springfield, and S. S. Brooks, who in 1829-30 published the Illinois Herald, was induced to make the venture. The new paper was called the Springfield Times. It was a small folio sheet, but edited with the vim characteristic of the Brooks family, who were born newspaper men. The Times only existed about one year, the party not being able to support two organs, and the breaches in the party being healed. Mr. Brooks, though an excellent newspaper man, was no business manager, and never succeeded in his chosen profession. An old man, he wandered back to Springfield occasionally, and worked at the case in the Register and other offices, to secure a livelihood for himself and family.

THE MASONIC TROWEL.

Harmon G. Reynolds, the founder and editor of the Masonic Trowel, is one of the oldest Masons in the State, having taken his degrees in Warsaw Lodge, in 1843. He was Grand Marshal of the Grand Lodge in 1848, and was elected Grand Secretary of the Grand Lodge and Chapter, and continued as Grand Secretary of the Lodge until 1851. In 1868, he was elected Grand Master, and held this position for two years. He remained Secretary of the Grand Chapter until 1869. He assisted in the initiatory work of forming the Grand Council of Royal and Select Masters, and was the first Recorder of that body. Mr. Reynolds has been Master of three lodges, and High Priest of three Chapters, and was first Commander of Elwood Commandery No. 6, of this city. All of which positions he filled with credit to himself and honor to the fraternity. He also received, in 1854, the thirty-second degree of the Ancient Scottish Rites, and the thirty-third in Boston, in 1864. In 1858, he located in this city, and was established, in 1862, the Masonic Trowel, with which paper he retained his connection until 1868. He has always had the editorial control of its columns, and his labors therein have redounded to the general welfare and prosperity of the craft at large. By the fire, on the night of the 22d of February, by which the Trowel was destroyed, he was stripped of every dollar of his earthly possessions.

ILLINOIS STATE DEMOCRAT.

In 1857 a paper under the above name was started in Springfield by J. J. Clarkson, with Elliott B. Herndon, editor. As its name implies it was a Democratic paper, and was started to combat the heresies supposed to exist in a portion of the Democratic party, headed by Stephen A. Douglas. It lived about three years.

THE SUNDAY MAIL.

This was a five column quarto, issued every Sunday morning by The Mail Company, and was well filled with local news. It was short-lived.

ILLINOIS FREI PRESSE.

Many attempts have been made to publish a German paper in Springfield, but until the Frei Presse was started, all prior to that had proven failures. On the eleventh day of January, 1872, Edward Rummel, then Secretary of State, commenced the publication of the Frei Presse, an eight column folio, in support of the Liberal movement then being advocated by such men as Horace Greeley, Charles Sumner, John M. Palmer and others. Mr. Rummel only retained connection about three months, and then sold to Gehring & Hotze, two practical German printers. Mr. Gehring assumed editorial control of the paper, and has since continued to act as managing editor. The success of the paper was assured from the start, the Germans largely supporting the new movement. It has had a uniform, steady growth, and is not only regarded as the most successful German paper, but is said to be the most successful German or English paper in Springfield. The office is well supplied with type and presses, and does a general book and job business in connection with the publication of the paper. After a time, Mr. Hotze retired, and Mr. Gehring became sole editor and proprietor.

Frederick Gehring was born in Baden, Germany, March 4, 1841. His early life was spent in that country, in attendance upon the common and high schools. In 1856, he came to America, and settled in Lafayette, Indiana, where he entered a German newspaper office, to learn the trade of a printer. Here he remained about three years, and then went to Indianapolis and worked as a journeyman printer. From Indianapolis he drifted on to St. Louis, where he was when the war for the Union commenced. Returning to Indianapolis, he enlisted as a private in the Fifteenth Indiana Infantry, and served three years, being wounded at the battle of Stone river. On his recovery he was placed on detached duty, where he remained until the close of his term of enlistment, when he was discharged. Returning to Indianapolis, he served for some years as local editor of the Telegraph, of that city, and for about six months as political editor of a German paper. On the 19th day of October, 1865, he was united in marriage to Miss Kathrina May, of Indianapolis. They have had six children, three of whom are now living—two boys and one girl. In April, 1872, Mr. Gehring and his family came to Springfield, and he purchased an interest in the Frei Presse. In 1874 he was elected a member of the legislature, by the combined Liberal and Democratic vote, and was classed in the House, politically, as a Democratic-Liberal. He now claims to be a Liberal-Democrat, and the Frei Presse as a Liberal-Democratic paper. In the legislature, he was placed on the committee on mines and mining, the committee on printing, and also on education. The committee on mines and mining framed the law that was passed regulating the government of mines. Mr. Gehring is a member of the A. O. U. W., and Turn-Verien. He was the originator of the Building Associations of Springfield, and has taken great interest in their work. He is a good writer, and a practical business man.

STAATS WOCHENBLATT.

The Staats Wochenblatt is a large seven column quarto, and was established in the fall of 1878, its first number bearing date November 21. H. Schlange is the editor and proprietor. The Wochenblatt has been a success from the start, it now having a bona fide circulation of fifteen hundred copies weekly. Mr. Schlange was born November 16, 1844, at Hanover, Germany. As soon as sufficiently advanced he entered the Jacobson Institute, where he remained until he was sixteen years of age. He then entered the army as a private, and passed the various grades of promotion until he was made Assistant Quartermaster. In 1865 he came to America and landed at New York in the early part of December, where he remained a few days and proceeded to Springfield, Illinois, his destination, arriving there January 2, 1866. At Springfield, he learned the trade of cigar-maker, and continued in that business until he established the Wochenblatt, in 1878. At this time there was no Republican German paper in Springfield, and Mr. Schlange thought it to be a good opportunity to establish one. The result has more than exceeded his most sanguine expectations. Mr. Schlange and Anna Ahrens were married in Lincoln, Illinois, February 25, 1868. Two children have been born unto them—August and Lena.

AUBURN CITIZEN.

In 1873 Lowdermilk & Stover commenced the publication of the Auburn Herald, a six column folio. The paper was started mainly for the purpose of affording the business men of Auburn an advertising medium, but the citizens believed it should be something more, and therefore the experiment was tried of giving the community a good local paper. Not having an office of their own, the printing was done in Virden at the office of the Virden News, and the paper circulated from Auburn. After the expiration of about five months, a stock company was formed for the purchase of office material, and the outfit was purchased of the Virden News in August, 1874, M. G. Wadsworth, of Auburn, and W. F. Thompson, of Virden, becoming publishers, by purchase from the stock company.

A sketch of the senior proprietor of the Herald—W. W. Lowdermilk—will be found in connection with the History of Auburn. A. B. Stover, the junior, came from Havana, Illinois. He was at one time editor of the Mason County Herald. When he came to Auburn he engaged as a clerk in a dry goods store, retaining connection after engaging in editorial work. He was an easy and fluent writer. After the Herald changed hands, he made a profession of religion and conducted a series of meetings in Auburn with great success. He was induced to go before the Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and by that body was licensed to preach the Gospel. He is a good talker and is now meeting with success in the ministry.

When Wadsworth & Thompson became the proprietors of the Herald they rented a room in the bank building and continued its publication. At the commencement of the second volume the name was changed to the Auburn Citizen, and the paper enlarged to a seven column folio. The following spring the senior bought out the junior partner's interest, and has since been sole proprietor. The Citizen was enlarged to an eight column folio April 22, 1880, and changed to a five column quarto, December 9, 1880. The Citizen has no political bias, its special mission being local news. It is at present the only paper published in Sangamon county outside of Springfield.

Moses G. Wadsworth was born in Hallowell, Kennebec county, Maine, February 3, 1826, and is the son of Daniel and Margaret F. Wadsworth. His parents were of English and Welsh origin, the father being descended, on the father's side, from Peregrin White, the first white child born in America. Moses G. came to Illinois, in his fifteenth year with his parents, settling in (old) Auburn, where the parents are still living, the father in his eighty-third and the mother in her eightieth year. They have resided in the same house about thirty-eight years. Moses G. Wadsworth was married in September, 1849, to Elizabeth F. Wheeler, of Macoupin county, who died in May, 1857, leaving five children, four of whom are living. He was married again in November, 1862, to Mary E. Day, of Chatham, who has borne him seven children, four of whom are living. Until after the death of his first wife, Mr. Wadsworth followed farming. After that he worked principally at carpenter work, until his connection with the Auburn Herald (afterwards Citizen,) in 1879. He was clerk of his township three years; assessor one year, and tax collector nine years. He has been school trustee ten or more years, and Secretary of Ark and Anchor Lodge of Masons, eleven years.

THE EVENING POST.

The only evening paper at present published in Springfield, was established in January, 1880, the first number being issued on the 3d. Its publication was decided upon by a number of printers and newspaper men of the city, who were out of employment at the time, caused by a strike in the composing room of the Register office. There being no evening paper in the city, they decided to occupy the field, and incorporated the Capital Co-operative Publishing Company, with a capital of $1,000, which was subsequently increased to $2,000. Charles W. Bovard, F. H. B. McDowell, Andrew McWeeney, J. H. Duggan, W. H. Mursinna, William F. Aitken, T. F. Harrington, J. M. Higgins, Louis Souther, and Louis Schuckers, were the original stockholders. F. H. B. McDowell was elected editor-in-chief, with J. M. Higgins and Louis Souther as associates. During the first month, Messrs. Souther and Higgins withdrew from the company. Mr. McDowell continued as editor-in-chief until the latter part of May in that year, when, owing to a dissatisfaction among the stockholders and a desire on their part to sustain the principles of the Greenback party, he withdrew. At that time, the paper had become well established, and its circulation was the largest it attained during the year. Mr. J. K. Magie was elected editor-in-chief, on Mr. McDowell's withdrawal, and occupied that position until August 1, when, the business of the paper having been badly damaged by his administration, at the request of the Board of Directors, Mr. McDowell again assumed its management, and he now owns nearly all the stock of the company. The paper is a handsome seven-column folio, having been enlarged from a six-column folio on the 16th of October, 1881. Its political tone is of the stalwart Republican order, and it exerts no little local influence. Its circulation is largely among the working classes. Its subscription price is $5 per year.

Among those who have contributed to the success of the paper, a mournful tribute is due to the late Henry G. Fitzhugh, who died November 13, 1880, at the age of twenty-two years, at the time of his death being its city editor. He was one of the brightest young journalists the city has ever produced, and his sad death, after a short illness of pneumonia, was a shock to all who knew him. His remains were interred at Oak Ridge.

The present editorial staff of the paper is composed of F. H. B. McDowell, S. P. V. Arnold, and L. M. Snell.

Mr. McDowell was born at Freeport, Illinois, January 7, 1854. Compelled at the age of thirteen to leave the High School, by the necessity of his earnings for the support of his father's family, he entered the office of the Freeport Bulletin, in March, 1868, as an apprentice, and acquired the printer's trade. In January, 1872, he left his home for Chicago, where he remained until the fall of 1876, working at his trade in the Chicago Tribune composing room. In November of that year he formed a partnership with W. W. Lewis in the publication of the Carroll County Gazette, at Lanark, Illinois. The partnership continued until February, 1878, when Mr. Lewis retired, and he continued its publication until January, 1879, when he disposed of the paper and removed to Chicago. In September of that year he was elected Secretary of the State Bureau of Labor Statistics, which position he now holds. He was married to Anna Magnusson Jewett, of Chicago, in November, 1876.

S. P. V. Arnold, associate editor and business manager of the Post, was born in Steubenville, Ohio, in 1854, where he resided until twelve years of age, when he removed to Columbus, Ohio. He was educated at Otterbein University, at Westerville, Ohio, and graduated at the National Normal School, at Lebanon, Ohio, in 1875. Previous to and after graduating, he taught school for seven years. In the fall of 1878, he went to St. Louis and established the American Trade Journal, which he continued until August, 1881, when he sold his interest in the paper and came to Springfield, and became connected with the Post as associate editor and business manager.

CAMPAIGN PAPERS.

Many campaign papers have been issued in Springfield; the most noted of which were the "Old Soldier," published in 1840, by the Whig general committee; and the "Old Hickory," published by the Democratic general committee. Each of these papers had a circulation of 35,000 copies, and were very effective campaign sheets, and will readily be called to mind by the old settler.

The "Conservative" was a seven-column folio, issued during the presidential campaign of 1856, and supporting Millard Fillmore for the presidency. It was edited by a committee of the Springfield Fillmore Club, and was an interesting political sheet.

CHAPTER XII.

REED AND DONNER EMIGRANT PARTY.

Since the discovery of the New World by Christopher Columbus, there has ever seemed a disposition to push on toward the setting sun. Like the story told children of the sack of gold placed at the termination of the rainbow, which creates an earnest desire in their hearts to secure the treasure, so there appears before the eyes of all men, in dazzling splendor, visions of untold wealth and honors, to be secured in the great West.

Early in the spring of 1846, a party was organized in this county for California and the Pacific coast. Gold had not then been discovered, but a knowledge of the beautiful Sacramento valley had been obtained, and it was thought a home could there be made which would be delightful and pleasing to all. The party left Springfield April 14, 1846, full of hope and spirit, looking forward to the time when they should reach their destinations and be at rest. Little did they anticipate the trials and tribulations that awaited them as they passed over the mountains and across the great American Desert. When they left Springfield, the party numbered thirty-four persons. The following named were among the number:

James F. Reed and Mrs. Margaret W. Reed, his wife, with their four children, Virginia E. B., Martha J., James F., Jun., and Thomas K.; also Mrs. Sarah Keyes, the mother of Mrs. Reed.

George Donner and Mrs. Tamsen Donner, his wife, with their five children, Elitha C., Leanna C., Francis E., Georgiana and Elizabeth P.

Jacob Donner and Mrs. Elizabeth Donner, his wife, with their five children, Isaac, Lewis, Samuel, George and Mary; also William and Solomon Hook, children of Mrs. Donner by a former marriage.

There were also Milford Elliott—often mentioned as Milton Elliott—James Smith, John Denton, Eliza and Bayless Williams, Walter Herron and Hiram O. Miller. There were some others, but I have been unable to learn their names.

Leaving Springfield, their first point of destination was Independence, Missouri, where they were to make the final preparation for crossing the plains. They were joined at various points by parties from other places, as follows:

From Lacon, Illinois: Jay Fausdick and Mrs. Sarah Fausdick, his wife. Mr. and Mrs. Graves, with their eight children, Frank, Mary, William, Ellen, Lavina, Nancy, Jonathan and Elizabeth. Mrs. Fausdick was a daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Graves.

From Iowa: Patrick Brien—spelled, in some places, Breen and Breen—Margaret Brien, Margaret J., John, Edward, Patrick Jun., Simon, James and Peter Brien, and Patrick Dolen.

From Belleville, Illinois: J. P. Eddy, Mrs. Eddy and W. H. Eddy.

From St. Louis, Missouri: William Foster, Mrs. Foster and George Foster; and from Ray county, Missouri: William McCutchen, Mrs. McCutchen and Harriet McCutchen.

From Tennessee: Lemuel Murphy, Mrs. Murphy, Lander, Mary, William and Samuel Murphy; William Pike, Cynthia Pike and N. Pike.

From Germany: Mr. and Mrs. Kiesberger, or Keysburg, B. and L. S. Keysburg. Mrs. Wolfinger, Mr. Rhinehart, Mr. Spitzger and Carl Berger.

From Springfield, Ohio: Samuel Shoemaker. From Chicago, Illinois: C. T. Stanton.

At Independence the party laid in their supplies for the long journey across the plains. At that time it was absolutely necessary that emigrants should travel together in large bodies in order to protect themselves from the Indians, and it was never safe to start until the grass had sufficiently grown to afford subsistence for the cattle.

Early in May the journey began from Independence. No trouble was experienced until they came to Big Blue river, four miles above its mouth. They found the stream quite full, and had to provide themselves with rafts before crossing. Just before reaching this place, Mrs. Keys, the mother of Mrs. Reed, became ill, and while here, on the morning of May 29, breathed her last. All work was suspended and each person vied with the other in rendering to her the last tribute of respect. A neat coffin was constructed, the remains placed in it and buried on a beautiful elevation, near a burr-oak tree. Religious services were conducted by a minister present with the party. The grave was sodded and the tree made to serve the purpose of a head-board. On it was cut the following inscription:

"Sarah Keys, aged 70 years. Died 29th May, 1846.
From Springfield, Illinois."

At the foot, a coarse white stone, resembling marble, was placed, containing the words:

"Mrs. S. Keys. Aged 70 years."

Flowers and young cedars were placed at the head and foot of the grave.

Between Independence and Blue river the Reed and Donner party fell in with Colonel W. H. Russell and company, who had left Independence a few days before them. Passing Blue river, they all traveled together until they reached Little Sandy river, where a separation took place, the majority of them going to Oregon; Colonel Russell heading the latter. The day after the separation the Reed and Donner party elected George Donner, Captain, and from that time it was known as the "Donner Company." They continued their journey up the valley of the Platte river, passing Fort Laramie and crossing the Rocky Mountains to Fort Bridger without any serious mishap. This had occupied the entire summer. They tarried at the Fort four days. Letters had been left here for the party, warning them against taking the Hasting's Cut-Off, and advising them to go by the Fort Hall route. The latter was an established and well known route, but much longer than the former, and required a detour to the northwest. The Hasting's Cut-Off passed through Webber's canyon to the south end of the great Salt Lake, near where the city of Salt Lake has since been built. This route being more direct and some three hundred miles shorter, was an inducement to emigrants to go that way. Unfortunately, the letters were not delivered, and the Donner party concluded to take the shorter route.

Approaching the mouth of the Webber canyon, they found a letter sticking in the top of a sage bush from Hastings, the discoverer of the new route. He was then piloting a company through, and proposed to the Donner Company that, if they would send messengers for him, he would return and pilot them through a better way than the one by which they were directed. In response to the letter, Reed, Stanton and McCutchen, of the Donner party, hastened on to accept the offer of Mr. Hastings. The latter then came back part of the way and after piloting the three men a few miles, gave them directions, and returned to the first party he was piloting through. Reed, Stanton and McCutchen then returned to their own party, and all went to work, and by digging and cutting timber, made a road passing to the south end of Salt Lake, crossing the outlet of the lake, now called the river Jordan. Passing to the northwest around the lake, they were detained a few days by the death, from consumption, of Mr. Halloran, one of the company.

A few more days' travel brought them to the springs where they were to provide water and grass for crossing Hasting's Desert, an alkaline desert, destitute of water and vegetation. They were led to believe it was less than fifty miles across, but it proved to be nearer eighty. It was understood that they must travel day and night, stopping only long enough to feed and water the cattle. When about two-thirds of the way across, the stock manifested signs of being exhausted, and Mr. Reed was requested to go forward until he found water and then report. After traveling about twenty miles he found water, and returning, about eleven o'clock at night, he met his teamsters driving the cattle, having left their wagons. After directing them how to proceed, he went on to meet his family and the remainder of the company. Soon after leaving his teamsters one of their horses sunk down in the road, and while they were endeavoring to raise it, the cattle scented the water, scattered, and nine yoke of them were never found. Only one ox and one cow remained.

About daylight the next morning, Mr. Reed succeeded in reaching his family, and found them alone, the remainder of the party having continued their journey, none of them having taken their teams from the wagons except Mr. Reed's men. Not knowing that his cattle were lost, Mr. Reed waited with his family all day, expecting some of his men to return and haul them to water. Not receiving any information, and their supply of water being nearly gone, he started with his family on foot, carrying his youngest child in his arms. In the course of the night the children became exhausted, so they spread a blanket on the ground and all lay down on it, covering themselves with shawls. A cold wind commenced blowing soon after they lay down, and the children could only be kept warm by having their four dogs lie down against them outside the shawls.

About daylight they moved on, and soon came to a wagon which belonged to Jacob Donner and which contained his family, Mr. Donner having gone forward for water. He soon after returned and took his own and Mr. Reed's family to the source of the supply, where they remained in camp for about one week, spending the time in searching for the lost cattle. The search was unavailing, it being believed the Indians had secured all of them. Mr. Reed, as soon as he became convinced his cattle could not be found, divided among others his provisions, except what he could haul in one wagon, and leaving seven wagons on the plains, the party again resumed their journey. Winter was close upon them and the party was hundreds of miles from any human habitation.

After proceeding some days on their journey it was found that provisions were running short. An estimate was made of the quantity it would take for each family. It was now proposed by Mr. Reed, that two of the number should hurriedly proceed forward to Captain Sutter's, in California, and secure supplies, Mr. Reed becoming personally responsible for the payment. William McCutchen, of Missouri, and Mr. Stanton, of Chicago, volunteered for this purpose. They started upon their journey and weeks passed without any tiding from them. It was now suggested that Mr. Reed go in advance to see what had become of them, and hurry up supplies.

At this time the two Donner families were in advance of the main body. Walter Herron was with the Donner's and when Mr. Reed overtook them, Herron volunteered to go with him, which offer was accepted. Having but one horse, they rode by turns. Their provisions giving out, they traveled for days without food, except wild geese and other game which they occasionally killed on Truckee river. When they reached the Sierra Nevada mountains, Herron wanted to kill the horse, and Mr. Reed persuaded him from it by agreeing to kill him rather than perish with hunger. That afternoon

Herron became delirious for want of food. They found five beans. Herron ate three of them, and Reed the other two. The next morning they came upon some abandoned wagons, which they ransacked, but failed to find any food. Taking the tar-bucket from one of the wagons, and scraping the tar from the bottom, Mr. Reed discovered a streak of rancid tallow in the bottom, which he made known to Herron, who swallowed a piece about the size of a walnut without giving it a smell. He swallowed a second piece, and wanted more, which Mr. Reed refused to give him, having himself eaten some which made him deathly sick. They soon after descended into Bear river valley, where they found some emigrants in wagons, who gave them food and relieved their sufferings. They there met Mr. Stanton and two Indians sent by Captain Sutter to aid in carrying provisions. Mr. Reed was so emaciated that Mr. Stanton did not recognize him until they had conversed with each other several minutes. The next morning, October 23, 1846, each party continued their journey. Mr. Reed went on to Captain Sutter's, where he secured thirty horses, one mule and two Indians to aid him in bringing out the sufferers. He was joined by Mr. McCutchen, who had been separated from Mr. Stanton by sickness. With some flour and meat they started to meet the suffering emigrants in the mountains. After weeks spent in unavailing efforts, they had to return, as men and horses sank out of sight in the snow. It was evident that nothing could be done until spring, the mountaineers all being absent fighting Mexicans, the war with Mexico having commenced the year before, and the natives of Spanish and Indian blood having expressed a determination to exterminate the Americans.

Snow commenced falling the latter part of October, and caught the whole party, not in a body, but scattered along some distance, the extremes being probably a day's journey apart. The following journal, kept by one of the sufferers, includes the time from October 31, 1846, to March 1, 1847, and is from the Illinois State Journal, of September 16, 1847:

TRUCKEE'S LAKE, November 20, 1846.—Came to this place on the 31st of last month; went into the Pass, the snow so deep we were unable to find the road, and when within three miles from the summit, turned back to this shanty, on Truckee's Lake. Stanton came up one day, after we arrived here; we again took our teams and wagons, and made another unsuccessful attempt to cross the mountains, as it continued to snow all the time. We now have killed most part of our cattle, having to remain here until next spring, and live on lean meat, without bread or salt. It snowed during the space of eight days, with little intermission, after our arrival, though now clear and pleasant, freezing at night; the snow nearly gone from the valleys.

Nov. 21—Fine morning, wind northwest; twenty-two of our company about starting to cross the mountains this day, including Stanton and his Indians.

Nov. 22—Froze hard last night; fine and clear to-day; no account from those on the mountains.

Nov. 23—Same weather, wind west; the expedition across the mountains returned after an unsuccessful attempt.

Nov. 25—Cloudy; looks like the eve of a snow storm; our mountaineers are to make another trial to-morrow, if fair; froze hard last night.

Nov. 26—Began to snow last evening; now rains or sleets; the party do not start to-day.

Nov. 29—Still snowing; now about three feet deep; wind west; killed my last oxen to-day; gave another yoke to Foster; wood hard to be got.

Nov. 30—Snowing fast; looks as likely to continue as when it commenced; no living thing, without wings, can get about.

Dec. 1—Still snowing; wind west; snow about six or six and one-half feet deep; very difficult to get wood, and we are completely housed up; our cattle all killed but two or three, and these, with the horses and Stanton's mules, all supposed to be lost in the snow; no hopes of finding them alive.

Dec. 3—Ceased snowing; cloudy all day; warm enough to thaw.

Dec. 4—Beautiful sunshine; thawing a little; looks delightful, after the long storm; snow seven or eight feet deep.

Dec. 5—The morning fine and clear; Stanton and Graves manufacturing snow-shoes for another mountain scramble; no account of mules.

Dec. 8—Fine weather; froze hard last night; wind southwest; hard work to find wood sufficient to keep us warm, or cook our beef.

Dec. 9—Commenced snowing about eleven o'clock; wind northwest; took in Spitzer yesterday, so weak that he cannot rise without help, caused by starvation. Some have a scant supply of beef; Stanton trying to get some for himself and Indians; not likely to get much.

Dec. 10—Snowed fast all night, with heavy squalls of wind; continues to snow; now about seven feet in depth.

Dec. 14—Snows faster than any previous day; Stanton and Graves, with several others, making preparations to cross the mountains on snow shoes; snow eight feet on a level.

Dec. 16—Fair and pleasant; froze hard last night; the company started on snow shoes to cross the mountains; wind southeast.

Dec. 17—Pleasant; William Murphy returned from the mountain party last evening; Bayless Williams died night before last; Milton and Noah started for Donner's eight days ago; not returned yet; think they are lost in the snow.

Dec. 19—Snowed last night; thawing to day; wind northwest, a little singular for a thaw.

Dec. 20—Clear and pleasant; Mrs. Reed here; no account from Milton yet; Charles Berger set out for Donner's; turned back, unable to proceed; tough times, but not discouraged; our hopes are in God. Amen!

Dec. 21—Milton got back last night from Donner's camp; sad news; Jacob Donner, Samuel Shoemaker, Rhinehart and Smith are dead; the rest of them in a low situation; snowed all night, with a strong southwest wind.

Dec. 23—Clear to-day; Milton took some of his meat away; all well at their camp. Began this day to read the "thirty day's Prayers;" Almighty God grant the requests of unworthy sinners!

Dec. 24—Rained all night and still continues; poor prospect for any kind of comfort, spiritual or temporal.

Dec. 25—Began to snow yesterday; snowed all night and snows yet, rapidly; extremely difficult to find wood; offered our prayers to God this (Christmas) morning; the prospect is appalling, but we trust in Him.

Dec. 27—Cleared off yesterday; continues clear; snow nine feet deep; wood growing scarcer; a tree, when felled, sinks into the snow, and is hard to be got at.

Dec. 30—Fine clear morning; froze hard last night; Charles Berger died last evening about ten o'clock.

Dec. 31—Last of the year; may we, with the help of God, spend the coming year better than we have the past, which we propose to do if it be the will of the Almighty to deliver us from our present dreadful situation; Amen. Morning fair, but cloudy; wind east-by-south; looks like another snow storm; snow storms are dreadful to us; the snow at present is very deep.

Jan. 1, 1847—We pray the God of mercy to deliver us from our present calamity, if it be His holy will. Commenced snowing last night, and snows a little yet; provisions getting scant; dug up a hide from under the snow yesterday; have not commenced on it yet.

Jan. 3—Fair during the day; freezing at night; Mrs. Reed talks of crossing the mountains with her children.

Jan. 4—Fine morning, looks like spring; Mrs. Reed and Virginia, Milton Elliott and Eliza Williams started a short time ago, with the hope of crossing the mountain; left the children here; it was difficult for Mrs. Reed to part with them.

Jan. 6—Eliza came back from the mountains yesterday evening, not able to proceed; the others kept ahead.

Jan. 8—Very cold this morning; Mrs. Reed and others came back, could not find their way, on the other side of the mountains; they have nothing but hides to live on.

Jan. 10—Began to snow last night; still continues; wind west-north-west.

Jan. 13—Snowing fast; snow higher than the shanty; it must be thirteen feet deep; cannot get wood this morning; it is a dreadful sight for us to look upon.

Jan. 14—Cleared off yesterday; the sun shining brilliantly renovates our spirits; praise be to the God of Heaven.

Jan. 15—Clear day again; wind northwest; Mrs. Murphy blind; Lanthron not able to get wood; has but one axe between him and Kiesburg; it looks like another storm; expecting some account from Sutter's soon.

Jan. 17—Lanthron became crazy last night; provisions scarce; hides our main subsistence; may the Almighty send us help.

Jan. 21—Fine morning; John Battise and Mr. Denton came this morning with Eliza. She will not eat hides; Mrs. — sent her back to live or die on them.

Jan. 22—Began to snow after sunrise; likely to continue; wind north.

Jan. 23—Blew hard and snowed all night; the most severe storm we have experienced this winter; wind west.

Jan. 26—Cleared up yesterday; to-day fine and pleasant, wind south; in hopes we are done with snow storms; those who went to Sutter's not yet returned; provisions getting scant; people growing weak; living on small allowance of hides.

Jan. 28—Commenced snowing yesterday—still continues to-day. Lewis (Sutter's Indian,) died three day's ago; food growing scarcer; don't have fire enough to cook our hides.

Jan. 30—Fair and pleasant; wind west; thawing in the sun; John and Edward Breen went to Graves' this morning; the — seized on Mrs. — goods until they would be paid; they also took the hides which herself and family subsisted upon; they retained two pieces only, the balance they have taken. You may judge from this what our fare is in camp; there is nothing to be had by hunting yet, perhaps there soon will be.

Jan. 31—The sun does not shine out brilliant, this morning; froze hard last night; wind northwest. Lanthron Murphy died last night about one o'clock; Mrs. Reed went to Graves' this morning, to look after goods.

Feb. 5—Snowed hard until twelve o'clock last night; many uneasy for fear we shall all perish with hunger; we have but little meat left, and only three hides; Mrs. Reed has nothing but one hide, and that is on Graves' house; Milton lives there, and will likely keep that; Eddy's child died last night.

Feb. 6—It snowed faster last night and to-day than it has done this winter before; still continues, without intermission; wind southwest; Murphy's folks and Kiesburg say they cannot eat hides; I wish we had enough of them; Mrs. Eddy is very weak.

Feb. 7—Ceased to snow at last; to-day it is quite pleasant; McCutchen's child died on the second of this month.

Feb. 8—Fine, clear morning; Spitzer died last night; we will bury him in the snow; Mrs. Eddy died on the night of the seventh.

Feb. 9—Mr. Pike's child all but dead; Milton is at Murphy's, not able to get out of bed; Kiesburg — gets up; he says he is not able; Mrs. Eddy and child were buried to-day; wind south-east.

Feb. 10—Beautiful morning; thawing, in the sun; Milton Elliott died last night, at Murphy's shanty; Mrs. Reed went there this morning, to see after his effects; J. Denton trying to borrow meat for Graves; had none to give; they had nothing but hides; all are entirely out of meat; but a little we have; our hides are nearly all eat up. With God's help, spring will soon smile upon us.

Feb. 12—Warm, thawing morning.

Feb. 14—Fine morning, but cold; buried Milton in the snow. John Denton not well.

Feb. 15—Morning cloudy until nine o'clock, then cleared off warm. Mrs. — refused to give Mrs. — any hides. Put Sutter's pack hides on her shanty, and would not let her have them.

Feb. 16—Commenced to rain last evening, and turned to snow during the night, and continued until morning; weather changeable—sunshine, then light showers of hail, and wind at times. We all feel very unwell; the snow is not getting much less at present.

Feb. 19—Froze hard last night. Seven men arrived from California yesterday evening with provisions, but left the greater part on the way. To-day it is clear and warm for this region; some of the men have gone to Donner's camp; they will start back on Monday.

Feb. 22—The Californians started this morning, twenty-four in number, some in a very weak state; Mrs. Kiesburg started with them, and left Kiesburg here, unable to go; buried Pike's child this morning in the snow; it died two days ago.

Feb. 23—Froze hard last night; to-day pleasant and thawy—has the appearance of spring, all but the deep snow; wind south-southeast; shot a dog to-day and dressed his flesh.

Feb. 25—To-day Mrs. Murphy says the wolves are about to dig up the dead bodies around her shanty, and the nights are too cold to watch them, but we hear them howl.

Feb. 26—Hungry times in camp; plenty of hides, but the folks won't eat them; we eat them with tolerable good appetite, thanks be to the Almighty God. Mrs. Murphy said here yesterday that she thought she would commence on Milton and eat him; I do not think she has done so yet; it is distressing. The Donners told the California folks, four days ago, that they would commence on the dead people, if they did not succeed that day or the next in finding their cattle, then ten or twelve feet under the snow, and did not know the spot or anywhere near it; they have done it ere this.

Feb. 28—One solitary Indian passed by yesterday; came from the lake; had a heavy pack on his back; gave me five or six roots, resembling onions in shape; tasted some like a sweet potato, full of tough little fibres.

Feb. 29—Ten men arrived this morning from Bear Valley, with provisions. We all leave in two or three days, and cache our goods here. They say the snow will remain until June.

The above mentioned ten men started for the valley with seventeen of the sufferers; they traveled fifteen miles and a severe snow storm came on; they left fourteen of the emigrants, the writer of the above journal and his family, and succeeded in getting in but three children. Lieutenant Woodworth immediately went to their assistance, but before he reached them they had eaten three of their number, who had died from hunger and fatigue; the remainder Lieutenant Woodworth's party brought in. April, 1847, the last member of the party was brought to Captain Sutter's Fort. It is utterly impossible to give any description of the sufferings of the company. Your readers can form some idea of them by perusing the above diary. Yours, etc.,

GEORGE MCKINSTRY, JR.

Fort Sacramento, April 27, 1847.

The emigrants thus caught in the mountains died, one by one, until thirty-six of the eighty-one who left Independence in the spring with such high hopes, literally starved to death. The following are the names of those from Sangamon county:

George Donner and his wife, Mrs. Tamsen Donner; Jacob Donner and his wife, Mrs. Elizabeth Donner; her son, William Hook, sometimes called William Donner; the three sons of Jacob Donner and wife, Isaac, Lewis and Samuel; four unmarried men, Bayless Williams, Milford Elliott, James Smith and John Denton, making a total of twelve from Sangamon county who perished from exposure and want of food.

Jacob Donner died among the first. He was a tender-hearted, conscientious man, and it is attested that his death was caused more by grief at the present and prospective sufferings of his family, than from disease or want of food. George and Jacob Donner were members of the German Prairie Christian Church. The five surviving children of George Donner, and the three surviving children of Jacob Donner and wife, with their descendants, are among the most respected citizens of California. It is thought Mrs. George Donner was a native of New England—Maine—and was a lady in the highest sense of the word. Some of the citizens of Sangamon county remember her especially on account of her perfect self-control and power to govern. She taught school in the vicinity of Auburn when it was more unusual for a lady to teach than it is now. Some almost full grown, rough, uncouth young men were in her school, and yet she would govern them as thoroughly as if they were children. This self-control seems never to have left her. According to the testimony of Mr. Reed, who, after his own family had been rescued, visited the two camps of the Donners, to find Mrs. Jacob Donner and George Donner helpless, and no means of removing them. They were prepared to leave provisions, and a man at each camp to care for the sick, and used every argument to induce Mrs. George Donner to go with them, but with the full knowledge of the probabilities that she would lose her own life, she utterly refused, preferring to meet death in the discharge of her duty to her husband rather than save her own life by seeming to abandon him in his hour of peril; and so she died, as truly a martyr as though she had been burned at the stake.

Other acts of heroisms are too numerous to mention, but the following will suffice:

Hiram O. Miller proved to be courageous and efficient through all. Milford Elliott could have saved his own life, and having neither wife, children or any other blood relative among the sufferers, no blame could have been laid to his charge if he had saved himself by pushing through, but he would not abandon helpless women and children, and his life paid the forfeit. The Eddy family, of Belleville, Illinois, was totally obliterated.

All that is known of C. T. Stanton is that he was from Chicago, Illinois. History does not, very probably, record the name of a greater hero. It does not appear that he was in any way related, or even acquainted, with one of the sufferers previous to their departure from the States. He aided many of them on their way, and after their calamities came upon them pushed his way through the mountains and reached Sutter's fort, where he was absolutely safe; but he knew there were men, women and children perishing with cold and hunger, and knowing this, there was no rest for him. He secured supplies of food and mules, enlisted the sympathies of two of the unlettered children of the forest, and all pushed on, days and weeks, through storms and snow-drifts, until even the two savages, prompted by him, fell a sacrifice in the cause of humanity. Savages, did I say? I reverently withdraw the word. Their conduct would put to shame thousands who have been reared under the best of Christian influences. There can be no more exalted evidence of humanity than to give one life with the hope of rescuing others from impending death. Mr. Stanton was one of the party of fifteen who attempted to pass out of the mountains, starting December 16, 1846. He was weak and emaciated, as all were, and on the twenty-first of December became snow-blind, and that night failed to reach the camp. The whole party lay in camp the next day waiting for him, but he never came. A party of men who went in the mountains the next summer to bring out the goods belonging to the Donner and Graves children, found his bones at the very tree where they left him on the twenty-first of December. They were chewed and broken in small pieces. The only way they could recognize them to be Stanton's was by a letter from his sister in one of his pockets, with some tobacco, the latter having prevented the wild beast from destroying every evidence of identity. There was also a pistol that had been loaned to Stanton by Mr. Fallen, the man who found his remains. No one of those who perished was more sincerely mourned by the survivors than Mr. Stanton. Mr. Reed left this testimony to his worth: "Poor Stanton, who had no relative in the caravan to draw him back, but from the noble disposition he had, and the kind feelings he entertained for myself and family, and another person who had befriended him, induced him to return with provisions, and he lost his life as a noble PHILANTHROPIST. * * * His kindness saved my little ones from starvation."

As already stated, James F. Reed, after he had been baffled in his attempt to reach the camp of the suffering emigrants, had returned to Captain Sutter's, where he became satisfied that it would be utterly impossible to do anything more for them until spring. He was advised by Captain Sutter to proceed to Yerba Bueno—now San Francisco—and make his case known to the naval officer in command. Arriving at San Jose, he found the San Francisco side of the bay occupied by Mexicans. Here he joined a company of volunteers, and took part in the battle of Santa Clara; that opened the way to San Francisco. There he was enabled to raise by voluntary contributions, $1,000 in the town and $300 from the sailors in port, with which he purchased supplies, which were placed on board a schooner, in command of Midshipman Woodworth, who took all to the mouth of Feather river, where men and horses were procured for carrying relief to the emigrants. On their way to the camp they met a party coming out with women and children, among them Mr. Reed's wife and two children, his other two children, Martha and Thomas K., having been left in camp in charge of a Mr. Glover of the rescuing party, who volunteered to stay with and care for them, assuring Mrs. Reed that he was a Free Mason and knew her husband to be such, and that he would rescue her children or die in the attempt. He was as good as his word, protected and cared for the children until they were rescued by their father, and soon all the members of the family were re-united and rejoicing over their great deliverance. Mr. Reed's was the only entire family who left Sangamon county, all the members of which lived to reach their destination, and they did it without any one of them being driven to the necessity of eating human flesh. It seems the more wonderful that they should all have lived through, when their natural protector was separated from them so much of the time.

The scene of the great suffering just described began west of the Great Salt Lake, in a salt desert, and extended hundreds of miles westward, over a succession of mountain ranges, running principally north and south, known as the Sierra Nevada mountains. Localities could not then be described, except by natural boundaries, such as mountains and valleys. The territory then belonged to Mexico, and the suffering and destitution that met the emigrants seemed only a realization of what might reasonably be expected in leaving the land of the Stars and Stripes to come under the sway of the benighted Mexican flag. But the old adage that "the darkest hour is just before the break of day," has been fully realized in this case to those who survived. The war they found in the Sacramento valley, waged by Mexico for the avowed purpose of exterminating the few scattered Americans on the Pacific coast, terminated in that whole region of country being ceded to our government. Then followed the discovery of gold, the influx of Americans, and the organization of the States of California and Oregon, and, a few years later, Nevada. The locality of the closing scene, the camp where the Donners died, is marked by a small body of water among the mountains, now known as Lake Donner, in the western part of the State of Nevada.

CHAPTER XIII.

POLITICAL.

Like all other intelligent communities in the United States, the people of Sangamon county have participated with earnestness in the various political contests that have agitated the country at large, and have had also their own local political agitations. In the following pages the attempt is made to briefly show the various issues that have entered into the campaigns, following the whole with the official vote of every general election, giving only the principal officers voted for, as showing the condition of the various parties the time mentioned. A volume could easily be written the size of this work, upon the political history alone of Sangamon county. Centrally situated, and for almost half a century its chief city being the capital of the State, the greater number of the political conventions have been held here. From this point, therefore radiate the great political measures that agitate the people of the State, and their influences are first felt in this county.

1824.—The first political question at issue this year, was that of a Constitutional Convention. This Convention was called for the purpose of amending the Constitution, permitting slavery in the State. In this county the friends of a free State were successful. The following is the vote:

— 569

There were four Presidential candidates this year: Andrew Jackson, John Q. Adams, William H. Crawford, and Henry Clay. The candidates for county officers were numerous, there being five for Sheriff, and four for Coroner. John Taylor was the successful candidate for the former office, and James McNabb for the latter.

1826.—Local officers were elected this year. Elijah Iles was elected State Senator over Edward Robinson by a majority of 213.

1828.—Another presidential year, the candidates being Andrew Jackson and John Quincy Adams, the latter being a candidate for re-election. The usual number of candidates for local offices were before the people, and the canvass was quite spirited. The total vote polled in Sangamon county was 1,219, against 875 in 1824. James D. Henry was the successful candidate for Sheriff and Philip Fowler for Coroner.

1830.—Local officers alone were to be elected. James D. Henry was the successful candidate for Sheriff, receiving a majority of 1,503 over George Power.

1832.—The parties this year were known as the Jackson Republicans and the National Republicans. Andrew Jackson was the candidate of the former for re-election to the Presidency, and Henry Clay the latter. The issues were those of national internal improvements, protection to domestic manufactures, the United States bank and reform. The party supporting Henry Clay favored a United States bank, a protective tariff and a system of internal improvements by the general government. Joseph Duncan was the candidate of the Jackson party for Congress, and Jonathan H. Pugh of the Clay party. No county conventions were held, but a large number of candidates were in the field for the various offices to be filled. Handbills were freely circulated setting forth the claims of each to office, or showing the unfitness of opposing candidates. The Jackson party was successful both in August and November. During this year that portion of Sangamon, afterwards stricken off as the county of Menard, began to agitate the question of a separation, and presented Abraham Lincoln as their candidate for the Legislature. Mr. Lincoln was very popular, and obtained nearly the entire vote of that section, but was defeated by the Jackson men, who had a large majority in the county, and Mr. Lincoln being an ardent Clay man.

1834.—State and county officers were to be elected. For Governor there were four candidates—Joseph Duncan, William Kinney, James Adams and R. K. McLaughlin. For county officers their name is legion. Abraham Lincoln was a candidate for Representative in the legislature, and was elected by a handsome majority, receiving a larger vote than any of his colleagues on the ticket. At his old home in Salem he was called upon for a speech, and replied in the following characteristic manner:

*"Gentlemen, Fellow Citizens:—*I presume you all know who I am. I am humble Abraham Lincoln. I have been solicited by many friends to become a candidate for the legislature. My politics are short and sweet, like an old woman's dance. I am in favor of a national bank. I am in favor of the internal improvement system and a high protective tariff. These are my sentiments and political principles. If elected, I will be thankful. If not, it will be all the same."

The political issues were the same as in 1832. The opposition to the Jackson men were called Whigs in this campaign. State issues of importance, were the construction of the Illinois and Michigan canal and other internal improvements. The canvass was quite spirited all over the State, resulting in the election of Mr. Duncan as Governor. The question of the removal of the State Capital from Vandalia was submitted to the people. In this county the vote stood as follows:

For Springfield.....	2,261
For Alton.....	10
For Centre.....	21
For Vandalia.....	1
For Peoria.....	3
For Jacksonville.....	1

1835.—The year was remarkable for the excitement which existed in relation to the local election. At this time a re-organization of parties was begun, looking to the Presidential election the following year. A considerable portion of the Clay or Whig party, represented by George Forquer and Peter Cartwright, went over to the opposition, while a portion of the Jackson men, or Democrats, represented by John Dawson and others, coalesced with the Clay men, which led to a very animated contest. E. D. Taylor and George Forquer each resigned their seats in the State Senate. Archer G. Herndon, (anti-Van Buren), and John Calhoun, Democrat, were nominated to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of the former, and Job Fletcher and Peter Cartwright the latter. Regular county officers were to be elected, and the usual number of self-sacrificing individuals presented their names for the suffrage of the people. The political issues were unchanged, but Jackson men were now known as Democrats and the opposition as Whigs; though as the latter names were not familiar to the people, the two parties were frequently spoken of as Jackson or Van Buren men, and White men. The names of Martin Van Buren and Hugh L. White being presented by their respective parties for the Presidency in 1836. The canvass in Sangamon county was an exciting one, each party using its utmost endeavor to be successful before the people. John Calhoun and Peter Cartwright had been sent as delegates to a State Convention at Vandalia, which endorsed the candidacy of Van Buren, and had there pledged, so far as they were able, the vote of this county for that gentleman. The opposition took up the challenge thus offered, and therefore the intense excitement. The Whigs were triumphant.

1836.—Party lines were now pretty strongly drawn, for the first time in the history of the country. Martin Van Buren was the nominee of the Democracy for the Presidency, and William H. Harrison was the candidate of the Whigs for the same office. John T. Stuart had been nominated by the Whigs and William L. May by the Democrats for Representative in Congress, from the Third Congressional District, of which Sangamon county formed a part. These gentlemen both resided in Springfield and were representative men of their respective parties. Mr. May was elected. The Whig candidates for State Senators and Representatives were each elected. In the legislature they were known as the "Long Nine," being nine in number, the aggregate height of all being fifty-four feet. It is but just to say of these men that they were giants in intellect as well as in stature. Several of the number made national reputations. Every candidate on the Whig ticket received a majority in this county.

1837.—The State bank question was the principal political issue in 1837. The hard times so severely felt by the people caused a great desire for more currency as the remedy for all financial ills. There being no National or State ticket to be elected, there was but little political excitement. Both parties had put forward reasonably good men for the local offices to be filled, it was not a canvass on which political calculations could be based; therefore representatives of both parties were elected. The question of slavery now began to be agitated, and judging from the following record of a public meeting held at Springfield, it would appear the Abolition leaven was working in old Sangamon:

"At a meeting of citizens of Springfield, convened at the court room, on Monday, October 23, 1837, Judge Thomas C. Brown was called to the chair and I. S. Britton appointed Secretary. The following resolutions were adopted:

"Resolved, That the efforts of the Abolitionists in this community are neither necessary nor useful.

"Resolved, That as citizens of a free State and a peaceful community, we deprecate any attempt to sow discord among us, or to create an excitement as to Abolition which can be productive of no good result.

"Resolved, That in the opinion of this meeting the doctrine of the immediate emancipation of the slaves in this country (although promulgated by those who profess to be Christians) is at variance with Christianity, and its tendency is to breed contention, broils, and mobs; and the leaders of those calling themselves Abolitionists are designing, ambitious men, and dangerous members of society, and should be shunned by all good citizens."

In honor of the Whig victory in New York this year, the Sangamo Journal proposed a grand illumination, by setting on fire the prairies of the entire north part of the State. It had an illustration of a vessel "bound for the deserts of Arabia."

1838.—Cyrus Edwards was the Whig candidate, and Thomas Carlin the Democratic candidate, for Governor of the State. John T. Stuart and Stephen A. Douglas were opposing candidates for Congress from the Third District. The local tickets were composed of good men, and a strong effort was put forth by both parties for victory. Mr. Stuart was elected. In this county the Whigs were successful by handsome majorities. The vote of the county was the largest in its history, being 3,271.

1839.—This year only local officers were to be elected, and the political views of the candidates were hardly considered,—though each party had a full set of officers in nomination. Charles R. Matheny, Whig candidate for County Clerk, was elected by a majority of 762, while James Adams, Democrat, for Probate Judge, had a majority of 38.

1840.—No previous political campaign in the history of this country can be compared with the "hard-cider campaign" of 1840. William H. Harrison was for the second time honored by his party—the Whig—with a nomination for the Presidency. Martin Van Buren was nominated by the Democracy for re-election. The hard times that existed during the entire administration of Van Buren caused many to desire a change, with the hope that a change in the political administration of the Government would bring about prosperity. Taking advantage of this state of affairs, the Whigs seemed to be inspired, and went into the campaign with such spirit as almost paralyzed their opponents, although they made a gallant fight. The publishers of the Sangamo Journal issued a campaign paper called the Old Soldier, which was circulated largely throughout the State, and which exerted much influence in the campaign. The publishers of the Register, not to be outdone, also issued a campaign paper, called Old Hickory. Mass meetings, held at central points, were attended by thousands of people; many coming a long distance in lumber-wagons, camping out, and enduring many hardships,—but enthusiastic in the cause. Campaign songs were introduced, and doubtless contributed much to inspire the people, and in the election of Harrison. As a specimen of the songs of the time, the following are given, the first being a contribution to the Old Soldier, by a Sangamon county poet too modest to append his name:

A GOURD OF HARD CIDER.

Let Frenchmen drink claret and sweet muscadine,
And Germans drink Hock on the banks of the Rhine;
But give me to quaff, with friends warm and true,
A gourd of hard cider t' old Tippecanoe.

John Bull may get drunk on his beer and his gin,
Till he can't leave his seat or spit over his chin;
But if that's in the world on which I'd get blue,
'Tis a gourd of hard cider t' old Tippecanoe.

Let the Don swill his port, and smoke his cigar,
And Pisano suck Tiffin and drink "Bolívar;"
But we in log cabins such trash will eschew,
For a gourd of hard cider t' old Tippecanoe.

With praties and whisky let Pat fill his maw,
And Danadd get blind on his smoked eschebaugh—
McFingal ne'er drank, nor did Brian Boru,
A gourd of hard cider t' old Tippecanoe.

In the White House, VanBuren may drink his champagne,
And have himself toasted from Georgia to Maine;
But we in log cabins, with hearts warm and true,
Drink a gourd of hard cider t' old Tippecanoe.

Old Jove has drank Nectar for time and a day,
To drown the dull cares of his heavenly sway;
But if he'd be wise, he'd try something new—
Drink a gourd of hard cider t' old Tippecanoe.

Hurrah for old Tip!—from his side we'll not shrink—
To our rights, and our laws, and our country, we'll drink,
Success to the banner of "red, white, and blue,"
In a gourd of hard cider 't' old Tippecanoe.

SONG OF TIPPECANOE.

Air—Old Rosin the Bow.

Come, let us all join in a chorus,
And shout it along as we go—
Our song the bright prospect before us,
And the hero of Tippecanoe.

When the savage invaded our border,
And thousands most shockingly slew,
He drove them with death and disorder,
On the banks of the Tippecanoe.

When the British and Indians united,
Believing they'd conquer their foe,
Most bravely Fort Meigs saw rected
The scenes of old Tippecanoe.

For an age he had served them in earnest,
And ever was faithful and true;
And our country's now reaping the harvest
Which was planted by Tippecanoe.

From seclusion the people now call him,
To come out before them anew;
For one single term to instal him
Our President—Tippecanoe.

The Vannies have chuckled, denying That Harrison ever will do;
But, astounded they hear the whole Nation
Hurrah for old Tippecanoe.

The Republican banner is waving,
Unfurling its folds to the view;
Patriots! let your motto be "Union,"
And rally round Tippecanoe.

The first Whig County Convention was held at Springfield, Saturday, March 14, for the purpose of nominating candidates for the various offices to be filled at the ensuing election in August. As setting forth the views of the party in this county, the following resolutions, adopted by this convention, are appended:

"WHEREAS, The friends of Constitutional Government, based upon just and equitable principles, have reached a ground upon which they can meet—a ground on which all personal preferences, prejudices and partialities, as well as all petty differences growing out of sectional interests, may be laid aside—when all may unite with a common purpose and for the common good by rallying round their country's banner, now so gloriously streaming in the breeze. And.

"WHEREAS, a voice has come up, 'like the sound of many waters,' from all parts of our common country, declaring that misrule shall end—that the Constitution shall be restored—that Executive power, which for the last three years has been extending its baneful and blighting influences over the land shall be confined within its proper limits—and he who has defiled the temple of our liberties—who has plundered the people's treasury, and is now fast reducing the hard-working men of this country to beggary—and who is now seeking through the aid of his army of office-holders, to 'rear on the ruins of the Republic the throne of his despotism,' shall give up the place to which he has crawled through the favoritism of his illustrious predecessors,' and which he never could have reached through the unbiased suffrages of a free people.

"Resolved, therefore, That without regard to the original preferences of some of us, and looking only to the good of our State and Union, we will cordially and zealously support the nominees of this convention, and hereby solemnly pledge ourselves to use all fair and honorable means to secure their election.

"Resolved, That William H. Harrison—the son of one of the signers of the Declaration of Independence—the favorite aid-de-camp of Wayne in the battles which broke the Indian power in the West—the first delegate of this western empire in Congress; and as such, the author of the present land system of the United States—the Governor of the Northwestern Territory for many years—the victorious General who conducted our armies to victory and glory at Tippecanoe, Fort Meigs and the Thames—'who has fought more battles than any other American General of his time and has never been defeated'—the eloquent champion of Republican principles for many years in the House of Representatives and the Senate of the Union—our Minister to Columbia, and there, as everywhere, strengthening and sustaining the cause of Republican Government; we recognize the hero and statesman, who has spent more than forty years in the service of his country in the highest offices, and when the mission was done retired from them all successively and pure, like Cincinnatus, and like Cincinnatus, poor.

"Resolved, That the election of Harrison and Tyler would emancipate the land from the Catalines who infest it; would restore it to prosperity and peace, and bring back the times when good measures, good principles and good men would control the administration of our government."

The result of the campaign in this county was the triumph of the Whigs, every candidate upon their ticket being elected by majorities ranging from 407 to 1,111.

1841.—In this county, County Commissioners and a School Commissioner were to be elected. A member of Congress was also to be elected from this district. John T. Stuart was the candidate of the Whigs for re-election, and J. H. Ralston made the fight on the part of the Democracy. Mr. Stuart was successful in county and district. The Whig county ticket was also successful.

1842.—Joseph Duncan this year received the nomination of the Whig party for Governor, and Thomas Ford that of the Democrats for the same office. With the exception of Lieutenant-Governor, this was the only State office to be filled. Full tickets for county officers, including State Senators and Representatives, were made by both parties. The entire Whig ticket was elected in the county, but the Democratic State ticket was successful, Ford being elected Governor.

1843.—A number of congressmen and county officers were to be elected this year. Mr. Stuart declining a re-nomination for Congress, John J. Hardin, who was afterwards killed at the battle of Buena Vista, Mexico, was nominated by the Whigs. He was opposed by James A. McDougal, on the part of the Democrats. Mr. Hardin was elected. Both parties placed full county tickets in the field, and a spirited canvass took place on the part of the friends of each. The Whig ticket was again successful, electing every officer by an average majority of 600.

1844.—A Presidential campaign is always more or less exciting, the desire for office being almost innate in the mind of every American citizen. Those in possession of the offices propose to retain them if in their power, while those out of office will ever make a fight for their possession. James K. Polk received the Democratic nomination for the Presidency, and Henry Clay that of the Whigs. It could not be expected the campaign would be as spirited as that of 1840. While some large meetings were held, there were none to compare with those of the previous campaign. The total vote was not so great as in 1840, it being three thousand two hundred and eight against three thousand two hundred and forty-nine. Henry Clay carried the county by a majority of four hundred and sixty-six. E. D. Baker was the Whig nominee for Congress, and John Calhoun that of the Democracy. Both gentlemen were talented, fine speakers, and afforded much satisfaction to their hearers in listening to their flights of eloquence. The Democratic rallying cry in this campaign was "54:40, or fight." The Democrats of Springfield, early in the campaign erected a hickory pole in front of the Register office, and the Democratic ladies of the city made and presented a magnificent flag to the Democratic Association, bearing upon its ample folds the names POLK AND DALLAS upon one side, on the other their watchword, "Texas and Oregon." The Whigs, at a much greater expense, raised an ash pole two hundred and fourteen feet high, in front of the Journal office, and from its lofty top flung to the breeze a banner with the names of CLAY AND FRELINGHUYSEN. On the day first appointed for the raising the city was crowded with delegates from all parts of the State, expecting a grand occasion for congratulation; but early in the attempt to raise the pole, the stay ropes of a derrick broke, killing a Mr. Brodie instantly, and badly crippling William Conant. In a moment of excitement, without proper examination, one of the speakers proclaimed to the crowd that the Democrats had cut the ropes and killed their friends. The evil one now seemed to possess the people, Democrats and Whigs alike, and the immense crowd swayed to and fro wild with wrath, while curses loud and deep sounded the tocsin of alarm. The editors of the Journal soon issued an extra, explaining the cause of the ropes breaking, exonerating everybody. This allayed the excitement. New ropes were afterwards secured and the pole went grandly up.

The following reminiscence of the tragic event enacted on the streets of Springfield, on the occasion of the first attempt at raising the ash-pole, written by an old settler, was published in the State Journal in the summer of 1881:

In the year 1844, during the Presidential campaign, the most intense excitement existed between the contending political factions in this State and city. Mass meetings were being held day and night in every precinct, and the orators of both parties, there being but two in the field—the Whig, headed by Clay and Frelinghuysen, and the Democrat, with Polk and Dallas as their candidates—vigorously advocating the claims of their respective party creeds and candidates. Each party vied with the other in creating the largest possible amount of enthusiasm, and often charges and counter-charges of foul play were indulged in. The Democrats had adopted the hickory as emblematic of their

whilst the ash was the favorite of the Whigs, as typical of the home of "Harry of the West," as the people fondly loved to call the Whig candidate for the Presidency, whose home was called Ashland. Some time in the month of July, 1844, the Democrats erected in front of the office of the State Register, then published by Walters & Weber, on Adams street near Fifth, a shellbark hickory pole one hundred and fifty feet in height, with the bark remaining intact. The Democrats were jubilant; and tar barrels, boxes and other combustibles were consumed on the public square, amidst speeches and songs and music by "Balling's Dutch Band." Balling will be remembered as the eccentric organist at the First Presbyterian Church.

The Whigs, not to be outdone in the matter of flag-staffs, procured the necessary spars of ash, and a large force of carpenters was at once set to work, under the direction of Mr. Henry Dresser, the architect. The work occupied several days, and the timbers were prepared on Sixth street near Washington.

At that time the old State House grounds were unfenced, and were filled with stones, which were being dressed for the porticoes of the building. Farmers hitched their teams amongst the stones, and the old pump near the north front of the building was in constant demand. A farmer had purchased some Spanish flies of P. C. Cannedy, and carelessly placed the package on top of the pump, whilst he procured a drink of water. The package slipped down the pump! The farmer was frightened, and slipped out of town without informing any one of the circumstance. Of course, and the workmen on the new pole, who drank freely of the water, were seriously affected by the poison, although no lives were lost. The pump was promptly locked by Mike McNamara, the State House janitor, and further trouble averted. At once there was a cry from a few foolish fellows, "The pump has been poisoned by the Democrats." This incident occurred about two weeks before the contemplated erection of the pole, and created the most intense excitement. Finally, the auspicious day arrived, August 3, 1844—thirty-seven years ago to-day—when the Whig pole was to be erected. The Journal office was in an old frame building on the east side of Sixth street, where Eldridge & Conant's furniture store now stands. Simeon Francis was the editor and publisher. South of the Journal office was the marble yard of Captain Adam Johnson. Opposite the Journal office, in the middle of the street, stood the market house and calaboose, or city prison. At a point south of the market house, and in the middle of the street, the foundation for the new pole had been prepared. This was of timbers and stone sunk twelve feet under ground. The pole was an octagon, dressed, jury-mast rigged, and stood 216 feet above the ground. A working derrick stood near the foot of the staff, which lay in a direction pointing toward the old Court House. A derrick mast eighty feet high stood near the east sidewalk, and was to bear the strain of the immense flag-staff as it was being erected. Captain Francis F. Sampson, a retired sea-captain, and Mr. John Brodie, a Scotchman fifty years old, and a stone mason, whose yard and residence was at the southeast corner of Third and Adams streets, were selected to rig the ropes and tackle of the derricks.

THE WATER WAS POISONED.

A preliminary test of the strength of the guy ropes attached to the derrick mast was made early in the morning, and under the strain the east guy rope broke twice, but the breaks were spliced, and the derrick caused to lean slightly to the east, thus throwing the strain on the west rope. A hitch occurred in the block at the top of the derrick, and Mr. Brodie went aloft to adjust it. Mr. William S. Conant, eldest son of Mr. Sullivan Conant, then an active lad of eighteen, went up to assist Mr. Brodie, and to carry up a rope sling, which had fallen from aloft, striking Mr. Charles Fisher, hurting him slightly. An immense throng of people had gathered from the city and surrounding country, and a company of Whig lads were just passing through Johnson's stone-yard from the Journal office, when a cry of horror went up from the crowd, "the derrick is falling," and the stentorian voice of "Old Rube Redford" was heard: "Jump for your lives." The writer of this was with the procession of lads and witnessed with horror which left a lasting impression upon his mind. Young Conant ran down the cleats a few feet, and then sprang into the air from a height fully sixty feet, in a northwesterly direction, falling with a sickening thud near the west sidewalk. Poor Brodie appeared paralyzed, and clung to the derrick, which in its fall crushed him to the earth a shapeless corpse. Young Conant was tenderly borne to the house of his father, on South Fifth street, accompanied by hundreds of sympathizing friends. Every physician in town was promptly on hand. Drs. Merriman, Cabanis, Todd, Helm, Wallace, Jayne, McNeil, Henry, Shields and Frazer were particularly prominent in the tender of their services. On examination it was found that the unfortunate youth had sustained the fracture of several ribs and a compound fracture of the right ankle, the bones piercing the flesh, and had actually been driven deep into the ground. Mr. Conant was confined to his bed for more than two months, but finally recovered with a lame ankle, which kept him on crutches for more than two years, and he is to this day lame in that foot, and at times suffers some pain. At one time it was thought necessary to amputate the foot, but by the skill of Drs. Merriman and Cabanis the member was saved. After the accident the cry went up that the Democrats had but honest men scouted the idea as atrocious. Then it was said that Mr. Brodie had accidentally cut the rope with a hatchet, but he had neither hatchet or knife with him. The facts were that the dense throng had crowded on to the west guy rope and had drawn the derrick from a perpendicular, and the strain was too much for the east guy rope, which had been already twice broken, and it again parted, causing the derrick to fall. The clubs of both political parties passed resolutions of sympathy for the unfortunate young man. Mr. E. B. Herndon, President of the Young Men's Democratic Club, exerted himself to render the patient every assistance possible. Mr. Lincoln was almost constantly by the sick bed, whilst such men as Colonel E. D. Baker, John C. Calhoun, Caleb Birchall, Robert Irwin, James H. Matheny, B. S. Edwards, W. P. Grimsley and many other prominent citizens of both parties cheerfully attended to the wants of the sick man. As soon as he was able to leave the house, Mr. Lincoln took young Conant to a Whig demonstration in Jacksonville, making the journey by easy stages in a carriage.

In 1849 Mr. Conant removed to Petersburg—entering into the furniture business. He still resides in that thriving suburban village, and devotes his time to his lovely Rose Hill Cemetery.

THE BEAUTIFUL ASH-POLE

was safely erected soon after the accident, and remained until after the election in November, when it was taken down, as fears of its safety from winter storms were entertained. A flag and a streamer 150 feet long floated from the staff. They were made by the ladies of the city and presented to the Whigs. The streamer, on which was inscribed the word "Union," was subsequently presented to Mr. Conant, and it is still in his possession, in a good state of preservation. An admirable campaign glee club, under the leadership of Mr. Robert Irwin, afforded the vocal music for the Whigs in that campaign, whilst "Jack" Hough was the leader of a brass band, in opposition to "Old Ball-ings."

1846.—T. M. Kilpatrick received the Whig nomination for Governor, and A. C. French was honored by the Democratic party for the same office. Before the people Mr. French was successful. Abraham Lincoln was placed in nomination for Congress by the Whigs of the Seventh District, and Peter Cartwright was his Democratic opponent. The Free Soil party, which was trying to force itself into notice, honored E. Wolcott with their votes. Lincoln and Cartwright made a thorough canvass of the district, which resulted in the election of Mr. Lincoln. Sangamon county, as usual, gave its vote to the Whig party, the entire county ticket being elected by an average majority of 500.

1848.—The first measure before the people was a vote on the new Constitution, which had been prepared by a convention elected for that purpose the previous year. The vote in this county was, for the Constitution, 1,817; against, 200. Zachary Taylor, the hero of Buena Vista, was placed in nomination for the Presidency, by the Whigs; Lewis Cass, the eminent Statesman of Michigan, by the Democrats; and Martin Van Buren, by the Free Soil party. For Congress, Stephen T. Logan, of Springfield, and Thomas L. Harris, of Petersburg, were the nominees of the Whig and Democratic parties, respectively. Mr. Harris was elected, but Mr. Logan carried this county by a majority of 263 votes. John T. Stuart was the Whig, and J. W. Barrett, the Democratic candidate for State Senator, Mr. Stuart receiving a majority of 327. But little interest was manifested in the campaign, comparatively, except for Congress, and the vote was less than in 1844, being less than 3,200. The Whig county ticket was again successful.

1850.—T. L. Harris, of Petersburg, was nominated by the Democrats for re-election to Congress, and was opposed by Richard Yates, the nominee of the Whigs. In this county but little interest was manifested, there being but a few county officers to be elected. Scarcely more than three-fourths of the vote was polled, the Whigs being again triumphant, electing all their officers, and giving Yates 336 majority for Congress.

1852.—The Whigs again placed in the field as their nominee for the Presidency, a military chieftain, one who in the war of 1812 and in the Mexican war, distinguished himself in a manner as to win the praise of the whole country—General Winfield Scott. He was confronted by Franklin Pierce, who, though ranking as General, was not considered the military hero as was General Scott. The Free Soil party, though having no hopes of electing their ticket, placed John P. Hale in the field as a candidate for the same office. For Governor, Joel A. Matteson was the Democratic candidate, and Edwin B. Webb the Whig, and Mr. Knowlton the Free Soil. The Whigs of the Nation, though having an excellent man as their standard-bearer, were discouraged, and in this campaign fought as though they had no hopes of success. In this county is found an exception to this fact. Here the canvass was quite spirited, each party placing their most popular men in the field for local offices. Richard Yates was re-nominated by his party for Congress, and was opposed by John Calhoun on the part of the Democrats. Mr. Yates was successful in the district, carrying Sangamon county by a majority of 780. The entire Whig county ticket was successful by increased majorities over 1850.

1853.—There were neither State or National offices to be filled this year, and but few county offices. The Democracy, for the first time in many years, succeeded in obtaining control of some of the county offices, electing their candidate for County Judge by a majority of 143, and the Treasurer by 65 votes. Noah W. Matheny, the Whig candidate for County Clerk, had 614 majority. The vote polled was very light, being only 2,244, against 3,723 in 1852. Notwithstanding the general unconcern of the people, there were evidences of the coming storm in the political world, and some uneasiness was shown by those having a true appreciation of the state of affairs. The secession leaven was already at work in the Southern States, and wise men were seeking to avert the calamity which was likely to overtake the Government.

1854.—New questions now arose growing out of the repeal of the Missouri Compromise and the passage of the Kansas-Nebraska bill. The Whig party, unable to recover from its defeat in 1852, had been slowly disintegrating and had almost ceased to exist. The Democratic party was divided on the new issues. For some years a new party had been struggling for an existence, based on questions of nationality, and known as the American or Know Nothing party. In the Southern States it had made considerable progress, absorbing the greater number of members of the Whig party. In the North it had also quite a large membership, and if the issues attending the repeal of the Missouri Compromise had not been suddenly thrust upon the people, the new party would have been become a very important factor in the politics of the country, if it had not obtained control of the Government. Early in the year, Judge Douglas introduced a bill into Congress and supported it on the ground that it was simply an assertion of the great principle of the right of the people to govern themselves. This bill is known as the Kansas-Nebraska bill. In 1820, on the admission of the State of Missouri into the Union, a bill was passed by Congress known as the Missouri Compromise, and which prohibited slavery in any Territory north of thirty-six degrees, and thirty minutes, north latitude, permitting its existence south of that line. By the passage of the Kansas-Nebraska bill, this compromise measure would be repealed, and the territories north of the line mentioned would be thrown open to slavery. The question was thoroughly agitated in and out of Congress, those favoring the bill claiming it was an act of justice to the people and would forever settle the question of slavery by relegating it to the people of the other territories, who alone were directly interested in it. If they desired slavery they could have it; if not, they could prohibit it by law. The opponents of this bill contended its provisions were alone favorable to friends of slavery, that as long as any part of the country had territorial existence, or under territorial government it could not prohibit slavery; it was only on its admission as a State that it could say whether or not it would have slavery.

The bill was passed but the agitation did not cease, but rather increased. As representing the views of the opponents of the bill, the following preamble and resolutions, passed at a meeting in Alton, are given:

"WHEREAS, A great wrong has been done to the people of the free States of the Union, by the recent action of Congress in the passage of the Kansas-Nebraska bill, thereby repealing so much of the Missouri Compromise Act of March 3, 1820, as forever prohibits 'slavery and involuntary servitude, otherwise than in the punishment of crimes, whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, in all that territory ceded to the United States by France, under the name of Louisiana, which lies north of thirty-six degrees thirty minutes north latitude, not included in the limits of the State of Missouri; and by such repeal opening all that vast region of country, long consecrated to freedom, to the admission of human slavery, in disregard of a solemn compact entered into upwards of thirty-four years ago, between the free and slave-holding States, and during all that time quietly acquiesced in and sacredly observed by the parties to the same; therefore, be it

Resolved, That negro slavery, as existing in any of the States of the Union, is not a domestic institution only, but is a political institution, in which, as such, the free and slaveholding States are alike interested; and this must ever be the case so long as the slaves are counted as they now are, in the apportionment of the representatives in Congress—the loss of power in the former being in the same ratio with the gain to the latter.

Resolved, That the Kansas-Nebraska bill, now the organic law of these Territories, permits the introduction of slavery into them, but gives the people no power to exclude it during the existence of the territorial form of government, and instead of favoring popular sovereignty, virtually denies its exercise; and thus the rejection of the amendment offered in its passage, distinctly conferring the right on the people to admit or exclude slavery, abundantly proves, and the doctrine of non-intervention, so loudly proclaimed in its advocacy, has been studiously excluded, and this law is praised for what it does not contain.

Resolved, That fidelity to the cause of African slavery, at this time regarded in certain quarters as an indispensable test of Democracy, is not so held by us; that free America is unworthily employed in forging shackles for the unoffending inmates of the house of bondage.

Resolved, That Stephen A. Douglas and James Shields, our Senators in Congress, have, by voting for the passage of the Kansas-Nebraska bill, betrayed the trusts reposed in them, acted in total disregard of the interests of this State and of the whole Union, forfeited the confidence of the people, and deserve, as they doubtless will receive, the condemnation of all upright and fair-minded men. Their course on this subject has been taken on their own responsibility, and can receive no palliation from the sham indorsement of their pliant tools in our legislature.

Resolved, That in this matter we will know no party other than the one opposed to the great wrong which has been perpetrated upon us in the passage of this bill; and will vote at the ensuing election for no person to represent us in the General Assembly, who is not known to be opposed to this measure, and opposed to the appointment to office of those who have voted in its favor.

Resolved, That we hail as the truest and most efficient effort to secure the privileges of 'life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness,' to the people of the Territories of Kansas and Nebraska, the movement to people those Territories with free men; and further,

Resolved, That we will co-operate with the friends of freedom at a distance, for the purpose of facilitating the transit of emigrants to those Territories."

Although there was but a single State officer to be elected this year, the canvass was spirited in consequence of the excitement attending the passage of the Kansas-Nebraska bill. The Democratic State Convention endorsed the action of their representatives in the passage of this bill, and endorsed the measure as a righteous and just one. The opposition rallied under the banner of "Anti-Nebraska," the conventions being usually called of those opposed to the bill, though sometimes they took the name of "People's Conventions."

On the adjournment of Congress, Judge Douglas came home and at once took the stump in advocacy of the measure. He was opposed by Abraham Lincoln, who even then was recognized as the leader of the opposition. Joint debates were held by these men in several places, and their power was generally conceded. A legislature was to be elected that should choose a United States Senator in place of James Shields, whose term would expire March, 1855. The issues were sharply defined. The doctrine affirmed in the Kansas-Nebraska bill was to be approved or condemned. The Whigs almost unanimously took ground against the bill and formed the nucleus of the new party, being reinforced by many Anti-Slavery or Free-Soil Democrats. Still there was no real union formed. In places where the Whigs were in the majority, or formed a powerful minority, they nominated a Whig candidate for the legislature, who was generally supported by the Anti-Nebraska Democrats. Where the Free-Soil Democrats were numerous enough they nominated a candidate, who was acceptable to and received the general support of the Whigs. The result of the election was the success of the opposition to the regular Democracy.

In this county, under name of the People's Party, the opposition united, defeating the regular Democrats and electing their entire ticket.

Abraham Lincoln and Stephen T. Logan were elected members of the legislature. The Assembly was pretty evenly divided; a few Anti-Nebraska Democrats holding the balance of power. Mr. Lincoln was a prominent candidate for the United States Senate. Believing his chance of election good, with the aid of the Anti-Nebraska Democrats, and thinking he could work to a better advantage among these if not himself a member of the Assembly, he refused to qualify, and a special election was called to fill the vacancy. Norman M. Broadwell was nominated by the opposition to the regular Democracy, and they having a large majority in the county, it was intimated that no ticket would be run by the latter. The day of the election came round. In the meantime, the Democratic leaders conferred together, and agreed to place in nomination Jonathan McDaniel, an estimable farmer, living in the northeast part of the county, and provided themselves with tickets, which they distributed quietly among the faithful, with instructions to as quietly vote it. The Whigs, Americans and Anti-Nebraska Democrats knew nothing whatever of this matter until about three o'clock in the afternoon—too late to be of benefit to them. The Democrats polled almost their full vote, while that of the opposition was light, as they imagined they had a clear field. Mr. McDaniel was elected.

This was a severe blow to the opposition endangering their ascendancy in the coming legislature, and subjecting the local leaders to a deal of joke and ridicule, on the part of their Democratic opponents, who had been so successful in the adoption of "know-nothing" tactics. Considering the genial, amiable character of Mr. Lincoln, who was the chief sufferer by the "fusion" defeat, on the morning following the election, he met Mr. Lanphier, of the State Register, on the street, and with that peculiar wriggle of the body when he had a joke to recount, he called out: "Charlie, do you remember Montecue Morris?" "Oh, yes, very well," said Lanphier. "Well," said Mr. Lincoln, "Montecue was a private in Mr. Baker's regiment in the Mexican war. The regiment was lying on the Rio Grande, Governor Moore, in command, Baker having gone to Washington to get the boys some new clothes. By some means a few of the boys had got possession of a barrel of cider, and setting it up in their tent, were selling it out at twenty cents a drink, and were doing a land office business, when Morris applied to Governor Moore for permission to move his tent, which was granted, and the tent was backed up against the one which had been improvised as a 'grocery,' whereupon Morris tapped the other end of the cider barrel, and peddled the liquor from his tent for ten cents a drink, and got away with a good deal of it before detected. That is the way you fellows served us yesterday. You beat our 'know-nothing' allies at their own game." Turning away, he remarked, with a wriggle: "It is very funny, is this election result, but, Charlie, it hurts."

1855.—The opposition this year generally assumed the name Republican, a name adopted in a few States the year previous. The first great fight of the year was in the General Assembly on the election of United States Senator. James Shields was the candidate of the regular Democracy, Abraham Lincoln of the Whigs, and Lyman Trumbull of the Anti-Nebraska Democrats. While the Whigs were Anti-Nebraska in their views, Mr. Lincoln could not rally to his support the Anti-Nebraska Democrats. The two houses of the Assembly met in joint session Thursday, February 8, and proceeded to ballot. The first ballot resulted as follows: James Shields, 41; Abraham Lincoln, 44; Lyman Trumbull, 5; William Kellogg, 2; G. A. Koerner, 2; Cyrus Edwards, Joel A. Matteson, O. B. Ficklin, William B. Ogden and William A. Deming, one each. The second ballot resulted the same as the first. Nine ballots were taken without a choice, the Anti-Nebraska Democrats holding the balance of power and voting regularly for Lyman Trumbull. Mr. Lincoln, realizing the hopelessness of the contest, urged his friends to vote for Trumbull. The tenth ballot was then taken, resulting in the election of Trumbull by the following vote: Lyman Trumbull, 50; Joel A. Matteson, 47; Archibald Williams, 1. The last vote was cast by Louis H. Waters, of McDonough county.

The only election held this year was in May, for a Judge of the Supreme Court. In this contest politics were not taken into consideration. Stephen T. Logan and O. C. Skinner were the candidates. The vote in this county stood as follows: Skinner, 2,518; Logan, 1,420. At the same time an election was held on the question of a "Maine law," resulting as follows: For the law, 1,745; against, 2,349.

Yours Truly
Preston Breckenridge

During the year there was trouble in Kansas growing out of the slavery question, there being an immense emigration to the State from the North and from the South. Emigrants from the South were intent on fastening slavery upon the territory, which effort was furiously resisted by the free State men. Blood was spilt upon many occasions, and the excitement was kept at fever heat for many long months. Nor was the excitement confined to the territory, but the question was taken up and discussed in every State in the Union. By its opponents, the trouble was all charged to the repeal of the Missouri Compromise and the passage of the now celebrated Kansas-Nebraska bill. The trouble did not cease with the expiration of the year.

1856.—Former issues dividing the political parties had disappeared, and new issues were being rapidly formed. The Whig party had ceased to exist, and on its ruins had been erected two other parties, one having for its central truth opposition to the further extension of slavery, and the other that American-born citizens must rule America. These parties had, of course, absorbed many of the members of the old Democratic party. The American party, not being opposed to slavery, or, at least, making no opposition to it, either in the States in which it existed, or the newly formed Territories, where it had been made subject to admission by the repeal of the Missouri Compromise, had become a numerous body in the South, with many adherents in the North. The Republican party, basing its claims for popular suffrage upon its advocacy of freedom in the Territories, was not permitted an existence in the Southern States, and of necessity was confined to the North.

Early in the year, the American party met in National Convention at Philadelphia, and placed in nomination for the Presidency and Vice Presidency, Millard Fillmore, of New York, and Andrew Jackson Donelson, of Tennessee. Subsequently, James Buchanan, of Pennsylvania, and John J. Breckenridge, of Kentucky, were placed in nomination by the Democracy for the same offices. The Republicans gave to the people John C. Fremont, of California, and William L. Dayton, of New Jersey, as their candidates for the Presidency and Vice Presidency. The campaign throughout the State and Nation was an exciting one, the three parties being represented in all the Northern States by electoral tickets, and the Republican in two or three Southern, in addition to the Northern ones. In the State campaign William H. Bissell was placed in nomination by the Republicans, William A. Richardson by the Democrats, and Buckner S. Morris by the Americans, for the office of Governor. In Sangamon county, the Republicans and Americans united on county officers, electing all their nominees but one—the Circuit Clerk.

The citizens of Sangamon county, being largely from the Southern States, did not spontaneously enter into the Republican movement. Many old Whigs at once drifted into the Democratic party, making up the loss of its members who had, on account of the slavery question and the foreign element, united with the newly-organized Republican and American parties.

1857.—The year following a Presidential election is generally a dull one, politically; the people being disposed to give the new administration fair play, and waiting to see its policy developed.

Only county officers were to be elected; consequently the campaign was more personal than political. It now seemed to be conceded the political fight was hereafter to be between the Republicans and the Democrats. The nominee of the former party for the Presidency the previous year receiving a majority of the popular vote, though not elected, inspired the party to new zeal, and caused the latter to direct all its efforts against it. The American party, especially in the North, was daily losing ground; its members forsaking it for the Democratic or Republican parties, as their views of public policy inspired them. In Sangamon county, so far as political action could be said to enter into the campaign this year, was between the Republicans and Democrats; the latter electing their entire ticket, save County Clerk, the personal popularity of Noah W. Matheny enabling him to be successful by a large majority.

1858.—The attempt to fasten upon the people of Kansas, a Constitution known as the Lecompton Constitution, by the Pro-Slavery men of that State, assisted by the Buchanan administration, caused a division in the ranks of the Democratic party, throughout the Union. Especially was this great wrong resisted by the great majority of the party in this State, led by Stephen A. Douglas. The senatorial term of Mr. Douglas would expire March, 1859, and a legislature was to be elected who should choose his successor. Mr. Douglas was a candidate for re-election. By general consent, Abraham Lincoln was chosen by the Republicans as his opponent. Sidney Breese was likewise announced as a candidate by that portion of the Democratic party favorable to the administration in its contest over the Lecompton Constitution.

On the 21st of April, pursuant to a call issued by Alexander Starne, of Springfield, Chairman of the Democratic State General Committee, representatives of the Democratic party met in convention at the State House in Springfield, for the purpose of nominating candidates for State officers, to be elected the following November. The Buchanan wing of the party met in the Senate chamber and was called to order by John Dougherty, of Union county, who read the call of the General Committee. Dr. Le Roy, of Grundy, was made Chairman. Returning thanks for the honor conferred, the Doctor then said:

"The enthusiasm you manifest is satisfactory evidence that the National Democratic party 'still lives' in Illinois, and although a few may falter, still the hard-fisted Democracy are sound to the core; and in November next they will speak in thunder tones to the factionists and disorganizers, who would ruthlessly divide and defeat us, to please man worshipers at home or abroad. As to him who has heretofore led us to victory, but for ambitious aims, now sides with the enemy, all we have to say for him is—

"Slowly and sally we lay him down,
From the field of his fame fresh and glory.
We carve not a line, we raise not a stone,
But leave him alone in his glory."

Colonel Dougherty being called upon for a speech said that for the first time in many years the party was called upon to face division in its own ranks, but they must not swerve from their principles even if opposed by those who should be their proudest defenders. The principles of the Democratic party were the same as for thirty years, and one of the cardinal of these was the rights of each and any State or any Territory to mould the institution under which they are to live. He ridiculed the idea that the Lecompton Constitution was the result of fraud and charged the Douglas Democrats with having asserted there was no foundation for any such claims.

The committee on resolutions reported a platform embracing substantially the following points: 1. Adherence to the Cincinnati platform and the principles enunciated therein. 2. The Territories being common property, every citizen of the Union had a right to dwell therein, and have with him any property he may possess, including slaves. 3. A Territory applying for admission to the Union, having the requisite number of inhabitants, and having adopted a Constitution, Republican in form, should be admitted, with or without slavery, as the people of the Territory may determine. 4. Endorsement of a portion of a speech of Senator Douglas, declaring that if any citizens of Kansas should refrain from voting for Constitutional delegates, and a Constitution should be adopted repugnant to their feelings, they alone should be to blame. 5. Resolution condemning the course of Senator Douglas in opposing the National Administration and apparently affiliating with the Republican party. 6. Laudatory of President Buchanan in his course with reference to Kansas affairs. 7. Greeting to Democratic Conventions in other States. 8. Thanking that portion of the Press of the State that had sustained the President's course.

No nominations were made, and the convention adjourned to meet June 8.

The Douglas wing of the party met in the Representatives Hall of the State House, and was called to order by A. Starne, Chairman of the General State Committee. This convention was more numerous attended, having delegates from every county in the State. John Moore was made Chairman. The committee on resolutions subsequently appointed, made the following report, which was unanimously adopted:

"Resolved, That the Democratic party of the State of Illinois, through their delegates in general convention assembled, do re-assert and declare the principles avowed by them when, on former occasions they have presented their candidates for popular suffrage.

"Resolved, That they are unalterably attached to, and will maintain inviolate, the principles maintained by the National Convention at Cincinnati, in June, 1856.

"Resolved, That the platform of principles established by the National Democratic Convention, at Cincinnati, is the only authoritative exposition of Democratic doctrines, and we deny the right of any power on earth, except a like body, to change or interpolate that platform, or to prescribe new and different tests, that they will neither do it themselves or permit it to be done by others; but will recognize all men as Democrats who stand by and uphold Democratic principles.

"Resolved, That in the organization of States the people have a right to decide at the polls upon the character of their fundamental law, and that the experience of the past year has conclusively demonstrated the wisdom and propriety of the principle that the fundamental law under which a Territory seeks admission into the Union should be submitted to the people of such Territory for their ratification or rejection at a fair election, to be held for that purpose, and that before such Territory is admitted as a State such fundamental laws should receive a majority of the legal votes cast at such election; and they deny the right and condemn the attempts of any convention called for the purpose of framing such a constitution to impose the instrument formed by them upon the people against their known will.

Resolved, That a fair application of those principles requires that the Lecompton Constitution should be submitted to a direct vote of the actual inhabitants of Kansas, so that they may vote for or against that instrument, before Kansas shall be declared one of the States of the Union, and that until it shall be ratified by the people of Kansas at a fair election, held for that purpose, the Illinois Democracy are unalterably opposed to the admission of Kansas under that constitution.

Resolved, That we heartily approve and sustain the manly, firm, patriotic and Democratic position of Stephen A. Douglas, Isaac N. Morris, Thomas L. Harris, Aaron Shaw, Robert Smith and Samuel S. Marshall, the Democratic delegation of Illinois in Congress, upon the question of the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton Constitution, and that by their firm and uncompromising devotion to Democratic principles, and to the cause of justice, truth, right and the people, they have deserved our admiration and increased, if possible, our confidence in their integrity and patriotism, and merited our warm approbation, our sincere and hearty thanks, and shall receive our earnest support.

Resolved, That in all things, whenever the National administration sustain and carry out the principles of the Democratic party, as expressed in the Cincinnati platform and affirmed in their resolutions, it is entitled to and will receive our hearty support."

The administration, even at this early date, had began a system of removals from office of all opposed to its policy. In view of this fact, Judge Drummond, of Chicago, introduced the following resolution:

Resolved, That this convention view with regret the course pursued by the present Administration in removing good men from office for the expression of opinion upon any given proposition."

The resolution was promptly tabled, thus showing the conservative character of those assembled, and their desire to preserve harmony as far as possible.

W. B. Fondest, of Sangamon county, was nominated for State Treasurer, and J. P. Brooks, of Knox county, for Superintendent of Public Schools.

The Administration Democrats again met in convention pursuant to adjournment, June 9, and re-affirming their former declarations they nominated John Dougherty, of Union county, for State Treasurer, and John Reynolds, of St. Clair, for Superintendent of Public Schools.

The Republican State Convention met in Springfield June 16, and was largely represented. The following is the report of the Committee on Resolutions, and submitted as their "declaration of principles:"

"We, the Republicans of Illinois, in convention assembled, in addition to our previous affirmations, make the following declaration of principles:

"1. We re-affirm our devotion to the Constitution of the country and to the Union of the States, and will firmly and steadily resist all attempts for the perversion of the one, or the disruption of the other. We recognize the equal rights of all the States, and avow our readiness and willingness to maintain them, and disclaim all intention of attempting, either directly or indirectly, to assail or abridge the rights of any of the members of the Confederacy, guaranteed by the Constitution, or in any manner to interfere with the institution of slavery in any State where it exists. Nevertheless, we hold this Government was instituted for freemen, and that it can be perpetuated and made to fulfill the purposes of its organization only by devoting itself to the promotion of virtue and intelligence among its citizens, and the advancement of their prosperity and happiness, and to these ends we hold it to be the duty of the Government so to reform the system of disposing of the public lands as to secure the soil to actual settlers, and wrest it from the grasp of men who speculate in the homes of the people, and to corporations that lock it up in dead hands for enhanced profits.

"2. Free labor being the only true support of Republican institutions, our Government should maintain its rights, and we therefore demand the improvement of our harbors and rivers, which freight the commerce of the West to market, and the construction of a central highway to connect our trade with the Pacific States as rightful encouragement to home industry; and inasmuch as we now compete in the markets of the country against the products of unpaid labor at depreciating prices, it is therefore eminently unjust that the National Administration should attempt, by coercion, to extend a servile system in the Territories, or by patronage, to perpetuate slavery in the States.

"3. The present administration has proven recreant to the trusts committed to its hands, and by its extraordinary, corrupt, unjust and undignified exertions, to give effect to the original intention and purposes of the Kansas-Nebraska bill, by forcing upon the people of Kansas, against their will, and in defiance of their known and earnestly expressed wishes, a constitution recognizing slavery as one of their domestic institutions, it has forfeited all claim to the support and confidence of the friends of free men, free labor, and equal rights.

"4. It is the duty of the Government, faithfully and diligently to execute all our treaty stipulations, and to enforce all our laws for the suppression of the slave trade.

"5. That while we deprecate all interference on the part of political organizations with the action of the judiciary, if such action is limited to appropriate sphere, yet we cannot refrain from expressing our condemnation of the principles and tendencies of the extra-judicial opinions of a majority of the Judges of the Supreme Court of the United States, in the matter of Dred Scott, wherein the political heresy is put forth, that the Federal Constitution extends slavery into all the Territories of the Republic, and so maintains it, that neither Congress, nor the people, through their Territorial legislatures, can by law abolish it; we hold that Congress has sovereign power over the Territories, and has the right to govern and control them whilst they remain in a territorial condition, and that it is the duty of the General Government to protect the Territories from the curse of slavery, and to preserve the public domain for the occupation of free men and free labor, and we declare that no power on earth can carry and maintain slavery in the States against the will of their people and the provisions of their constitutions and laws; and we fully indorse the decision of the Supreme Court of our own State, which declares that property in persons is repugnant to the constitution and laws of Illinois, and that all persons within its jurisdiction are presumed to be free, and that slavery, where it exists, is a municipal regulation, without any extra territorial operation.

"6. The policy of this Government should be to live on terms of peace and amity with all the nations of the earth, so far as it can be done consistently with our National honor and interests; and to enter into entangling alliances with none. Our intercourse with all other nations should be conducted upon principles of exact and exalted justice, and, whilst firmly maintaining our own rights, we should carefully avoid any invasion of the rights of others, and especially those of weaker nations: Our commerce ought to be protected from wanton interruption, and our commercial marine from invasion and search; and, whilst we would deplore the necessity of war with any of the nations of the earth, we will still firmly, zealously, and patriotically sustain the Government in any just measures which it may adopt to obtain redress for injuries and indignities which may heretofore have been inflicted upon our citizens navigating the seas, or which may be necessary to secure them against a repetition of like injuries in the future."

James Miller was nominated for State Treasurer, by acclamation, and Newton Bateman for State Superintendent of Public Instruction. After the nomination of the candidates and the adoption of their declaration of principles, the Convention passed the following resolution, amidst shouts of applause:

"Resolved, That Abraham Lincoln is the first and only choice of the Republicans of Illinois, for the United States Senate, as the successor to Stephen A. Douglas."

In the evening, Mr. Lincoln was called upon to address the Convention, which he did in his own peculiar, happy style. In that speech he reaffirmed the doctrine that "a house divided against itself cannot stand," applying it to the divided state of the country upon the slavery question. In thus giving expression to this thought, many Republicans thought Mr. Lincoln had injured his own cause and that of the party.

On the 24th day of July, Mr. Lincoln addressed a challenge to Mr. Douglas for a joint debate during the campaign. In consequence of previous appointments, Mr. Douglas declined meeting him on all occasions during the campaign, but suggested one meeting in each Congressional District. The arrangement was made, and seven joint discussions were held. No political debate, before or since, ever created such an interest, and it is doubtful if they have ever been equaled. They were printed and circulated as campaign documents in several States, and were ever quoted as authoritative exposition of the political questions of the day, from the standpoints of the respective speakers and the party represented by each. The interest manifested in this campaign by the people of Illinois was equal to that of a Presidential campaign; nor was the interest alone confined to the State, but all over the Union, men were observing the contest with an eagerness never before manifested in a State election. It was the preliminary skirmish preceding the great battle for the Presidency in 1860. To the people of Sangamon county, this campaign was of special interest. One of the senatorial candidates was a citizen of this county, and had developed from the backwoods surveyor to the statesman with a National reputation, an orator of great ability, and one who was rapidly taking a position among the leading men of the Nation; the other had been a citizen for several years; was then a leader of a great party, with a personal following equaled by no American statesman save Henry Clay; a prominent candidate for the Presidency, and who was known as the "Little Giant." Lincoln, in Sangamon county, was doubtless the favorite, as he was daily brought face to face with the people, and with his great heart succeeded in winning their love.

On Saturday, prior to the annual election, the Republicans had announced a last grand rally at Springfield, to be addressed by Lincoln and others. The weather during the week was unpropitious, the rain having fallen almost incessantly, but still the crowd came, one train of thirty-two cars coming from McLean and Tazewell counties.

Speaking in reference to this debate, in an address before the State Bar Association, January 7, 1881, Isaac N. Arnold says:

"The two most prominent men in Illinois, at that time, were Douglas and Lincoln. Each was in the full maturity of his powers, Douglas being forty-five and Lincoln forty-nine years old. Douglas had for years been trained on the stump, in the lower house of Congress, and in the Senate, to meet in debate the ablest speakers in the State and Nation. For years he had been accustomed, on the floor of the capitol, to encounter the leaders of the old Whig and Free-Soil parties. Among them were Seward, and Fessenden, and Crittenden, and Chase, and Trumbull, and Hale, and Sumner, and others, equally eminent, and his enthusiastic friends insisted that never, either in single conflict or when receiving the assault of a whole party, had he been discomfited. His style was bold, vigorous and aggressive, and at times defiant. He was ready, fertile in resources, familiar with political history, terrible in denunciation, and handled with skill all the weapons of debate. His iron will, restless energy, united with great personal magnetism, made him very popular; and with these qualities he had indomitable physical and moral courage, and his almost uniform success had given him perfect confidence in himself.

"Lincoln was also a thoroughly trained speaker. He had contended successfully, year after year, at the bar and on the stump, with the ablest men of Illinois, including Lamborn, Logan, John Calhoun and others, and had often met Douglas himself—a conflict with whom he always rather courted than shunned. Indeed, these two great orators had often tested each other's power, and whenever they did meet, it was, indeed, 'Greek meeting Greek,' and the 'tug of war' came, for each put forth his utmost strength.

"In a speech of Mr. Lincoln in 1856, he made the following beautiful, eloquent, and generous allusion to Douglas. He said: 'Twenty years ago, Judge Douglas and I first became acquainted; we were both young then, he, a trifle younger than I. Even then, we were both ambitious, I, perhaps, quite as much as he. With me, the race of ambition has been a failure. With him, it has been a splendid success. His name fills the Nation, and it is not unknown in foreign lands. I affect no contempt for the high eminence he has reached; so reached that the oppressed of my species might have shared with me in the elevation, I would rather stand on that eminence than wear the richest crown that ever pressed a monarch's brow.'

"We know, and the world knows, that Lincoln did reach that high, nay far higher eminence, and that he did reach it, in such a way that 'the oppressed' did share with him in the elevation.

"Such were the champions who, in 1858, were to discuss before the voters of Illinois, and with the whole Nation as spectators, the political questions then pending, and especially the vital questions relating to slavery. It was not a single combat, but extended through a whole campaign, and the American people paused to watch its progress, and hung, with intense interest, upon every movement of the champions. Each of these great men, I doubt not, at that time, sincerely believed he was right. Douglas' ardor, while in such a conflict, would make him think, for the time being, he was right, and I know that Lincoln argued for freedom against the extension of slavery, with the most profound conviction that, on success, hung the fate of his country. Lincoln had two advantages over

Douglas; he had the best side of the question, and the best temper. He was always good humored, always had an apt story for illustration, while Douglas, sometimes, when hard pressed, was irritable.

"Douglas carried away the most popular applause, but Lincoln made the deeper and more lasting impression. Douglas did not disdain an immediate ad captandum triumph, while Lincoln aimed at permanent conviction. Sometimes, when Lincoln's friends urged him to raise a storm of applause, which he could always do, by his happy illustrations and amusing stories, he refused, saying the occasion was too serious, the issue too grave. 'I do not seek applause,' said he, 'nor to amuse the people, I want to convince them.'

"It was often observed during this canvass, that, while Douglas was sometimes greeted with the loudest cheers, when Lincoln closed the people seemed solemn and serious, and could be heard, all through the crowd, gravely and anxiously discussing the topics on which he had been speaking.

"Douglas, by means of a favorable apportionment, succeeded in securing a majority of the legislature, but a majority of the vote was with Lincoln. These debates made Douglas Senator, and Lincoln President. There was something magnetic, something almost heroic, in the gallantry with which Douglas threw himself into this canvass, and dealt his blows right and left, against the Republican party on one side, and Buchanan's administration, which sought his defeat, on the other. The Federal patronage was used, by the unscrupulous Slidell, against Douglas—but in vain; a few were seduced, but the mass of the Democratic party, with honorable fidelity, stood by him. This canvass of Douglas, and his personal and immediate triumph, in being returned to the Senate, over the combined opposition of the Republican party, led by Lincoln and Trumbull, and the administration, with all its patronage, is, I think, the most brilliant personal triumph in American politics. If we look into English struggles on the hustings for its parallel, we find something with which to compare it, in the late triumph of Mr. Gladstone. If we seek its counterpart in military history, we must look into some of the earlier campaigns of Napoleon, or that in which Grant captured Vicksburg.

"Douglas secured the immediate object of the struggle, but the manly bearing, the vigorous logic, the honesty and sincerity, the great intellectual powers exhibited by Mr. Lincoln, prepared the way, and two years later secured his nomination and election to the Presidency. It is a touching incident, illustrating the patriotism of both these statesmen, that, widely as they had differed, and keen as had been their rivalry, just as soon as the life of the Republic was menaced by treason, they joined hands to shield and save the country they loved."

1859.—A member of Congress and county officers were to be elected this year. While no such interest was manifested as in the year previous, still it could not be said the campaign was a listless one. The trouble growing out of the repeal of the Missouri Compromise, and the consequent re-opening of the slavery question, was still the theme upon the lips of everyone. The Southern States, becoming alarmed at the rapid growth of the Republican party, were already threatening secession in case of the success of that party in a National contest. The breach between Douglas and his followers and the Southern Democracy was widening daily, though many in each wing of the party hoped against hope that all differences would be settled prior to the great campaign of 1860. The American party was being slowly dissolved, and a new party was being formed, composed of many of its members, and known as the Union party. Like the American party, its greatest strength was in the South.

John A. McClernand was the Democratic nominee for Congress in this District, and John M. Palmer the Republican. Both were strong men. McClernand was the successful candidate. In this county his majority was 401 out of a total vote of 5,233. For county officers only Republicans and Douglas Democrats were nominated, the latter being successful in every instance.

1860.—The political campaign of 1860 has never had its parallel in the history of this Government. There seemed to be no cessation in the political excitement began in 1858, culminating in the election of Stephen A. Douglas to the United States Senate, and which placed Abraham Lincoln in the front rank as a political speaker and debater, worthy the attention of the greatest statesmen in the land. Defeated for the Senate, Mr. Lincoln's name was prominently mentioned in connection with the Presidency. In 1859 the newspapers of the Eastern States, especially in New England, favorably spoke of him as a candidate for either the first or second place on the ticket. Prior to this, several Western journals had placed his name at the head of their columns, and "Honest Old Abe" was praised and said to be the only man that would surely lead the party to victory. Early in January the Republican Club, of Springfield, was changed into a "Lincoln Club," and resolved to use every honorable means to secure his nomination for the Presidency. The State Journal, under date of January 18, 1860, says of Mr. Lincoln's candidacy:

"As a matter of National policy, we believe that the next President of the United States should come from the Western States, and no State is more deserving of the honor of sending forth the Republican champion for that high office than that one which has been the great political battle-ground of the country for the last four years. * * * * Abraham Lincoln has arrived at that period of life when man's mental and physical faculties are in their prime. God gave him a mind of unusual strength, and time and labor and study have made him one of the great men of the land. The purity of his patriotism, his incorruptible integrity, and his ability to sustain himself and the country in any position in which he is placed, no one who knows him can for a moment doubt. The people of Illinois are justified in their determination to place the name of their distinguished citizen before the country for the highest honors in the Nation's gift. They do it because they know him; because they have confidence in him as a man for the times; because with him in the Presidential chair the rights of the people of all the States will be secured, respected and maintained; because he interprets the constitution as did our fathers, who made it and illustrated it in their acts; because he is a conservative National Republican. The Great West will give a telling vote at the next Presidential election, and the candidacy of Abraham Lincoln will secure that vote for the Republicans beyond controversy. With him as our standard bearer, we are sure of all the Northwestern States, except Missouri, and the Republicans of other States could not cast their votes for a worthier, or abler, or more available man. The enthusiasm which his name excites all over the country, since his powerful and most eloquent vindication of the great Republican cause in this State, shows that he has become the Nation's man and a tower of strength to the party whose leader he is now regarded. The Republicans of Illinois will sustain and support with their full strength the Presidential nominee of the Chicago Convention, whoever he may be; but they respectfully, yet earnestly, call upon the Republicans of the Union to weigh the claims, estimate the qualifications and availability, and consider the fitness and propriety of giving the nomination to Abraham Lincoln, of Illinois."

As the time drew near for the meeting of the Republican National Convention at Chicago, Mr. Lincoln's popularity increased. The friends of every Presidential candidate desired he should have the second place on the ticket with their favorite, and he was acknowledged second choice of all for the first place. The State Republican Convention, held at Decatur in May, passed the following resolution:

"Resolved, That Abraham Lincoln is the choice of the Republican party of Illinois for the Presidency, and the delegates from this State are instructed to use all honorable means to secure his nomination by the Chicago Convention, and to vote for him as a unit."

An incident occurred at this convention worthy of mention. Mr. Lincoln was invited to take a seat upon the platform. He had hardly done so, amid the wildest enthusiasm, when Mr. Oglesby, of Decatur, announced to the delegates that an old Democrat of Macon county, who had grown gray in the service of that party, desired to make a contribution to the convention, and the offer being accepted, forthwith two old-time fence rails, decorated with flags and streamers, were borne through the crowd into the convention, bearing the inscription:

ABRAHAM LINCOLN,
The Rail Candidate
FOR PRESIDENT IN 1860.

Two rails from a lot of three thousand made in 1830 by Thomas Hanks and Abraham Lincoln—whose father was the first pioneer of Macon county.

The effect was electrical. One spontaneous burst of applause went up from all parts of the "wigwam," which grew more and more deafening as it was prolonged, and which did not wholly subside for some minutes. Of course "Old Abe" was called out, and made an explanation of the matter. He stated that some thirty years previous, he stopped with his mother's family for one season in what is now Macon county; that he built a cabin, split rails and cultivated a small farm down there. These rails, he was informed, were taken from the fence around that farm, but whether they were or not, he had maulled many and better ones since he had grown to manhood. The cheers were renewed when he had finished his remarks, and doubtless many persons present contrasted the present position of the noble, self-taught, self-made statesman and patriot, whose name was mentioned in connection with the highest office in the gift of the people, with that of the humble rail-splitter of thirty years previous.

In the Chicago Convention it was plain to see who was the favorite of the lookers-on. Every mention of Lincoln's name was received with cheer after cheer. Three ballots were taken, Mr. Lincoln receiving a majority of the whole votes, and was made the unanimous choice of the convention amidst the most intense enthusiasm. Hannibal Hamlin, of Maine, was selected as the candidate for Vice President.

As may well be supposed the result of the nomination was hailed with delight by the nominee's old friends and neighbors. They crowded around him, shook him warmly by the hand, and congratulated him on his success. Cannons were fired, speeches made, and a general time of rejoicing was indulged in.

While the Republicans of Illinois were so active in behalf of their favorite, "Honest Old Abe," the friends of the "Little Giant" were not idle. Every effort was being put forth to secure his nomination at Charleston for the office of President of the United States. The Democratic State Convention of this State instructed its delegates to vote unanimously and make every honorable effort to secure his nomination. The Charleston Convention was an unfortunate one. Meeting in the city of Charleston, South Carolina, April 23, the convention remained in session ten days, at the expiration of which time no nomination was made, many of the delegates from the Southern States withdrawing. The rule of the National Democratic Convention required a two-thirds vote of the entire body for any candidate to secure his nomination. So many delegates withdrawing, after taking fifty-seven ballots, it was found impossible for any candidate to secure that number. An adjournment was then had to Baltimore, June 19.

At this latter place the convention assembled pursuant to adjournment, but even here no agreement could be reached between the factions. After a six days' meeting Stephen A. Douglas was nominated for President and Benjamin Fitzpatrick, of Alabama, for Vice President. The nomination of Douglas was received with very great enthusiasm. Mr. Fitzpatrick declining, Herschel V. Johnson, of Georgia, was substituted. Mr. Johnson accepted the nomination.

A portion of the Convention seceded, and holding another Convention June 23, nominated

John C. Breckenridge, of Kentucky, for President, and Joseph Lane, of Oregon, for Vice President.

A "Union" convention met at which John Bell, of Tennessee, was nominated for President, and Edward Everett, of Massachusetts, for Vice-President.

With four Presidential candidates in the field, the exciting questions growing out of the institution of slavery, the threats of disunion by a portion of the South, in the event of the election of Lincoln, tended to make the campaign one of great interest. "Wide-Awake" clubs, and organizations of "Hickory Boys," on the part of the Republicans and Douglas Democrats, respectively, tended to increase the excitement. Large and enthusiastic meetings were held by each party in all the leading towns and cities, and even in many of the smaller villages. The names of the "Rail-Splitter" and the "Little Giant" evoked the greatest enthusiasm. The excitement was scarcely equalled in 1840.

As already intimated, Sangamon county had special claims upon the two leading candidates for the Presidency, and thus felt highly honored. Hardly a day passed but meetings were held by one or the other party, and frequently by both. The vote in the county was the largest ever cast, and was very close. Douglas' majority was 42 over Lincoln; Yates, for Governor, had 8 majority over Allen, a number of Bell, or Union men casting their votes for him. For county officers, the Republicans were generally successful, receiving the votes of the Union men.

The result of the general election was the elevation of Lincoln to the Chief Magistracy of the Nation. The Republicans were jubilant, especially in old Sangamon, the home of Lincoln. A grand jubilee meeting was held in Springfield in a style never before equalled. The reporter of the State Journal became entranced, as will be seen by the following description of the illumination, from his pen:

"Never did the city of Pekin, in all the glory and 'feast of lanterns,' as it is quaintly called by the Chinese, present such a striking and gorgeous display as did the city of Springfield last night. Standing at the head of a person was forcibly reminded of the metaphor of a sea of fire rising and falling, variegated as the rainbow, anon a huge wave of blood red fire, now a ripple of faint blue and yellow, and then again the steady swell of strong, white light. The many colors gave a fantastic and unreal hue to the surrounding and enthusiastic crowd. The splendor and effect of the grandly brilliant scene is beyond the reach of the pen. The State House, rising in all the effulgence of its illuminated splendor, seemed like some vision evoked from fairy-land by the wand of the enchanter.

Never before has Springfield been decked in such magnificent hues. Not only did the streets present a most dazzling effect, but the whole Heavens seemed ablaze with the continual discharge of rockets, Roman candles, and the slow combustion of Bengal lights. The streets were as bright and light as under the full rays of the noon-day sun. The illumination of last night will never be forgotten in the annals of Springfield, and will in future time be referred to as one of the most brilliant events in its history."

1861.—The war for the Union was now in full progress, and little interest was manifested in ordinary political matters; only questions growing out of the secession of the Southern States was worthy of attention. No State officers were to be elected, and the contest for county officers was not of a nature to draw out a full vote. The opposition to the Democracy took the name of "Union." Only 4,353 votes were polled, against 7,361 in 1860. The Democrats elected William D. Power, County Judge, and William W. Warren, Surveyor. The Union men elected Noah W. Matheny, County Clerk, and Presco Wright, Treasurer.

1862.—The election this year was a more important one, and almost a full vote was polled. State and county officers were to be elected. Alexander Starne was the Democratic candidate for State Treasurer, against William Butler, Union; John T. Stuart, one of the most popular men in Sangamon county, announced himself an independent candidate for Congress having for an opponent, Leonard Swett. Full county tickets were nominated by both parties. During this year the Union army met with many reverses, and a somewhat gloomy feeling pervaded the minds of the people. When the election came off each party stood by its candidates, for the campaign had aroused party feeling intensely. The Democrats succeeded in carrying the county, by majorities ranging from 816 to 1,262.

1863.—This was an "off year," in politics, and only county officers were to be elected. The Union ticket was successful throughout, electing the candidates on it by majorities ranging from 242 to 302.

1864.—The campaign this year was one of much earnestness and feeling. Abraham Lincoln was the Republican or Union candidate for re-election to the Presidency, and associated with him as a candidate for Vice-President, was Andrew Johnson, the distinguished Unionist of Tennessee. George B. McClellan and George H. Pendleton were the Democratic candidates for President and Vice-President. James C. Robinson was the Democratic and R. J. Oglesby the Republican candidates for Governor. John

T. Stuart was nominated for re-election to Congress, and placed in opposition was Shelby M. Cullom. Both tickets were exceptionally strong and the full vote of the State and county was polled. In Sangamon county there was an increase over 1860. The question during the campaign was substantially whether President Lincoln should be sustained in his course in the prosecution of the war. The Democrats carried the county by a majority of 380 for McClellan.

1865.—When the regular fall election was held, the war was over, and many of the brave Union soldiers had returned, but there being only county officers to elect, the vote was light, being 5388 against 7519 in 1864. The Union ticket was successful over the Democratic by majorities ranging from 254 to 462.

1866.—The issues which now divided parties arose from the work of reconstruction of the States lately in rebellion. The election was an important one, and party spirit once more ran high. George W. Smith was the Republican candidate for State Treasurer, and Jesse J. Phillips the Democratic. Shelby M. Cullom was re-nominated for Congress, and was opposed by E. S. Fowler, Democrat. The Democrats carried the county, electing every officer save Sheriff, Samuel Shoup, Republican, being elected. The opposition to the Democratic party resumed the name of Republican this year.

1867.—Another light vote this year, only county officers being voted for, and no special political discussions being held. The Republican candidate for Treasurer was elected by 21 majority, and their candidate for Surveyor by a majority of 18.

1868.—This year brought with it another Presidential campaign. The Republican National Convention met in Chicago and placed in nomination Ulysses S. Grant, the victorious Union-General, associating with him Schuyler Colfax, of Indiana. The Democratic National Convention nominated Horatio Seymour and Francis P. Blair, Jr., for President and Vice-President. John R. Eden was the Democratic and John M. Palmer the Republican candidate for Governor. Benjamin S. Edwards was the Democratic candidate for Congress. He had for an opponent Shelby M. Cullom, who was re-nominated by the Republicans. For county officers, Charles H. Lanphier was the Democratic nominee for Circuit Clerk, and opposed by J. V. Mahoney, Republican. D. Brown, Democrat, and John McConnell, Republican, were the nominees for the office of Sheriff. The campaign was one of great activity. Each party was well organized, and both had hopes of victory. In this county great interest was manifested. The Democrats were here successful, electing every candidate on their county ticket.

1869.—Light vote at the fall election for county officers. The Democrats were successful in electing their entire ticket, with the exception of County Clerk—Noah W. Matheny, who had so long held the office, being elected by 206 majority.

1870.—A State Treasurer and State Superintendent of Public Schools were to be elected. In addition to the nominations made by Democrats and Republicans, the Temperance men, or Prohibitionists, nominated a State and county ticket, but their strength was limited, the highest vote being polled by Mr. Owen, candidate for Sheriff, he receiving 51 votes. About a two-thirds vote was polled.

1871.—A Member of Congress from the State at large was to be elected this year, but this fact was not sufficient to draw out a full vote, the number polled being even less than the year previous. S. S. Hayes was the Democratic and J. L. Beveridge the Republican candidate for the office. The total vote for Member of Congress was 5,833, of which Mr. Hayes received 3,053 and Mr. Beveridge 2,780. The Democratic candidates for county officers were elected, their candidate for Sheriff receiving 55 majority and Surveyor 442 majority.

1872.—The movement known as the Liberal-Republican had a large influence, politically, this year, having virtually dictated the Democratic nomination for the Presidency, and the platform of principles on which the campaign against the Republican party was dictated. The Liberal-Republicans were those connected with the Republican party who were opposed to any extreme measures in the reconstruction of the Southern States, and who believed the time had come when past issues should be forgotten, and new issues formed; that the hand of reconciliation should be offered the South, and a united country, working together to build up the waste places of the South. Many of the most able men of the Republican party, including Horace Greeley, Charles Sumner, Lyman Trumbull, John M. Palmer, and others, united in this movement. In this county, the year previous, a paper had been commenced by Geo. R. Weber & Son, called The Political Crisis, which advocated the views of this wing of the party. In May, a National convention was held by the Liberal-Republicans, in Cincinnati, which nomiinated Horace Greeley for President, and B. Gratz Brown for Vice President. The following is a synopsis of the resolutions adopted:

1. Equality of all men before the law; equal and exact justice to all, without regard to race, color or previous condition.

2. Opposition to the re-opening of all questions settled by the XIIIth, XIVth and XVth amendments to the Constitution.

3. Demand for the immediate and absolute removal of all disabilities imposed on account of the rebellion.

4. Local self-government; supremacy of the civil over the military; and demand for the largest individual liberty consistent with public order.

5. Denunciation of the existing system of civil service.

6. Demand for a system of Federal taxation which should not unnecessarily interfere with the industries of the people; reference of the tariff to the Congressional Districts.

7. Demand for civil service reform, and for the election of President for a single term only.

8. Maintenance of public credit and denunciation of repudiation.

9. A speedy return to specie payment.

10. Thanks to the citizen-soldiers and sailors of the Republic.

11. Opposition to further grants to railroads.

12. Cultivation of friendship with all nations; regarding alike dishonorable, either to demand what is not right, or submit to what is wrong.

The Democracy in convention ratified the nominations of Greeley and Brown, and adopted the platform of the Liberals. The Republicans re-nominated President Grant, and associated with him on the ticket Henry Wilson, of Massachusetts, for Vice-President. The disaffection among the Democrats in consequence of the nomination of Horace Greeley, a life-long political enemy, was so great that a third ticket was nominated, at the head of which was Charles O'Connor, the distinguished lawyer of New York. This third ticket had very little strength in this county or State, the disaffection among the Democrats leading principally to the refusal to attend the polls or to vote at the election. The vote was not so large as at the Presidential election in 1868, notwithstanding the county had increased in population. Gustavus Koener, a Liberal Republican, was nominated and supported by the Democracy, while R. J. Oglesby was the Republican nominee for Governor. James C. Robinson and M. H. Chamberlain were the Democratic and Republican candidates respectively for Congress. The Democrats, or Liberals, were successful in this county by fair majorities.

1873.—This year county officers alone were to be elected. A new party had been born, known as the Independent Anti-Monopoly party, and, therefore, three tickets were placed in the field for the suffrages of the voters. Notwithstanding this fact, the vote was light, being only about two-thirds of the full vote. James H. Matheny, a very popular Democratic candidate, was nominated by the Democrats and elected County Judge by 1,312 majority. Noah W. Matheny, first elected in 1843 (having held the office by appointment since 1839), and re-elected every four years thereafter, was again re-nominated by the Republicans, and, for the first time, was defeated, his opponent receiving 151 majority. The Anti-Monopoly ticket polled a small vote, Mary J. Howard, for County Superintendent of Public Schools, receiving 303 votes, the highest on the ticket.

1874.—The failure of the Liberal Republicans and the depression of the times forced other issues before the people. An organization known as the Patrons of Husbandry, having for its object a union among farmers for self-protection, and the advancement of agricultural interests, had sprung into existence. Much complaint had heretofore been made against unjust monopolies in the manufacture of implements used by the farmers, as well as the extortions of the railroads in carrying produce. The Patrons of Husbandry attempted through their order to regulate these wrongs. Among other things looking to this end, was the establishment of Grange stores and an effort to purchase all goods used by its members at wholesale prices. This arrayed against the order the large mercantile class of the country, small tradesmen, and manufacturers generally. While never intended as a political organization, and the discussion of politics being prohibited by its rules, its individual membership, when they found they were placed in opposition to the mercantile and other classes mentioned, naturally found themselves allied together, and an appeal was thus made to that final settlement of all difficulties—the ballot box. It was thus the Anti-Monopoly party came to exist.

Charles Carroll was the Democratic, Thomas S. Ridgeway, Republican, and David Gore, the Anti-Monopoly candidates for the office of State Treasurer. For Congress, William M. Springer, Andrew Simpson, and J. B. Turner, were the candidates respectively of the Democrats, Republicans, and Anti-Monopolists. Each of the three parties nominated county tickets. For State officers the Democrats were successful and also in one county office. For Sheriff, the Republicans succeeded in electing L. H. Ticknor. The highest vote polled by the Anti-Monopolists was on State Treasurer, David Gore securing 718 votes.

1875.—No interest was manifested in the election this year, county officers only to be elected. The Anti-Monopoly men made no nominations, leaving the field to the Republicans and Democrats. The latter were successful in the smallest vote polled in the county for several years.

1876.—The election this year was for National, State and county officers. Rutherford B. Hayes and William A. Wheeler were the Republican candidates for President and Vice-President, while Samuel J. Tilden and Thomas A. Hendricks received the nomination of the Democratic party for the same offices. Peter Cooper was the nominee of the Independents or Anti-Monopolists for President. The hard times which began in 1873 had a perceptible effect upon this campaign. The Democratic party, which for some years had been acting on the defensive, when not allied to some other political body, now assumed the aggressive, and under the banner of "Tilden and Reform," forced the Republicans in the defensive. On the part of the Democrats the campaign was boldly conducted, though it cannot truthfully be said that Tilden was the choice of the Democracy of the Nation, especially of the Western element of the party. For Governor, Lew. Steward received the nomination of both the Independents and Democrats. He was opposed by Shelby M. Cullom, of Springfield, on the part of the Republicans. The contest for this office was quite animated, the two contestants making a personal canvass throughout the whole State. In this county the vote was the largest ever cast, the Democratic candidates each receiving a majority of the votes over his opponent. Tilden's majority over Hayes was 994, while Mr. Elliott, Democratic candidate for Sheriff, received a majority of 1,682.

1877.—The Anti-Monopoly party was now absorbed by the newly organized Greenback party. L. H. Ticknor was the Republican, C. R. Hurst the Democratic, and A. F. Carpenter the Greenback candidate for County Clerk. Mr. Ticknor was elected by a majority of 88. D. Paulen, Republican, was elected over E. R. Perkins, Democrat, for the office of County Treasurer. For School Superintendent, P. J. Rourke, Democrat, was re-elected.

1878.—In this county three tickets were placed in the field, by the Democratic, Republican and National parties respectively. While a full vote was not polled, the canvass and election was quite exciting. There was also considerable scratching of tickets on personal grounds. The National party polled nearly eight hundred votes in this election. While the Democrats had a majority of some seven hundred on a strict party vote, the Republicans succeeded in electing their candidate for Sheriff by 162 votes, and Coroner by 320. The Democrats elected their candidate for the State Senate by 1053 votes.

1879.—Only county officers were to be voted for, and consequently the canvass was spiritless, and a personal matter only. D. Paulen, Republican, was elected Treasurer, and Graham, Democrat, Surveyor.

1880.—The campaign began quite early this year, especially among aspirants for office and their friends. The preliminary canvass for the nomination grew quite warm, as both the Republicans and Democrats were alike confident they would succeed in the National struggle. James A. Garfield received the Republican nomination for President, and associated with him on the ticket was Chester A. Arthur for Vice-President; Winfield S. Hancock was nominated for President by the Democrats, and with him was William H. English for Vice-President; James B. Weaver and Gen. Chambers for President and Vice-President respectively on the National ticket. The canvass was pushed with vigor, the Democratic and Republican parties each using their utmost endeavors to be successful. The National party, under the lead of Weaver, also endeavored to increase its vote, Mr. Weaver making speeches in more than half the States in the Union. In this county the Democracy were successful by majorities ranging from 259 to 1,368.

CHAPTER XIV.

NATIONAL, STATE AND COUNTY REPRESENTATION.

Sangamon county has reason to be proud of the distinguished men who have served the county, State or Nation. Whether at home or abroad, representatives from this county have served with honor to themselves and to the county in which a home was claimed.

NATIONAL REPRESENTATION.

President of the United States.

Abraham Lincoln, the fifteenth President of the United States, was elected to that office November, 1860, and was inaugurated March 4, 1861. He was again re-elected November, 1864, and inaugurated March 4, 1865; he was struck down by the hands of an assassin on the evening of April 14, 1865, and died early on the morning of the fifteenth. Not alone the county, but the State, Nation, and world delights to do him honor.

United States Consuls.

Edward L. Baker, for many years editor of the Illinois State Journal, was appointed United States Consul at Buenos Ayres, Argentine Republic, South America, in December, 1873, and yet fills the position with credit to himself and the Government he represents.

United States Assessor.

Edward L. Baker, appointed in 1869, and continuing until the office was abolished.

Congressional.

When Sangamon county was organized, the State was entitled to but one Representative in Congress, Daniel P. Cook, of Kaskaskia, holding the office, to which he was first elected in 1818, on the admission of the State into the Union. Mr. Cook served a period of nearly nine years, from December, 1818, to March, 1827. He was a man of more than ordinary ability.

Joseph Duncan succeeded Daniel P. Cook, and took his seat at the first session of the Twentieth Congress, in 1827. He represented the State three terms, or until March, 1833.

In the winter of 1831-2 the legislature of the State made an apportionment, dividing it into three districts, Sangamon county forming a part of the Third. In August, 1832, Joseph Duncan, of Jacksonville, was elected to represent the district, and served from the beginning of his term, March, 1833, to August, 1834, when he resigned his seat to accept the office of Governor, to which he had been elected. William L. May, of Springfield, was elected to fill the vacancy, and was re-elected to the Twenty-fourth and Twelfth-fifth Congress. Mr. May was succeeded by John T. Stuart, who was elected to the Twenty-sixth and Twenty-seventh Congress, serving from 1839 till 1843.

In 1842, the State was divided into seven Congressional Districts, Sangamon county being placed in the Seventh. John J. Hardin, of Jacksonville, was elected to represent the district in the 28th Congress, and Edward D. Baker, of Springfield, in the 29th. Before the expiration of his term, Mr. Baker resigned to accept the Colonelcy of a regiment in the Mexican war; and John Henry, of Jacksonville, was elected to fill the vacancy. Abraham Lincoln was elected a member of the 30th Congress; Thomas L. Harris, of Petersburg, the 31st Congress; and Richard Yates, of Jacksonville, the 32d Congress.

In 1852 another apportionment was made, and Sangamon county became a part of the Sixth District. Richard Yates, of Jacksonville, was the first elected to represent this new district, and took his seat March, 1853, as a member of the 33d Congress. He was succeeded two years later by Thomas L. Harris, of Petersburg, who served two terms. John A. McClernand, of Springfield, was Mr. Harris's successor, and was in turn succeeded by A. L. Knapp, of Jerseyville, who served in the 37th Congress.

In 1862, Sangamon county, under the new apportionment act, was made a part of the Eighth Congressional District, and was represented in the 38th Congress by John T. Stuart. In the 39th Congress the county was represented by Shelby M. Cullom, of Springfield, who was re-elected in 1866 and 1868, serving in the 40th and 41st Congress with great ability. Mr. Cullom was succeeded by James C. Robinson, who served in the 42d Congress.

Another apportionment was made in 1872, the State then being entitled to nineteen Representatives. Under this act Sangamon county became a part of the Twelfth District, and was represented in the 43d Congress by James C. Robinson, of Springfield. Mr. Robinson was succeeded by William M. Springer, of Springfield, who was first elected in 1874, and re-elected in 1876, 1878 and 1880, serving in the 44th and 45th Congress, and is now serving in the 46th Congress.

Shelby M. Cullom, the first and only Governor elected from Sangamon county, Illinois was born in Wayne county, Kentucky, November 22, 1829, whence his father moved to Tazewell county, Illinois, in 1830. Having been reared and schooled in this State he is to "all intents and purposes" a native Illinoisan. Until he was nineteen years of age he worked with his father on the farm, attending the district schools in the winter. When, by superior application and ability he became sufficiently advanced, he assumed the duties for a while of a teacher, and having received a careful preparation by teaching and hard study, his collegiate course was completed at Mount Morris University.

In 1854 he came to Springfield, Illinois, and studied law in the office of Stuart and Edwards, and was admitted to the bar in 1855, and shortly after was elected City Attorney of Springfield. In 1856 he took an active part in the Presidential campaign of that year as a supporter of Millard Fillmore for the Presidency. By the American party he was nominated for the lower branch of the legislature, endorsed by the newly organized Republican party, and triumphantly elected. In 1860 he was again elected and made Speaker of the House. In 1862 he was appointed by President Lincoln on a commission with Governor Boutwell and Charles A. Dana to examine into the accounts of Quartermasters and Commissioners, and pass upon claims allowed by them. In 1864 he was elected to represent the Eighth District of Illinois in the United States Congress, and was elected for two successive terms. During that time he was chairman of the Committee on Territories, and as such reported a bill, of which he was the author, for the suppression of polygamy in the Territory of Utah, which became a law. He also secured the appropriations for the erection of the United States Court House and Postoffice in Springfield, at a cost of $320,000. In 1872 he was again elected to the legislature, and chosen Speaker of the House for the second time. He was also elected in 1874. In 1876 he received the nomination of his party—the Republican—for the office of Governor, and was triumphantly elected, having received a larger vote than President Hayes, or any other man on the State ticket. After serving four years he was re-nominated and elected.

As a member of the legislature he was distinguished as one of its fairest, most impartial and dignified presiding officers. He won golden opinions from all sides. As a member his action was always on the side of economy, freedom and equal laws for all.

In Congress he was attentive to duty, industrious, and highly influential. He took an active part in the advocacy of the reconstruction measures, and in favor of adopting the XIII, XIV and XV amendments of the Constitution.

In the administration of the State Government as its Chief Executive, Governor Cullom has displayed qualities of the highest statesmanship. Since he came into office the State debt, which then amounted to $1,500,000, has been liquidated. State taxes have been reduced. Every department of the State Government has been economically administered. In no case have the expenses been allowed to exceed the appropriations. No public moneys have been diverted from their proper uses, and no misappropriations or defalcations have been committed or even charged upon any public officer.

In his office and at his home, Governor Cullom is a model gentleman. Always accessible, he is courteous and kind to every visitor. He is no lover of red tape, neither does he affect the ways of the aristocrat. In all the years of his public service his life has been pure and upright. His integrity and honesty stand before the world untarnished and unimpeachable.

Shelby M. Cullom has been twice married; first to Hannah M. Fisher, December 12, 1855, who died March 17, 1861; second, to Julia Fisher, a sister of his first wife, May 5, 1863. By his first wife he had two daughters—Ella and Carrie.

STATE REPRESENTATION.

Governor.

Shelby M. Cullom was the first and only Governor elected from Sangamon county. Mr. Cullom was elected November, 1876, and was inaugurated January 8, 1877; he was re-elected in 1880, and inaugurated January 10, 1881. He has made a popular and efficient Governor. See sketch.

On the adoption of the present school system, Ninian W. Edwards was appointed as the first Superintendent of Public Instruction. He qualified and commenced the discharge of the duties of the office March 24, 1854. Mr. Edwards served with remarkable ability until January 12, 1857, when he was succeeded by William H. Powell.

John P. Brooks was elected in the fall of 1862, and qualified January 12, 1863, and served two years.

Newton Bateman was elected to succeed Mr. Brooks in the fall of 1864. He was qualified January 10, 1865. Re-elected in 1866 and 1870, serving until the expiration of his term, January 11, 1875. Mr. Bateman was one of the most popular and efficient Superintendents in the State. He is now President of the Knox College, at Galesburg, Illinois.

Attorney Generals.

Ninian W. Edwards was appointed to this office September 1, 1834. He was then elected by the people, but resigned February 7, 1835.

David B. Campbell was elected in the fall of 1846, qualified December 21, of the same year.

The first to fill this office was Joseph G. Norwood, of Sangamon county, who was appointed July 21, 1851.

William Billington was appointed April 26, 1864.

Adjutant General.

Moses K. Anderson received the appointment of Adjutant General, December 16, 1839, and served until April 31, 1857, a period of nearly eighteen years.

Thomas S. Mather was appointed October 28, 1858, vice Kinney, deceased, and served until November 11, 1861.

Edwin L. Higgins succeeded General Dilger, January 24, 1873, and served until July 2, 1875, when he was succeeded by Hiram Hilliard, of Cook county.

Senatorial and Representative.

On the organization of the county, it was given one State Senator and one Representative in the General Assembly. Stephen Stillman was elected State Senator, and James Sims Representative.

Fourth General Assembly.—Senator, Stephen Stillman; Representative, William S. Hamilton.

The following are the names of the "Long Nine:" Senators, Job Fletcher, Archer G. Herndon; Representatives, John Dawson, Ninian W. Edwards, William F. Elkin, Abraham Lincoln, Andrew McCormack, Daniel Stone*, Robert L. Wilson. When Vandalia was selected as the State Capital there was a provision in the law that it could not be removed for twenty years. Before the expiration of that time, it was generally conceded that it must be moved farther north. Springfield was a candidate for the capital, and the members of the legislature from Sangamon county were chosen with direct reference to this subject. The subject of internal improvements was now being vigorously agitated, and the legislature of 1836-7 was largely devoted to business of that kind. In order to accomplish this legislation, a good deal of "log-rolling" was done; that is, a member having a pet project would agree with another that if he would vote for some bill in which he was particularly interested that he would return the favor. The "Long Nine" did not ask much for their section in the way of internal improvements, but they never lost an opportunity to make a vote for the removal of the capital to Springfield. As is well known, they were successful in their efforts, and Springfield was selected as the capital.

Eleventh General Assembly.—Senators, Job Fletcher, Archer G. Herndon; Representatives, Edward D. Baker, John Calhoun, John Dawson, Ninian W. Edwards†, William F. Elkin, Abraham Lincoln, Andrew McCormack.

Twelfth General Assembly.—Sangamon, Menard, Logan and Christian were now made one Senatorial District, with two Senators, and Sangamon county was continued a Representative District, with five Representatives. Fifteenth General Assembly.—Senator, Ninian W. Edwards; Representatives, James N. Brown, Rezin H. Constant, Stephen T. Logan, Benjamin West.

Sixteenth General Assembly.—Under the Constitution of 1848, the State was divided into Senatorial and Representative Districts, each district having a number assigned it. There were twenty-five Senatorial and fifty-four Representative Districts, Sangamon county, with Mason and Menard, was made the Twelfth Senatorial and Twenty-sixth Representative Districts, and was entitled to one Senator and two Representatives. The following named served in this Assembly: Senator, John T. Stuart; Representatives, Ninian W. Edwards, John W. Smith.

Sangamon and Morgan counties were made the Fifteenth Senatorial, and entitled to one Senator; Sangamon alone constituted the Twenty-sixth Representative District, with two Representatives. In this Assembly the county was represented as follows: Senator, Joseph Morton, of Morgan county; Representatives, Stephen T. Logan, Jonathan McDaniel.

Sangamon, Logan and Tazewell formed the Eleventh Senatorial, and Sangamon and Logan the Twenty-fifth Representative District, with two Representatives.

In this assembly it was represented as follows: Senator, Colby Knapp, of Logan; Representatives, Ambrose M. Miller, of Logan; Charles A. Keyes, of Sangamon.

Twenty-fourth General Assembly.—Senators, John B. Cohrs, of Tazewell; Ambrose M. Miller, of Logan; James W. Patton, Sangamon.

Sangamon was therefore continued as a part of the Eleventh Senatorial District, but was made the Forty-third Representative District, with three Representatives elected under the minority representative plan.

CHAPTER XV.

REMOVAL OF THE STATE CAPITAL.

The first capital of the Territory of Illinois was the old French village of Kaskaskia, the oldest permanent settlement of the Mississippi valley. On the occasion of laying the cornerstone of the present magnificent State House, Judge Caton described the building used as the capitol when the Territorial Government was organized, in the following manner: "It was a rough building in the center of a square in the village of Kaskaskia, the ancient seat of the Western Empire for more than one hundred and fifty years. The body of the building was of uncut limestone, the gable and roof of the gambrel style of unpainted boards and shingles, with dormer windows. The lower floor, a long, cheerless room, was fitted up for the House, while the Council sat in the small chamber above. This venerable building was, during the French occupancy of the country, prior to 1763, the headquarters of the military commandant. Thirty years ago, the house was a mass of ruins, and today, probably, there is not a stone left to designate the spot where it stood." That building was the capitol during the territorial existence of Illinois, and the State Government was also organized in it.

The Constitution of 1818, on the formation of the State, made it obligatory upon the General Assembly to petition Congress for a grant of land upon which to locate the seat of government for the State. In the event of the prayer of the petitioners being granted, a town was to be laid out on said land, which town should be the seat of government of the State for twenty years. The land was granted. "At the session of 1819, in Kaskaskia, five Commissioners were appointed to select the land appropriated by Congress for the State Capital." The Commissioners made their selections further up the Kaskaskia river. Having selected the site, the Commissioners were sorely puzzled in their efforts to select a name that should be so euphonious as to attract the attention of the whole world. Governor Ford, in his history of Illinois, gives the following humorous account of the way it was done: "Tradition says that a wag, who was present, suggested to the Commissioners that the 'Vandals' were a powerful nation of Indians, who once inhabited the banks of the Kaskaskia river, and that 'Vandalia,' derived from the name, would perpetuate the memory of that extinct but renowned people. The suggestion pleased the Commissioners, the name was adopted, and they thus proved that the cognomen of their new city—if they were fit representatives of their constituents—would better illustrate the character of the modern, than the ancient inhabitants of the country."

Having located and named their town, it was at once laid out, and the dense growth of timber cut away, and a two-story frame building erected on the square set apart for the State Capitol. The building was placed on a rough stone foundation in the center of the square, and was of very rude workmanship. The lower floor was for the House of Representatives, and the upper divided into two rooms, the largest one for the Senate, and the smaller one for the office of Secretary of State. The State Auditor and Treasurer occupied detached buildings. The archives of the State were removed from Kaskaskia to Vandalia in December, 1820. That wooden State House was burned a few years later, and a much larger one built of brick on the same ground. The rapidity with which emigration filled up the northern portion of the State made it apparent, long before the twenty years it was to remain at Vandalia expired, that it would be necessary to remove the capital further north, and as early as 1832 the question began to be agitated in the General Assembly.

At the session of 1832-33, an act was passed submitting the question to the people, naming six places which could be voted for as the seat of Government—Springfield, Jacksonville, the Centre, Alton, Vandalia, and Peoria. It will be seen that four of the places named lie in the centre, or north of the centre, of the State. The northern and central people voting each the object of their choice, would thus be divided.

A meeting was held at the Court House, in Springfield, January 4, 1834, presided over by Dan Stone, with Edward Jones as Secretary. The object of the meeting, which was composed of citizens of the entire county, was to have a concert of action among citizens north of Vandalia and north and east of Alton, in reference to the removal of the State Capital. The act authorizing a vote upon the subject only required plurality of the vote cast instead of a majority, for any one of the six places named in order to elect. This would permit a minority of a little over one-sixth of the voters of the State to select the capital. Resolutions were passed at this meeting recommending that the north, northeast and northwest counties in the State hold a general convention at Rushville, Schuyler county, on the first Monday in April, 1834, for the purpose of agreeing upon one of the four places named in the northern part of the State, to be voted for as the seat of Government. John T. Stuart, Stephen T. Logan, Peter Cartwright, George Forquer, E. D. Taylor, and Samuel Morris were appointed to represent Sangamon county in the convention, provided one should be called. Simeon Francis, Dan Stone, George Forquer, John T. Stuart, Stephen T. Logan, and C. R. Matheny were appointed a committee on correspondence, and were directed to prepare an address to the citizens of the counties specified in the call.

The subject created some little ill-feeling, the attacks of the newspapers south and southwest being directed towards Springfield. An article appeared in the Sangamo Journal favoring Springfield and signed "People." The Alton paper, believing the author of the article to be a citizen of Sangamon county, replied in the following strain, the capitals and punctuation marks being as they appear in that paper:

"The GEOGRAPHICAL CENTER has been fairly chased to the moon—VANDALIA has experienced the desolation of Tadmor—ALTON is doomed to utter extinction. Tremble, now, O, JACKSONVILLE! and be thou mightily afraid, O, PEORIA! For ye, too, are soon to be visited in wrath by these excentrically 'centrifugal' 'People'—of Sangamon. Then destruction will come upon you like a whirl-wind, and your names be forever blotted from the face of the map."

It being evident the vote of the people would not be considered binding by the next legislature, many places throughout the State refused to vote upon the question. The result of the vote was that Vandalia had a small majority over Springfield, but only one-fifth the votes polled.

The legislature of 1836-7, would be called upon to settle the question of the capital, and accordingly in the selection of Senators and Representatives in the General Assembly from this county, men were chosen whom it was thought would work for the interests of Springfield. That the selection made was a wise one the results sufficiently testify. They were the most remarkable delegation from any one county to the General Assembly, being much taller than the average of human stature. Some of them were less and some more than six feet, but their combined height was exactly fifty-four feet. They were then and are yet spoken of as the "Long Nine." The names of those in the Senate were Archer G. Herndon and Job Fletcher; in the House, Abraham Lincoln, Ninian W. Edwards, John Dawson, Andrew McCormick, Dan Stone, William F. Elkin and Robert L. Wilson. One or two were as tall, but none taller, than Abraham Lincoln, who quoting his own language, was "six feet four inches, nearly." It was known that a movement would be made to re-locate the State Capital. The "Long Nine" were united for securing it, and nothing could turn one of them from their purpose. They were ready to yield anything else, but when any other point was yielded, it secured votes for Springfield as the capital. Their opportunities were great. The people of Illinois were, at that time, almost insane on the subject of internal improvements. Not one in ten thousand of them had ever seen a railroad, but they had heard of them, and thought the prairies of Illinois the best place in the world to build them. The first movements began in the General Assembly in 1834, but the first charter was: "An act to incorporate the Chicago and Vincennes Railroad Company, with an authorized capital of $3,500,000 and was approved January 17, 1835. Within a year charters were granted for building railroads in the State, of which the combined capital authorized was $18,200,000. Not a mile of railroad was ever built under any of these charters. Before the next session, the legislature realized there were no capitalists to build railroads, and a new system was inaugurated. An act was passed and approved February 27, 1837, entitled: "An act to establish and maintain a general system of internal improvement." Two supplementary acts were passed and approved March 4, 1837. The object of these acts was to construct public works at the expense of the State in all parts of the same.

While the internal improvement bill was pending the "Long Nine" were busy. They said little in locating proposed railroads, but would assist other localities, where votes could be secured for locating the Capital at Springfield. The result was the passage of "An act to permanently locate the seat of government for the State of Illinois," which was approved February 25, 1837. The law provided for a joint session of the two Houses on the 25th of the same month to select a situation. An appropriation of $50,000 was made to commence building the State House. The law also declared that no place should be chosen unless its citizens contributed at least $50,000 to aid in the work, and not less than two acres of land as a site for the Capital. When the two houses assembled on the twenty-eighth, the question was decided by the following:

Ballotings.	1st.	2d	3d.	4th.
Springfield.....	35	43	53	73
Jacksonville.....	14	15	9	1
Vandalia.....	16	15	16	15
Peoria.....	16	12	11	6
Alton.....	15	16	14	6
Illipolis.....		10	3
Scattering.....	25	7	15	7

That settled the question and Springfield was declared to be the future Capital of the State.

A supplemental act was passed on the third of March authorizing the Commissioners of Sangamon county to convey the land to the State as a site for the new edifice. It also named A. G. Henry, of Sangamon; Archibald Job, of Cass, and William Herndon, of Sangamon, as Commissioners, who were authorized and empowered to superintend the work of erection. It was expected the new capital would be completed in time for the first meeting of the legislature in Springfield, which was fixed for the special session of 1839-40. Finding that the building could not be sufficiently advanced, the Second Presbyterian Church, on Fourth street, was secured as Representatives' Hall. The building was then quite new, and was by far the largest church edifice in the central and whole northern part of the State. It was built of brick, stood a few feet north of the site of the present magnificent Second Presbyterian Church, until the latter was erected. The old building was torn down in the summer of 1875. The Methodist Church was used for the Senate Chamber, and the Episcopal Church for the Supreme Court, both wooden buildings. The legislature first convened in special session December 9, 1839.

It was thought by many to be unreasonable, to require a little town of eleven hundred inhabitants, struggling with the disadvantages of a new country, to pay the $50,000 pledged. During that special session, Hon. Stephen A. Douglas, then a member from Morgan county, proposed to bring in a bill releasing Springfield from the payment of the same. The sterling honesty of Abraham Lincoln manifested itself on this, as on all other proper occasions. He interposed his objections, although he fully appreciated the kindly feelings that prompted the proposal,—but he insisted that the money should be paid. Arrangements were entered into for paying it in three installments. The two first payments were made without any great difficulty, but the third pressed more heavily, as the financial crash that swept over the whole United States while the new State House was in course of construction impoverished many. Under these circumstances, it became necessary to borrow the money to make the last payment, from the State Bank of Illinois. A note for the amount was signed by one hundred and one citizens, and deposited with the Bank; the money drawn, with which Internal Improvement scrip, or stock, was purchased and paid into the State Treasury; thus paying the last installment in the State's own evidence of indebtedness. From that time, it was a matter between the State Bank and the citizens who signed the note. Soon after the note was given the bank failed, and some of the payments were made in the depreciated paper of the bank, for which it had received par value when it was paid out. The original note is preserved in the Ridgely National Bank, but the following is a copy of the same:

"$16,666.67. SPRINGFIELD, March 22, 1830.

"One year after date, we, the undersigned, or either of us, promise to pay to the President, Directors and Company of the State Bank of Illinois, sixteen thousand, six hundred and sixty-six dollars and sixty-seven cents, for value received, negotiable and payable at the bank, in Springfield, with interest until paid, at the rate of six per centum per annum, payable semi-annually."

From a footing up of the principal and interest on one side of the note, the final settlement appears to have been made February 19, 1846. The principal and interest to that time was $17,918.

Soon after the legislature adjourned at Vandalia, in March, 1837, and the members returned to their homes, a public festival was given in Springfield in honor of the new legislation for the removal of the capital. Among the toasts and speeches that followed the dinner, were the two following:

By Abraham Lincoln, Esq.: "All our friends—they are too numerous to mention now, individually, while there is no one of them who is not too dear to be forgotten or neglected."

By S. A. Douglas, Esq.: "The last winter's legislation—May its results prove no less beneficial to the whole State than they have to our town."

A tradition still lingers here that something stronger than water was used in drinking the toasts on that occasion, as there was not a man to be found after the festival that could tell who made the last speech, and that important fact is lost to history.

The Commissioners appointed to superintend the building at once entered upon the discharge of their duties, and on the fourth of July, 1837, the corner-stone of the State House was laid with grand civic and military demonstrations. After it had been lowered to its place in the wall, E. D. Baker delivered an eloquent address appropriate to the occasion. It was estimated that the building would cost $130,000, but $240,000 was expended before it was completed according to the original design. When at last completed it was looked upon with wonder and admiration by the people. It was thought to be so large that it would answer all the purposes of the State for all time to come.

BUILDING OF A NEW STATE HOUSE.

The growth of the State, between the years 1840 and 1865, was remarkable, and long before this time it became apparent that a new State House was demanded for the accommodation of the officers and public, and for the preservation of the public records. There began to be intimations thrown out, that when the question of a new building came up for legislation, other important towns would endeavor to bring an influence to bear in favor of a re-location and removal of the capital. The citizens of Springfield and Sangamon county fully realized the difficulties and dangers of the agitation of the question of a new building; and although the use of the old was felt to be an obstacle to the growth of the city, yet many felt disposed to put off the evil day as long as possible. From a pamphlet history of Springfield, by J. C. Power, published in 1871, the following is extracted:

"During the summer of 1866, Hon. James C. Conkling became a candidate for a seat in the lower branch of the General Assembly, with the view of making the subject of building a new State House a prominent question before the legislature, if elected. Mr. Conkling went before the people upon this question and the politics of the day, and was elected,—although his opponent was friendly to the move for a new State House, also. The election was held in November, 1866.

"Hon. John S. Bradford was Mayor of Springfield, at the time, and in consequence of the general feeling on the State House question, he, soon after the State election, sent out private invitations to some forty or fifty of the most prominent business men, to meet him on a certain evening, in a hall named in the invitation. When they were assembled, Mayor Bradford was called on to preside, and state the object of the meeting. He informed them that it was, to hold a consultation with reference to bringing the subject of building a new capitol for the State before the General Assembly, for its action at the approaching session. After the delivery of a brief address by the Mayor, a general interchange of views followed, when it was found that the feeling was almost unanimous in favor of action. By subsequent meetings, and consultations with the Board of Supervisors for Sangamon county, and the city authorities of Springfield, those two organizations were ready to purchase the old State House for the use of the county and city, in the event of the General Assembly deciding to erect a new one.

LAW PROVIDING FOR BUILDING A NEW CAPITOL.

Accordingly, when the legislature assembled, Mr. Conkling presented a bill providing for the erection of a new State Capitol at Springfield, and laid it before the House of Representatives early in the session. It was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings; and, after remaining in their hands several weeks, during which time some changes were made, the principal one being an increase of the amount to be paid for the old State House, it was reported back to the House, with the unanimous recommendation that it be adopted. It passed both Houses, and was approved by Governor R. J.

Oglesby, February 25, 1867, with a supplementary act two days later.

This law provided, first, for the conveyance by the Governor of the public square, containing two and a half acres of land, with the State House upon it, to Sangamon county and the city of Springfield, in consideration of $200,000, to be paid to the State of Illinois, and for the further consideration that the city and county cause to be conveyed to the State a certain piece of land, described by metes and bound, in the bill, and containing between eight and nine acres, upon which to erect the new State House. This bill also provides that the State shall have the use of the old State House until the new one is completed. The land was secured at a cost to the city of $70,000, and conveyed to the State; the $200,000 was paid by the county, and that amount, with $250,000 more to be drawn from the State treasury, making $450,000, was appropriated to commence the work.

It is proper here to state that the $200,000, paid nominally for the old State House, was really in consideration that a new one was to be built. The people of Sangamon county would now much prefer to re-convey it to the State, if they could have refunded the $200,000 with the $80,000 interest, that the money has been worth during that time; then they could build a Court House much more to their liking, for a much smaller amount of money.

It is a matter in which the people have a right to feel an honest pride, that while other towns and cities in different parts of the State have made liberal offers to secure the location of some State institution, only to evade its provisions, and in the end leave the State to make up their deficiencies, Springfield and Sangamon county have redeemed every pledge they have made to the people of the State. Upon this subject they invite the closest scrutiny.

In the law, seven men were named as Commissioners, to superintend the erection of the new State House, and disburse the funds appropriated for that purpose. They were instructed to advertise for plans and specifications, for thirty days, in two daily papers each, in Springfield and Chicago, and one each, in Philadelphia and New York. After waiting three months they were to notify the Committees on Public Buildings as provided by law, who were to unite with the Commissioners in adopting a design. The Commissioners were to be governed by the plan so adopted, and the total cost of the building was not to exceed $3,000,000. March 5, 1867, they advertised "Notice to Architects," offering $3,000 to the architect whose design should be adopted for the new State House, and asking for plans and specifications to be submitted for their inspection.

EFFORTS TO NULLIFY THE LAW AND THEIR FAILURE.

A writ of quo warranto—or an inquiry as to their right or authority to act—was issued against the Commissioners, from the Superior Court of Chicago, May 13, 1867, on the relation of Mathew Ladin, and judgment of ouster was entered. The Commissioners appealed to the Supreme Court, and the decision was reversed at Ottawa, in September of that year. The Commissioners having advertised for proposals before the commencement of the suit, and having named the 15th of July as the time for inspecting the designs, and being deprived of the power to act by the decision of the Superior Court of Chicago, placed both themselves and architects in an awkward position. The Supreme Court, however, came to their relief by giving special permission to the Commissioners to call to their assistance the Committees on Public Buildings, as provided by law, and the inspection took place as previously intended, on the 15th of July, in the Senate Chamber at Springfield. A large number of designs were submitted to their inspection, and, after mature deliberation, that presented by J. C. Cochrane, of Chicago, was adopted.

The Commissioners, being compelled to remain inactive until after the meeting of the Supreme Court in September, it was too late in the season to do anything more than prepare for active business the next year. Their first act after the decision of the Supreme Court reinstating them was on the 8th of November, when they issued an advertisement for sealed proposals to do the excavating, and furnish certain descriptions of stone.

January 14, 1868, John C. Cochrane was appointed architect and superintendent, and a contract entered into for that purpose. January 18, a contract was made with N. Strott, of Springfield, for the excavation; and January 20th, with R. W. McClaghry & Co., of Hancock county, for stone to build the foundations. Broken stone, for concrete, was purchased, ready delivered, of J. J. & W. H. Mitchell, of Alton. March 25th, a contract was made with Barnard & Gowen, of Chicago, to do the mason work.

MAGNITUDE OF THE WORK.

The magnitude of the enterprise may be inferred from the fact that the parties who furnished the foundation stone gave security in the penal sum of $550,000 for the performance of contract, and those who do the mason work a penal sum of $200,000. Excavating was commenced early in the spring, but owing to the excessive rains the ground was not in a proper condition to commence laying stone until June 11, 1868. From that time until cold weather put a stop to it, the work was prosecuted vigorously, and a part of the foundation was brought to a level with the surface during the month of September.

LAYING CORNER STONE.

The Grand Master of Masons for the State of Illinois was invited by the Commissioners to assemble the craft for the purpose of laying the corner stone of the new State House with the imposing ceremonials of the order. The invitation was accepted, and October 5 set apart as the time at which it was to take place. A stone was prepared, eight feet long, four feet wide and three feet deep, with a recess for receiving such articles as it was thought desirable to deposit. A catalogue of them would fill one of these pages.

The day was bright and cheerful, and the procession the largest that had ever been seen at the Capital of the State, except at the obsequies of President Lincoln in May, 1865. Masons were present from all parts of the State, of all degrees, from Master Mason to Knight Templar. After the corner stone had been tested by the implements of the order, and pronounced well formed, true and trusty, it was placed in its proper position at the northeast corner of the building. An eloquent oration was then delivered by Hon. John D. Caton, of Ottawa. The ceremonies having closed, the craft and others present were called from labor to refreshment, and all repaired to the "Rink" to partake of a sumptuous collation prepared by the Lelands. After dinner the multitude dispersed to their homes, to treasure up the memories of the day as one of the most pleasant waymarks of their lives.

DESCRIPTION OF THE NEW STATE HOUSE.

Without regard to such technicalities as would be pleasing to architects, I shall endeavor to describe the edifice, in such language as will be most easily understood by the common reader. The ground plan is in the form of a great cross, and the superstructure is in the style called the classic order of architecture. It so blends the ancient and modern art of building as to secure the greatest strength and solidity and yet preserve an exterior appearance so light and airy as to be pleasant to the eye. The grand cut-lines are, total length from north to south, three hundred and fifty-nine feet, exclusive of the porticos, which adds twenty feet to each end. From east to west it is two hundred and sixty-six feet, with twenty feet additional in the grand portico at the east end, which is the principal front. There is an excavation underground of ten feet depth, throughout entire area. It is designed by the architect for the heating apparatus, the storage of fuel and other heavy articles. So much of the floor as is used, is to be covered with concrete.

The next above this is the first story; it is nineteen feet high, and entirely above ground. The floor of this story is supported by brick arches; and in the halls the arches are double, one being two feet below the other, to form viaducts to supply the rooms with fresh air. A layer of concrete covers the entire area of the arches, and upon this, imbedded in cement, is laid the marble floors throughout.

On this floor we find private rooms for the Judges of the Supreme Court, and committee rooms. The largest portion of this floor is devoted to the storage of stationery, printing paper, and all articles connected with or used in any other part of the building. One of these rooms is for the storage of geological specimens, and another for geological artists. One or more is for the Adjutant-General's office and museum. This story, in addition to the windows on all sides, is lighted by a glass ceiling in the centre, which forms the floor of the rotunda above.

Above this is the principal story, which is twenty-two feet and a half from floor to ceiling. On this floor is the main corridor, running the entire length of the building from north to south, and the grand corridor crossing it at right angles under the dome, and extending across the building from east to west. The main corridor is 359 feet long, twenty-four feet wide and twenty-two and a half feet high.

The sides of the main corridor will be finished with marble pilasters projecting from the walls, thus forming panels. The entire walls on both sides, consisting of pilasters with their caps and bases, panels and their borders, and door finish, are all to be of variegated marble, and the ceiling to be frescoed. The grand corridor, extending from the east portico to the grand stairway in the western wing, is so called in consideration of its great width—thirty-two feet—and because the pilasters are more massive and the finish more elaborate than in the main corridor.

The rooms on the floor described are to be used as follows: Governor's reception and private rooms; office of the Secretary of State; of the Treasurer of State, and of the Auditor of Public Accounts; Superintendent of Public Instruction; Superintendent of Public Instruction's library; law library; State document library; Attorney General's office; Supreme Court room; Supreme Court Clerk's office; four massive stone fire-proof vaults, and the State Treasurer's burglar-proof safe. The State Geologist's museum is just over the State Geologist's store-room, in the first story, with which it is connected by a private stairway; State Geologist's office. With all these, there are the necessary water closets, wash rooms, private offices, and the grand stairway, which leads to the story above. This flight is to be made of Tennessee marble, the steps each sixteen feet long.

The floors of this story are supported by wrought iron beams, properly braced with angle irons, all well secured with rivets. The spaces between the wrought iron beams are filled with brick arches, the whole of which is covered with concrete, having wooden strips imbedded, to hold the wooden floors, in the rooms only. The floors in the halls and corridors are all marble, chequered by alternate squares of different colors.

The principal entrance is at the east side, by an immense flight of stone steps, seventy-three feet wide, landing in a grand portico.

We will ascend the front steps, enter the east portico, pass along the grand corridor, over the glass floor in the rotunda, and continue west to the foot of the grand stairway, which we ascend to half the height of the story, then turn about, either to the right or left, and ascend to the second principal story. The floor of this story is constructed exactly as the one described below. Keep in mind that the entire edifice retains the form of a grand cross—first story, principal story, and second principal story. It is the floor of the latter on which we are now standing.

This story is forty-five feet from floor to ceiling. Let us enter the north angle or arm of the cross. Here we find the Senate Chamber, sixty-two by seventy-five feet, with the desk of the presiding officer at the north side. In the extreme north end of this wing, we find rooms properly arranged for the Speaker, Chief Clerk, Enrolling and Engrossing Clerks, Sergeant-at-Arms, postoffice, and folding room; with corridors on the east and west sides.

We will now pass out south, around the rotunda, and across the corridor into the hall of the House of Representatives, in the southern angle of the building. This hall is sixty-six by one hundred feet, with Speaker's desk at the south side. The desks here, as in the Senate Chamber, are in a semi-circular form. Here we find, under somewhat different arrangements, rooms attached for the same offices as those connected with the Senate Chamber. In both halls there are cloak rooms, wash rooms and water closets conveniently attached. Both are lighted in the day time, principally through the roof.

The east wing has rooms for the Canal Commissioners and committee rooms, with cloak and other necessary rooms attached. Between these rooms and the rotunda there is a lobby 26x104 feet, extending across the wing from north to south.

The west wing has rooms for the State Library, the Librarian, a reading room, and an audience room each for the Senate and House of Representatives.

The Senate Chamber and Representatives' Hall have each a gallery, extending around three sides, half way from floor to ceiling. A portion of the gallery in each house is set apart for the use of reporters of the press. On a level with the galleries, a floor extends over all the office rooms connected with both houses, the Governor's rooms, State Library, reception rooms, and all except the two legislative halls. This floor is divided into a great number of small rooms, for the use of committees of both houses, and is designated the gallery story.

To impress it on the mind, I will here recapitulate, that the body of the edifice above ground consists of the first story, principal story, second principal story, and gallery story.

The roof on all the wings is of the Mansard style, covered with slate on the sides and copper on top. Above all this rises the stately dome, surmounted by a lantern with a ball on the pinnacle, three hundred and twenty feet from the natural surface of the earth, being forty-three feet higher than the Capitol at Washington. The lantern is sixteen feet wide, and twenty-four feet from bottom to top. The frame work is of iron and the sides of glass. The floor of the lantern will be two hundred and eighty feet above the surface of the earth. An iron stairway ascending inside the dome will afford access to the lantern. The means of communicating between the basement story and the legislative halls will be by the grand stairway and two other public and three private stairways.

In addition to this, there will be two steam hoisting apparatus, or elevators, by means of which persons can ascend or descend from one to another of the floors, by simply stepping on and off a platform.

For heating and ventilating the building, there will be ten boilers, forty-eight inches in diameter, and twelve feet long. A steam engine of twenty horse-power will be used for running the elevator, and a fan, twelve feet in diameter, to produce sufficient circulation of air to ventilate the building in a proper manner. There will be 193,500 lineal feet of pipe, used to conduct the steam to all parts of the building.

The principal material used in the edifice is cut stone. Of this there will be nearly three-quarters of a million cubic feet, including the foundation. About one-half the stone is finely dressed, or planed. This does not include the marble, of which there is an enormous quantity. In addition to the stone in the walls, there will be about twenty millions of brick. Of wrought iron there will be one million, four hundred and fourteen thousand, one hundred and one pounds, or one thousand, two hundred and seven tons; and of cast iron three million, three hundred and seventy-three thousand, four hundred and fifty-six pounds, or one thousand, eight hundred and thirty-six and one-half tons.

The rotunda is seventy-six feet in diameter; from the glass floor, where the grand and main corridors cross each other, to the fresco painting, just beneath the dome will be two hundred and seventeen feet without any obstruction to the view whatever.

The three porticos, at the north, south, and east sides, are to have ten columns each. These columns are to be forty-five feet high, without the plinth block, which is four feet high. The base and cap pieces are to be cut separate; the two make nine feet of the height. Deduct this from forty-five, leaves thirty-six feet as the height, and four and a half feet diameter, as the dimensions of the columns. Thirty of these are to be cut in single pieces each, from stone in the quarry, if any such can be found.

Let us take our position in front of the east portico. It is ninety feet wide. From each of the front corners rises a turret to the height of one hundred and thirty-two feet. That on the right, or to the north, is to be surmounted by a statue of Lincoln, and the one on the left, or to the south, by a statue of Douglas. This, as I have stated, is the principal front, or entrance.

I have thus described, from the working drawings and the book of specifications of Cochran & Piquenard, superintending architects, the merest outline of the new Capitol of Illinois, now in course of construction, as it will appear when completed. Let us see what has been done towards carrying out the designs laid down on the trestle-board.

WORK COMPLETED.

The excavation for the foundation on which the great dome is to rest is twenty-five feet below the natural surface of the ground, and at the bottom is a solid ledge of stone. The area is circular, and is ninety-two and one-half feet in diameter. The foundation was commenced by covering the entire space, to an average depth of six feet, with concrete—that is, broken stone, cement, clean sharp sand, and water. This concrete receives the heavy stone walls, of an average of seventeen feet in thickness, till brought to the level of the first floor, which is twenty-four feet above the concrete. These walls are not made of heavy stone on the outside and filled in with small ones, but they are all large; some of them two, three, and four tons weight, each. Think of the thickness of the walls, standing on a solid ledge of limestone, and perhaps you can comprehend their solidity!

The excavation for the outer walls around the entire building is twelve feet beneath the surface, and nine feet wide. The walls are commenced with two feet depth of concrete all over the bottom. They are eight feet and eight inches wide at the bottom, and run up, with offsets, to six feet three inches at the ground-line. Parts of the walls are seven feet nine inches at the bottom, tapered to five feet four inches; and yet other portions, ten feet and eleven inches at the bottom, and eight feet six inches at the top, or natural surface of the ground. The stones in all the foundation are large. Not a single one is put in place by hand—they are all moved by steam derricks. One of these machines will take a stone of many tons weight, lift it from the ground, swing it to its place on the wall, and lay it down as easy and gently as a child would take a peach from the floor and lay it on a table.

The foundation was commenced by laying the first stone June 11, 1868, and finished in August, 1869. This includes the foundation for the dome and the outer walls around the entire building—two hundred and sixty-six by three hundred and fifty-nine feet, with all the buttresses on the outside and the inside walls and piers. The superstructure to rise on these walls is to be of heavy stone, with brick backing. To the top of the first story, which is twenty-five feet above the ground-line; they are five feet thick. All the walls are now completed to that height. Viewed from all sides, now, it begins to disclose its vast proportions.

From the top of the basement story to the cornice, sixty feet, the walls are to be four feet thick. The brick backing is so constructed as to make them hollow, for the purpose of keeping the interior dry.

W. D. Clark is the assistant superintendent, under the architects. He has done the civil engineering, also; having set every stake and laid every line.

A great outcry has been made by some parties that the work was defective. Those who make such charges are either ignorant of what they say or write, or they have some less worthy object in view than to subserve the interests of the State. To those who know Mr. Clark, such a charge seems utterly absurd. They would be no more surprised to hear that he had put his hand in the fire without an object, than to learn that he had permitted a piece of defective material or workmanship to enter into the construction of the edifice.

The entire outer surface of the building, below the Mansard, will be planed Illinois limestone. It is taken from the quarries near Joliet. By a law, enacted in 1869, the work of preparing the stone is confined to the convicts in the State penitentiary. The contractors have, at all times, promptly discharged their obligations.

EPITOME OF THE LEGISLATION FOR THE NEW STATE HOUSE.

The laws of February 25 and 27, 1867, to provide for the erection of a new State House, appropriated $450,000 to begin the work; declared that the total cost should not exceed $3,000,000; named seven Commissioners and one Secretary to carry out the law; limited the amount of expenditures and liabilities they should incur within the amount appropriated, and declared that everything in excess of that should be deemed unlawful.

Laws of March 11 and 27, 1869, legislated the seven Commissioners and Secretary out of office; provided for the appointment of three Commissioners, by the Governor; ordered that all stone, iron, and labor for the new State House that could be procured at the penitentiary, in Joliet, should be obtained there, and at no other place; required the new Commissioners to have a new copy of plans, specifications, and estimates made in detail; and when completed, to notify the Committees of the Senate and House of Representatives on Public Buildings and State Library. And said Committee were instructed to hold a joint session, to examine the plans, specifications, and estimates; and in the event of their being satisfied that the building could be completed within the limit of $3,000,000, in addition to what had already been expended, they were to order the Commissioners to proceed; appropriated $650,000, to be used in carrying forward the work on the new State House, but prohibited the use of it until the above conditions were complied with.

Under the law of March 11, 1869, Governor Palmer appointed Jacob Bunn, James C. Robinson and James H. Beveridge as Commissioners to continue the work of constructing the new State House. The board organized April 12, 1869, by electing Jacob Bunn President and James H. Beveridge Secretary. The Commissioners at once caused detailed plans, specifications and estimates for continuing the work on the new State House to be prepared by the superintending architects. They notified the committees of the Senate and House of Representatives, and a joint session was held in the Senate Chamber at Springfield, April 27, 1869, and a copy of the plans and specifications was laid before them. At a meeting of the committees, on the 12th of May, it was

"Resolved, That the State House Commissioners be and they hereby are authorized to complete the foundation of the new State House under existing contracts, and to expend the balance of the appropriation first made, or as much thereof as may be necessary for the purpose."

The work was commenced immediately and the foundation completed early in August, as previously stated.

The total estimates of the superintending architects, submitted with plans and specifications, amounted to $2,650,885. The joint committee deemed it advisable to have the opinions of parties who were not interested, called to their assistance Augustus Bauer and Asher Carter, architects, and W. C. Deakman, master builder, all of Chicago, and had them make an estimate in detail, according to the same plans and specifications, and their estimate was $2,737,940.86—no greater difference in proportion than two bidders would make on almost any piece of work.

The joint committee did not complete their investigations until August 26, 1869. They then ordered the Commissioners to go forward with the work according to the plans and specifications, with certain alterations recommended by the superintending architects and master builder. They publicly expressed the belief that it could be finished within the $3,000,000, and that "when completed it would be a beautiful, convenient and permanent structure, worthy of the State."

Thus the best part of another season passed away with such hindrances as prevented the Commissioners from prosecuting the work as energetically as they desired to do.

The Convention called by the people of Illinois, for the purpose of framing a new Constitution for the State, recognized the fact that the Capital had been permanently located at Springfield by legal authority, and that a positive law required the work of all State officers and all legislative enactments to be done at Springfield, as the Capital; and that laws had been passed by two previous legislatures, making large appropriations of money for building a new edifice in which to transact the business of the State; and that a design had been adopted on a scale of grandeur and magnificence in proportion to its wealth and influence, deemed it wise to insert a clause in the new Constitution to guard against abuses too often practiced in connection with works erected at public expense.

The Constitutional Convention, therefore, inserted under the miscellaneous head the following:

"Section 33. The General Assembly shall not appropriate out of the State Treasury, or expend on account of the new Capitol grounds, and construction, completion and furnishing of the State House, a sum exceeding, in the aggregate, three and a half millions of dollars, inclusive of all appropriations heretofore made, without first submitting the proposition for an additional expenditure to the legal voters of the State, at a general election, nor unless a majority of all the votes cast at such election shall be for the proposed additional expenditure."

With this provision in the new Constitution, it was submitted to the people July 2, 1870, and adopted by an overwhelming majority.

The appropriation of February 25, 1867, was $450,000, and that of March 11, 1869, $650,000, making a total of $1,100,000.

The expenditures have been as follows:

From beginning to December 30, 1868.....	$354,126 12
From December 30, 1868, to March 11, 1869.....	16,657 07

Total expenditures by first Board of seven Commissioners.....	$370,783 29
---	--------------

The Board of three Commissioners appointed by Governor Palmer, under the law of March 11, 1869, have carried the work forward, and their expenditures—

To November 30, 1869, were.....	$156,876 76
From November 30, 1869, to November 30, 1870.....	277,543 13
From November 30, 1870, to February 1, 1871.....	77,918 79
Total to February 1, 1871.....	$883,121 87
From February 1 to April 14, 1871.....	53,096 91
Due for iron on the way from Belgium....	12,895 30
Total.....	$949,114 08

There is due on existing contracts, for materials and for work, enough to bring the total expenditure up to about $1,000,000, leaving about $100,000 of the appropriation of 1869 unexpended.

Early in the session of the General Assembly, which convened January 4, 1871, a bill was introduced in the Senate, appropriating $600,000 to carry on the work of the new State House. It passed that body by a very small number of dissenting votes. In the House of Representatives it was read a first and second time, and ordered to a third reading, but was not reached in the regular order of business, when the legislature adjourned temporarily, on the seventeenth of April.

The sessions of the General Assembly being biennial, each alternate year brings, to a large extent, a new class of men together in the legislative halls. The public has been so accustomed to hear of fraud in connection with buildings of this kind, that men coming for the first time, and looking upon the colossal proportions of this edifice, take it for granted that there must be jobs and peculations, and, without investigating the subject, there are always those who are ready to cry out, "Rings! Rings! Steals! Steals!"

By these devices, one of the two years connected with each legislature has been frittered away from the commencement, and this order of things seems destined to continue. From this cause the year 1867 was one of inactivity; in 1868, work was done; 1869 was one of idleness; 1870 work, and 1871 is likely to be one of idleness also.

The Commissioners, Jacob Bunn, James C. Robinson and James H. Beveridge have passed through two years of investigation out of the four since the work commenced, and in each instance have emerged from the ordeal without the smell of fire upon their garments. Should the present year prove to be one of inactivity, it will be no fault of theirs; and their works are the only vindication they need, concerning which they take pleasure in giving all the information in their power.

The following quotation from the law, which has been strictly complied with in every particular, is a sufficient refutation, in the estimation of all honest men, of the ridiculous charge that Mr. Bunn is using the money appropriated for building the State House in his banking business:

"The accounts of the expenditures of said commissioners shall be certified by said commissioners, or a majority of them, and the Secretary of State, and approved by the Governor. The Auditor shall thereupon draw his warrant upon the Treasurer therefor, to be paid out of the fund herein before provided, in favor of the party to whom the accounts shall be due."

It will thus be seen that Mr. Bunn, like all other citizens, cannot receive a dollar of the State House money except for services rendered, or materials furnished, and then only when his bill is allowed by his associates in office, certified by the Secretary of State, and approved by the Governor.

It will not be considered exaggeration by any man who has honestly endeavored to obtain correct information on the subject, for me to say that the work on the new State House has been as well done, and the duties of all connected with it as faithfully discharged, as they have been with any similar undertaking on the American Continent.

It will be such a magnificent structure, and so well adapted to the uses for which it is designed, that the people can afford to be patient. The work is now about one-third done, and if this should prove to be the last year of idleness, it may yet be completed in time to use it in celebrating the first Centennial of American Independence. It will be well worthy of such a christening.

Some changes were made in the plans as given by Mr. Power in the foregoing statement. The excavation underneath the building for the heating apparatus was never used, but a building was erected for that purpose about one block north. The room over the State Geologist's store room is now used by the Agricultural Department, and the Geologist's museum occupies the room intended for the library. The library room is now between the Secretary of State's office and the Index Department of that office. There are only two galleries in each Representatives' Hall and Senate Chamber. The gallery on the north, in the Representatives' Hall, is designed as a ladies' gallery, and the one on the south for gentlemen. The gallery on the south in the Senate Chamber is for the ladies, and the one on the north for gentlemen. The Reporters' stands are on each side of the Speaker of the House and President of the Senate respectively.

The building has never been entirely completed, but has been occupied since 1877. In 1876 the question was submitted to a vote of the people as to whether an additional appropriation should be made of $500,000 to complete the building. In consequence of the hard times then existing, and the fact that many were prejudiced against the State Capital, a majority of the people voted against the appropriation. Since that time an area of prosperity has dawned upon the people, and many thousands have visited the Capital building, and went away resolved should the question again be submitted, to vote for the appropriation. Completed according to the plans given in the foregoing pages the State House will be an ornament to the State and the pride of the people.

CHAPTER XVI.

TEMPERANCE.

The cause of temperance is one that has always enlisted the services of the moral and benevolent of earth. As far back as the history of the world can be traced, intemperance has existed. Laws have been promulgated against it, warnings have been given over and over again, and yet man will continue to use the intoxicating cup, notwithstanding Solomon, the wise man, has said, "Look not thou upon the wine when it is red, when it giveth the color in the cup, for at last it biteth like a serpent and stingeth like an adder," and a greater than Solomon has added, "That no drunkard can inherit the kingdom of heaven."

In the first half of the present century, but few large distilleries existed, while every neighborhood must have its "still." A new settlement was no sooner formed than an enterprising individual would erect his still, and commence the manufacture of whisky, pure and unadulterated. The surplus corn of the country could be used in no other way; at least, such was thought to be the case. Every merchant advertised whisky as one of the specialties of his store. The whisky jug was thought to be an indispensable help in the harvest field, or at house-raising, log-rollings, and corn-huskings; nor was the decanter, with its exhilarating contents, generally wanting at social gatherings. Liquor bought by the gallon, and even by the barrel, was kept in the house for daily use. Before partaking of breakfast, the glass was passed around and partaken of, to give an appetite, and in the evening it was used as a "night-cap" before going to bed. When bittered by some herb or drug, it was used as a sovereign remedy for most of the ailments flesh is heir to, and often as a preventive. Liquor being one of the specialties in the early country stores, some merchants were wont to treat their customers, especially when making large bills, and often previous to purchasing, in order to sharpen their appetite for trading. One store at the county seat was in the habit of treating a customer every time a purchase was made, be it large or small. An old toper, taking advantage of the generosity of the proprietor, had occasion to make a great many small purchases, then helping himself from the decanter placed at the disposal of customers. His calls became so frequent as to become a bore to the young salesman in the store, a nephew of the proprietor. The young man determined to try the "heroic remedy" on the old toper, to cure him of his frequent visits. Accordingly, on one occasion, just about the time he was expecting the regular visit of the man, he emptied all the whisky out of the decanter but enough for one dram. Preparations were no sooner made than in came the visitor. Purchasing a small plug of tobacco, he stepped around and picked up the decanter. Noticing the small quantity in it, he said:

"Charley, the decanter is nearly empty."

"Yes," replied the clerk, "but, never mind; there is enough for one dram. Help yourself."

The man poured out all there was, and drank it down almost at a gulp. He no sooner done so than he had an urgent call out in the rear of the house. The young clerk had placed a drop of croton oil in the decanter. The store lost a customer and the young man received a glorious thrashing from his uncle.

As already stated, whisky was generally considered necessary at every house-raising. It must be borne in mind by the reader that in the early day the houses built were invariably of hewn or round logs, and it required the assistance of a large number of men to erect one. The necessity of having a supply of whisky at these raisings often put the pioneer to considerable inconvenience, and occasionally delayed the raising a much longer time than desired. As an illustration:

Maxwell Campbell, of Cartwright township, came to this county in the spring of 1823. He was so poor that he raised his three first crops with a single ox, which he used for all purposes as he would a horse, riding him to market, grinding his grain with him in a horse-mill, and then carrying it home on its back. He first built a small cabin, then prepared hewn logs for a much larger one. They were hauled to the site of the proposed building, and there lay for two years for the reason that he had no money to buy whisky for the raising. He had bought a blind horse for five dollars in trade. The horse had a bell on it which Mr. Campbell sold for two gallons of whisky, and was thus enabled to raise his house.

Dawson McGinnis came to the county in 1827, and like nearly all other early settlers, he was poor in this world's goods, but rich in faith of the "good time coming." He prepared his logs for his cabin and hauled them up to the place where it was to be erected. By that time all his money was gone except a twenty-five cent piece. He did not like to part with his last cent, not knowing where the next was to come from, but it was the universal custom to have whisky at the raisings. The raising was delayed for a time, hoping to find some way to obtain the whisky and save the money. The thought was entertained of inviting the neighbors to assist without the accustomed stimulant, though it was doubtful if they would come. Consulting with his wife, the two decided that even though they responded to the call and helped them he would always be regarded as the stingiest man in the whole county, and that it would be better to part with the money than to have such a name. The whisky was purchased and the house raised.

While intemperance largely exists, it is evident that it has greatly decreased within the present generation. According to population there are not as many drunkards, nor is there as much liquor consumed as a third or a half century ago. This leads to the further declaration that can well be substantiated, that the efforts put forth by the temperance people in times past have not proven a failure. That organizations have flourished for a time and then cease to exist proves nothing. These organizations were but human instrumentalities brought forth by the necessities of the hour, their design being to accomplish a certain purpose then apparent. It is not to be expected that they will be as enduring as the hills, or so strong that "the gates of hell shall not prevail against them." If they accomplish a good work for the time, well and good. If it be found that there is a radical defect in their organizations necessitating a change, let it be made, and let it not be imagined because they are defective and have not accomplished all the good their most sanguine supporters anticipated, that nothing has been done. All over the country can be found sober, honest and good men, who, but for the effort put forth by the members of some temperance organization that has ceased to exist, would now fill a drunkard's grave.

Whisky, in the early day, was generally sold for cash—all other goods on credit. Of course it was not expensive, as a good quality could be purchased for two or three shillings per gallon. Occasionally some impecunious persons, desiring to go on a spree, and having no money, were required to resort to their wits to procure the liquid fluid. A good story is told of a crowd who were so situated. One of their number got a jug, and, filling it about half full of water, went to a grocery and called for a quart of whisky, remarking that some of the boys wished to have a little fun, but didn't have quite whisky enough. The whisky was drawn and the man picked up the jug and started for the door, without saying a word about paying for it. The proprietor told him to come back, as whisky was cash. The man replied that he had no money. "Well, you can't have the whisky then," was the answer. Appearing mad, the man stepped back, and with an oath, told the proprietor to take his old whisky. The quart was drawn out of the jug, when it was again taken to the public well, and more water put in. A second grocery was visited, another quart of whisky drawn and emptied back. Again he went to the well for more water, and a third place was visited, and a half gallon was called for, poured in the jug and drawn off. The man appeared mad, but it was just what he desired should be done; so he left the third place with a half gallon as good whisky as the merchant poured back in his barrel from the jug. This was a first-class article, and the boys were thus afforded a rare chance for a good drunk, after the most approved style.

Although the whisky of that early day was said to be pure, yet it would "make the drunk come;" men would become shiftless from its continual use; houses would be neglected; heart-broken and sorrowing wives, ragged and hungry children existed, and all from the use of rum.

Notwithstanding whisky is thought to be a preventive for nearly every disease, it has been proven by actual statistics to be a source of disease, the habitual drinker being more liable to attack from various diseases than the total abstainer. Especially has this been proven to be the case in diseases of an epidemic nature, such as cholera.

The Temperance Recorder, November 6, 1832, contains what it says is "An authentic record of deaths by cholera in the city of Albany, from the commencement to the cessation of daily reports, in the summer of 1832, omitting all under the age of sixteen years" Nine physicians testify to the truth of the record. The following is an abstract from the report:

EARLY TEMPERANCE MOVEMENTS.

During the summer of 1829, Dr. Jayne placed in the hands of Rev. J. G. Bergen, a copy of Dr. Lyman Beecher's six sermons on intemperance, which he read one by one to the people on six successive Sabbath afternoons. Curiosity about drunkenness in the East brought the people out. Mr. Bergen prepared the constitution of a temperance society, and, after reading that well-known tract, "Putnam and the Wolf," invited the congregation to sign the pledge. Eleven persons put down their names. In a short time there were more than fifteen hundred signers in the county. This was the first temperance society in Central Illinois, and probably the first in the State.

In 1834, a society known as the Springfield Temperance Society was in existence. This society pledged its members to "abstain from the use, and use all lawful means to put a stop to vending and drinking distilled ardent spirits." This society was composed only of adults. At the same time a juvenile temperance society was organized, showing the people realized the truth of the old proverb that "an ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure," and were determined to use every means to prevent the young from forming habits of intemperance.

A county temperance society was organized about this time, under the name of the "Sangamon County Temperance Society," with branch societies in the various townships and villages in the county. The local papers of the period failed to record the proceedings of any of the meetings, until 1837, when an account of an annual meeting held in Springfield, February 28, is given. At this meeting, the following named officers were elected: Chas. R. Matheny, President; Thomas Moffett and C. B. Francis, Vice-Presidents; S. M. Sill, Secretary; John Dickey, Treasurer.

THE WASHINGTONIANS.

In the month of December, 1841, some men from Alton came to Springfield to inaugurate the new temperance reform, which began its career in the winter previous, in the city of Baltimore, and had spread like wildfire all over the land. Success had crowned the efforts of the workers, from the commencement of their labors. The places in which their meetings were held were crowded to suffocation. Like the Athenians of old, many attended out of curiosity, desiring to "know what these babblers had to say." The plea they presented was such as to appeal to the heart and reason of everyone. A local paper under date of December 31, 1841, says:

"The cause goes gloriously on. The society in this city has more than three hundred and fifty members. The spirit seems to have been caught in the neighboring settlements of this county. At two small gatherings near Springfield, about one-half of the persons present joined the standard of reform.

"A Christmas like that just passed was never before witnessed here. Our streets the whole day were free from exhibitions which before had been common; not an intoxicated man was seen on them; and those who had once spent the day in drinking and carousals, enjoyed it most happily in the society of their families. What a change! What happiness to themselves and to those whose weal and woe are committed to their charge!

"Not a Washingtonian has flinched the fiery trial he has been compelled to undergo. Though the desire to indulge in former courses in some instances, we may well suppose, has been terrible, yet bravely and triumphantly they have borne themselves up against it. They have proved themselves worthy soldiers of the immortal chief-tain whose banner waves over them.

"What is strange, singular, and not to be wondered at, all our Washingtonians seemed to have been imbued with the missionary spirit, and all are engaged with their might in urging on the great work of reform. It is the talk of the mechanic's bench, the slaughter-house, the wood-cutter's stand, the merchant's counter. Few, indeed, there are that are not affected by its influence. May the spirit progress until it extends over the length and breadth of our land! This reform is producing a most kindly feeling among our citizens. A class of men who felt they were degraded almost beyond the reach of hope; that their condition could not be changed, and who had been inclined to look upon those who had by industry, sobriety and economy, rendered themselves more comfortable and happy than they were, with jealousy and distrust if not with hate, under the influence of this reform, find themselves surrounded with friends where they did not expect them, and the sympathies and well-wishes of all enlisted in their behalf. Need we wonder that such a state of things opens almost a new world upon the reformed? That their step is light, that their heart is filled with hope, and that those who are connected with them by the endearing ties of wife, children, parent, or brother, are rejoicing almost 'with joy unspeakable'? It is so. Every man among us see it—and feels it—and blesses the day when the three Baltimoreans raised the banner of 'Washington Reform.'"

The meeting for the organization of the society was held Monday afternoon, December 12, 1841. Messrs. Todd, Webster, Powell, Matheny and Pease were appointed a committee to nominate officers. They reported the following named, who were duly elected:

President.—William D. Herndon.

Vice-President.—Gould Butler, W. W. Watson, and Jesse B. Thomas.

Directors.—A. R. Robinson, Thomas J. Turley, Allen Francis, Frederick C. McComas, Strother J. Jones.

Recording Secretary.—William W. Pease.

Corresponding Secretary.—James H. Matheny.

Treasurer.—William Lavelly.

A committee on Constitution was appointed who reported the following:

CONSTITUTION OF THE SPRINGFIELD WASHINGTON TEMPERANCE SOCIETY.

We, the friends of temperance in the city of Springfield, who have signed the pledge of the Washington Temperance Society, believe that when men have so far indulged in the use of intoxicating liquor as to render themselves wretched and miserable, and in many cases their families destitute and unhappy, that they may and can be redeemed and reinstated to comfort, peace and happiness by the aid and assistance of their fellow men. And being desirous to preserve inviolate our own pledge, and to see every man in our community, as well as the whole country, rescued from that degradation, which sooner or later awaits those who continue to indulge in the accursed draught, and believing, as we do, that in union alone there is safety, do associate ourselves under the following Constitution.

ARTICLE 1. This Society shall be called the First Springfield Washington Temperance Society.

ART. 2. This Society shall give no preference to any political party or religious sect, but its sole object shall be to advance the cause of temperance, and especially direct its efforts to the redemption of our fellow men who have been degraded by the use of intoxicating liquors.

ART. 3. Any person having signed the Washington Temperance Pledge in this city, and who adheres strictly to the same, shall be a member of this Society, and if any one shall be so unfortunate as to violate said pledge, his case shall be brought before the Society, whose duty it shall be to use every other means to restore him before he shall be expelled.

[Articles 4, 5, 6, 7 and 8 refer to the officers, their duties, and to time of meetings, and amendments to the constitution, how made.]

ART. 9. No political or religious question shall be discussed at any meeting of this Society; and no person shall be permitted to take any part in the proceedings of the meeting, or address the Society, except those who have signed a Washington Temperance pledge, unless they be specially invited by the Society.

The pledge adopted by the Society was a very simple one, as follows:

The undersigned, being desirous of carrying out the principles of temperance, do pledge our honor that we will abstain from all intoxicating drinks:

The Society proposed to be charitable and missionary, as witness the following resolutions, passed at one of its meetings:

Resolved, That the Society pledges itself to assist the members of this Society and their families, who may now or hereafter be in necessitous circumstances.

Resolved, That the President be authorized to appoint delegates to explain the objects and principles of this Society in the neighboring settlements, and that such delegates report their proceedings and the results of their labors, at the regular meetings of this Society.

It will be observed that reformation seemed to be the watchword of the Society—to restore to their families, and to society in general, those who had fallen. The mantle of charity was to be thrown around a weak brother who violated his pledge, and every effort was to be made to restore him, and to help him keep inviolate his sacred obligation, rather than to expel him.

The following touching song was a favorite with the Washingtonians:

WASHINGTON SONG.

TUNE—"There's nae Luck About the House."

And are ye sure the news is true,
And are ye sure he's signed?
I can't believe the joyful tale,
And leave my fears behind.
If John has signed and drinks no more,
The happiest wife am I
That ever swept a cottage hearth,
Or sung a lullaby.
For there's nae luck about the house,
There's been nae luck at a';
And gone's the comfort of the house
Since he to drink drink did fa'.

Oh! yes, we're sure the news is true;
Indeed, your John has signed;
This happy day you'll never rue,
Nor past misfortunes mind.
Your John has signed and drinks no more,
The happiest man is he
That ever sat in cottage door,
Or loved a bonny c'e.
There was nae luck about the house.
There was no luck at a';
But comfort now will bless the house,
And fortune soon will fa'.

Whose eye so kind, whose hand so strong,
Whose love so true will shine,
If he have bent his hand and heart
The total pledge to sign?
But what puts doubting in my heart?
I trust he'll taste no more;
Be still, be still, my beating heart—
Hark! hark! he's at the door.
For there's nae luck about the house,
There's been nae luck at a';
And gone's the comfort of the house
Since he to drink did fa'.

'Tis true, 'tis true, my lovely Kate,
The total pledge I've signed;
No longer I'm intemperate,
No more to shame consigned.
Let not distrust your heart affect,
I'll never taste it more;
This sacred pledge I'll e'er respect,
And run a different score!
There was no luck about the house,
There was no luck at a';
But comfort now will bless the house,
And fortune soon will fa'.

Now blessings on the helping hands
That sent thee back to me;
Haste, haste, ye little ones, and run,
Your father's face to see.
And now I'm sure, my John, you've signed,
And I am sure 'tis past,
That mine's the happiest, brightest home,
On Temperance shores at last.
There was no luck about the house,
But now 'tis comfort a',
And heaven preserve your own gude man,
That he may never fa'.

As an organization, the Washingtonian Societies of Sangamon county, have long since ceased to exist, but there are living to-day, some whom but for the pledge signed in the winter of 1841 and 1842, would doubtless be filling to-day drunkard's graves.

A GRAND JURY'S CERTIFICATE.

At the March term, 1843, of the Circuit Court, of Sangamon county, an unusual number of indictments were found, and previous to their adjournment the members comprising that body left the following upon record:

"We, the undersigned, members of the Grand Jury of the county of Sangamon, State of Illinois, at the March term of the Circuit Court of said county, believe, from the investigations had before us, that most, if not all, the crimes and misdemeanors which have been brought before this jury, had their first, if not immediate cause, in intemperance."

William Butler, foreman, V. Hay,
B. A. Watson,	Abner Riddle,
David Newson,	James Stephenson,
John Branson,	John Broadwell,
Gershom Keyes,	E. G. Johns,
James G. Webb,	W. Armstrong,
William H. Marsh,	P. C. Latham,
	Robert Irwin.

One of the jury made the following statement: "I, S. Britton, believes that intemperance is the means from which many of the crimes that came before the jury, originated."

SONS OF TEMPERANCE.

After the Washingtonians came the Sons of Temperance, an organization having for its motto, "Love, Purity, and Fidelity." The "Sons" were composed of males above the age of eighteen, and held their meetings in secret, believing that they could more fully carry out the object of the order. To enable the wives and daughters of members to engage in the good work, the "Daughters of Temperance" were organized; and for the benefit of males between the age of fourteen and eighteen, the "Cadets of Temperance" were organized. Thus every member in the family were secured as workers in the good cause. The "Sons" formed their first Division in this county in 1848, and for many years were in a flourishing condition.

As already stated the motto of the order is "Love, Purity and Fidelity." The three divine principles enunciated by this motto are poetically expressed in the following.

Three sunny islets on life's river,
Three golden arrows in life's quiver,

ROBERT IRWIN

Three stars that never fade or dim,
 Three notes that angels love to hymn.
 Three charms that guard the heart from sorrow,
 Three whispers of a brighter morrow;
 Three links that bind with silken bands,
 Three words whose might should rule all lands.
 Three life preservers on Time's ocean,
 Three voices 'mid that heart's commotion;
 Three fragrant flowers most fair to see,
 Three garlands twining round life's tree;
 Three gems of pure ethereal light,
 Three paths still lovely, pure and bright;
 Three rays of light from Heaven's throne,
 Where naught but happiness is known.

TEMPLE OF HONOR.

Almost contemporaneous with the Sons of Temperance was the Temple of Honor, which combined the principles of temperance with the benevolent features of such organization as the Masons and Odd Fellows. Every person desiring to become a member of the order had to be proposed for membership and was required to be of the requisite age and in good health. A fair degree of success attended this order.

THE MAINE LAW.

Shortly after the passage of the prohibitory liquor law in the State of Maine, the question of a similar law began to be agitated in this State. In Sangamon county it had many and strong advocates, among whom were B. S. Edwards, S. W. Robbins, James H. Matheny, J. T. Stuart, and others.

In January, 1853, a State Convention was held in Springfield, at which were representative men from all parts of the State. Judge Lockwood presided, and S. W. Robbins, of Springfield, was one of the Vice-Presidents. B. S. Edwards made an eloquent and logical address, which met the approbation of all in attendance. The convention petitioned the General Assembly, which was then in session, for the submission of a prohibitory law to the people for adoption or rejection. The prayer of the petitioners was granted and the question was voted upon a few months after. The people were not then ready for the law and it was defeated, Sangamon county giving a majority against the law.

GOOD TEMPLARS.

The Independent Order of Good Templars originated in 1851, and was the outgrowth of a desire to unite all the members of a family in one order, and with the laudable object of "saving the fallen and preventing others from falling." It may be said the latter object has been more fully met in this order than in any other temperance organization. "Here you find the entire family united around one common altar." Many of the strong temperance advocates to-day were in early life initiated in this beautiful and noble order, and had the principles of temperance thoroughly inculcated in their mind before habits of intemperance were formed. They bless the day they were made "Templars;" and even if not actively engaged in the work, they pray the blessings of God to rest upon the order.

The first lodge of Good Templars was instituted, in this county, about the year 1855, since which time the order here has had seasons of prosperity and seasons of adversity. Like all other human organizations, its members at times are enthusiastic, and work together in harmony, and success therefore attends their every movement. Again, divisions occur; the members refuse to co-operate with one another,—and the order takes a backward stride.

WOMEN'S TEMPERANCE CRUSADE.

In the winter of 1873, a movement was inaugurated in Ohio, which was denominated the "Women's Temperance Crusade," from the fact that a few noble women, despairing of success for the cause of temperance as advocated and enforced by the professed temperance people, proceeded to try the efficacy of prayer. Bands of praying women visited the various saloons in the neighborhood, and the songs and prayers forced the rum-sellers to close their shops. Their very earnestness had its effect upon all classes of society, and men and women who were lukewarm in the cause became aroused, and renewed their fight against the enemy. The "crusade" spread with great rapidity throughout the whole North. The movement had been as startling in its character as a clap of thunder from a clear sky, and the cloud which had been at first no bigger than a man's hand had suddenly overspread the whole heavens. The opponents to the reform all claimed to be friendly, but—they thought some other method of bringing it about preferable. Moral suasion was urged as the one sure remedy, and the liquor sellers wanted their opponents to be careful to keep within the bounds of the law. Mrs. Emma Malloy, who took a very active part in the movement, and who for many years has been a worker in the cause of temperance, said that she was often asked what she thought of the movement, but hesitated to give a reply, lest her answer should be less reverent than the subject seemed to demand. She could not doubt but the movement was a natural revulsion, an eruption of the smoldering fires that for centuries past had been pent up in the heart of woman. She could not doubt but that the hand of God had shaken these internal fires, and could only gaze with awe and reverence at the mighty upheaving that thrilled the Nation from center to circumference. She was convinced that woman was not satisfied to sit with folded hands while the first-born of the Nation was being slain, while the fairest and purest of every household in the land were the victims of the fell destroyer. The heart of woman had thrilled with silent anguish; she had wept her night of sorrow through; and now had arisen the host of Israel. The foe was being routed. "The glad dawn whose early twilight" all had been gazing down the centuries of Time to see, had come.

RED AND BLUE RIBBON MOVEMENT.

The next movement in behalf of temperance was that known as the "Red Ribbon movement," which was the direct result of the women's crusade. An interest had been awakened throughout the land in the cause of temperance by the crusade, but many who were not religiously inclined, or who were conscientiously opposed to the work, as performed by the women, were yet ready to embrace some other method that would lead to good results. At the opportune moment the Red Ribbon movement was set on foot, and rapidly spread throughout the land. Sangamon county was behind no other, and red and blue ribbon clubs were formed in nearly every village in the county, as well as in the city of Springfield.

CHAPTER XVII.

THE WAR FOR THE UNION.

The institution of slavery was always a source of trouble between the free and slave-holding States. The latter were always troubled with the thought that the former would encroach upon their rights, and nothing could be done to shaken this belief. Compromise measures were adopted from time to time to settle the vexed question of slavery, but the fears of the slaveholders were only allayed for a short time. Threats of secession were often made by the slaveholding States, but as some measure of a conciliatory character was passed, no attempt was made to carry their threats into execution. Finally came the repeal of the Missouri Compromise and the adoption of a measure known as the Kansas-Nebraska bill. This bill opened certain Territory to slavery which under the former act was forever to be free. About the time of the passage of this act, the Whig party was in a state of dissolution, and the great body of that party, together with certain Democrats who were opposed to the Kansas-Nebraska bill, united, thus forming a new party to which was given the name of Republican, having for its object the prevention of the further extension of slavery. The people of the South imagined they saw in this new party an organized effort not only to prevent the extension of slavery, but that which would eventually be used to destroy slavery in such States in which it already existed.

In 1860, four Presidential tickets were in the field. Two of these candidates were from Illinois, one of whom was a citizen of Springfield and the other had been. Abraham Lincoln was the candidate of the Republicans, Stephen A. Douglas of the National Democrats, John C. Breckenridge of the Pro-Slavery interests, and John Bell of the Union. The Union party was composed principally of those who had previously affiliated with the American or Know-Nothing party. Early in the campaign there were threats of secession and disunion in case of the election of Abraham Lincoln, but the people were so accustomed to Southern bravado that little heed was given to the bluster.

On the twentieth of December, 1860, South Carolina, by a convention of delegates, declared "That the Union now existing between South Carolina and other States of North America is dissolved, and that the State of South Carolina has resumed her position among the Nations of the earth as a free, sovereign and independent State, with full power to levy war and conclude peace, contract alliances, establish commerce, and do all other acts and things which independent States may of right do."

On the twenty-fourth, Governor Pickens issued a proclamation declaring that "South Carolina is, and has a right to be, a free and independent State, and as such has a right to levy war, conclude peace, negotiate treaties, leagues and covenants, and to do all acts, whatever, that rightfully appertain to a free and independent State."

On the 26th, Major Anderson evacuated Fort Moultrie, and occupied Fort Sumter. Two days previously he wrote President Buchanan's Secretary of War, John B. Floyd, as follows: "When I inform you that my garrison consists of only sixty effective men, and that we are in very indifferant works, the walls of which are only fourteen feet high, and that we have within one hundred and sixty yards of our walls, sand hills which command our works, and which afford admirable sites for batteries and the finest coverts for sharpshooters, and that besides this there are numerous houses, some of them within pistol shot, you will at once see that, if attacked in force, headed by any one but a simpleton, there is scarcely a possibility of our being able to hold out long enough for our friends to come to our succor." His appeals for re-inforcements were seconded by General Scott, but unheeded by President Buchanan, and entirely ignored by John B. Floyd, Secretary of War.

On the 28th, South Carolina troops occupied Fort Moultrie and Castle Pinckney, and hoisted the Palmetto flag on the ramparts. On the 29th, John B. Floyd resigned his place in Buchanan's Cabinet, charging that the President, in refusing to remove Major Anderson from Charleston harbor, designed to plunge the country into civil war, and added: "I cannot consent to be the agent of such a calamity." On the same day the South Carolina Commissioners presented their official credentials at Washington, which, on the next day, were declined.

On the second day of January, 1861, Georgia declared for secession, and Georgia troops took possession of the United States arsenal in Augusta and Forts Pulaski and Jackson. Governor Ellis, of North Carolina, seized the forts at Beaufort and Wilmington and the arsenal at Fayetteville. On the evening of the 4th, the Alabama and Mississippi delegations in Congress telegraphed the conventions of their respective States to secede, telling them there was no prospect of a satisfactory adjustment. On the 7th, the conventions of Alabama, Mississippi and Tennessee met in secession conclave. On the 9th, Secretary Thompson resigned his seat in the Cabinet on the ground that, contrary to promises, troops had been sent to Major Anderson. On the 9th, the Star of the West, carrying supplies and re-inforcements to Major Anderson, was fired into from Morris Island, and turned homeward, leaving Fort Sumter and its gallant little band to the mercy of the rebels. On the same day the ordinance of secession passed the Mississippi convention. Florida adopted an ordinance of secession on the 10th and Alabama on the 11th. The same day (the 11th) Thomas, Secretary of the Treasury, resigned, and the rebels seized the arsenal at Baton Rouge, and Forts Jackson and St. Philip, at the mouth of the Mississippi river, and Fort Pike, at the Lake Ponchartrain entrance. Pensacola navy yard and Fort Barrancas were surrendered to rebel troops by Colonel Armstrong on the 13th. Lieutenant Slemmer, who had withdrawn his command from Fort McRae to Fort Pickens, defied Armstrong's orders, and announced his intention to "hold the fort" at all hazards. The Georgia convention adopted an ordinance of secession on the 19th. On the 20th Lieutenant Slemmer was besieged by a thousand "allied troops" at Fort Pickens. Louisiana adopted an ordinance of secession on the 25th. On the 1st of February the rebels seized the United States mint and custom house at New Orleans. The Peace Convention assembled at Washington on the 4th, but adjourned without doing anything to quiet the disturbed elements. On the 9th, a provisional constitution was adopted at Montgomery, Alabama, it being the Constitution of the United States "reconstructed" to suit their purpose. Jefferson Davis, of Mississippi, was chosen President, and Alexander H. Stevens, of Georgia, Vice-President of the "Confederate States of North America." Jeff. Davis was inaugurated on the 18th, and on the 25th it was learned that General Twiggs, commanding the Department of Texas, had basely betrayed his trust, and that he had surrendered all the military posts, munitions and arms to the authorities of Texas.

DEPARTURE OF MR. LINCOLN.

The time appointed for Mr. Lincoln to leave Springfield for Washington was Monday, February 11, at 8 o'clock, A. M. Long before the hour appointed, hundreds of his friends and fellow citizens, without distinction of party, assembled at the station of the Great Western Railway to tender him their respects, grasp once more that honest hand, and bid him God speed on his eventful journey. A subdued and respectful demeanor characterized the vast assemblage. All seemed to feel that they were about to witness an event which, in its relations to the future, was of no ordinary interest.

At precisely five minutes before eight o'clock, Mr. Lincoln, preceded by Mr. Wood, of New York, slowly made his way from his room in the station, through the expectant masses which respectfully parted right and left at his approach, to the car provided for his use. At each step of his progress towards the car, friendly hands were extended for a last greeting. On reaching the platform of the car, Mr. Lincoln turned towards the people, removed his hat, paused for several seconds, till he could control his emotions, and then slowly, impressively, and with profound emotions, uttered the following words:

"Friends, no one who has ever been placed in a like position can understand my feelings at this hour, nor the oppressive sadness I feel at this parting. For more than a quarter of a century I have lived among you, and during all that time I have received nothing but kindness at your hands. Here I have lived from my youth until now, I am an old man. Here the most sacred ties of earth were assumed; here all my children were born; and here one of them lies buried. To you, dear friends, I owe all that I have, all that I am. All the strange, checkered past seems to crowd now upon my mind. To-day I leave you; I go to assume a task more difficult than that which devolved upon General Washington. Unless the great God which assisted him, shall be with and aid me, I must fail. But if the same omniscient mind and the same Almighty arm that directed and protected him, shall guide and support me, I shall not fail, I shall succeed. Let us all pray that the God of our fathers may not forsake us now. To him I commend you all. Permit me to ask that with equal sincerity and faith you will all invoke His wisdom and guidance for me. With these few words I must leave you—for how long I know not. Friends, one and all, I must now bid you an affectionate farewell."

It was a most impressive scene. Those who had known Mr. Lincoln for years; who had heard him speak upon many different occasions, never saw him so profoundly affected, nor did he ever utter an address, which seemed so full of simple and touching eloquence, so exactly adapted to the occasion, so worthy of the man and the hour. Although it was raining fast when he began to speak, every hat was lifted, and every head bent forward to catch the last words of the departing chief. When he said, with the earnestness of a sudden inspiration of feeling that with God's help he should not fail, there was an uncontrollable burst of applause.

At precisely eight o'clock, city time, the train moved off, bearing Sangamon county's most honored son to the scenes of his future labor. Few stops were made before reaching Indianapolis, but large crowds had assembled at every station, with the hope of catching sight of "Honest Old Abe." At Indianapolis, from the balcony of the Bates House, to a crowd of twenty thousand persons, the President-elect delivered his first address, as follows:

"Fellow-citizens of the State of Indiana: I am here to thank you for this magnificent welcome, and still more for the very generous support given by your State to that political cause which I think is the true and just cause of the whole country and the whole world. Solomon says there is a time to keep silence,—and when men wrangle by the mouth, with no certainty that they mean the same thing, it perhaps were as well they would keep silent.

"The words coercion and invasion are much used in these days, and often with some temper and hot blood. Let us make sure, if we can, that we do not misunderstand the meaning of those who use them. Let us get exact definitions of these words,—not from dictionaries, but from the men themselves, who certainly deprecate the things they represent by the use of the words. What, then, is coercion? What is invasion? Would the marching of an army into South Carolina without the consent of the people, and with hostile intent toward them, be invasion? I certainly think it would; and it would be coercion, also, if the South Carolinians were forced to submit. But if the United States should merely hold and retake its own forts and other property, and collect duties on foreign importations, or even withhold the mails from places where they were habitually violated,—would any, or all of these things be invasion, or coercion? Do our professed lovers of the Union, who spitefully resolve that they will resist coercion and invasion, understand that such things as these on the part of the United States would be coercion of a State? If so, their idea of the means to preserve the object of their great affection would seem to be exceedingly thin and airy. If sick, the little pill of the homœopathic would be much too large for it to swallow. In their view, the Union, as a family relation, would seem no longer to be a regular marriage, but rather a sort of free-love arrangement, to be maintained only on passional attraction.

"By the way, in what consists the special sacredness of a State? I speak not of the position assigned to a State in the Union by the Constitution—for that, by the bond, we all recognize; that position, however, a State cannot carry out of the Union with it. I speak of that assumed primary right of a State to rule all which is less than itself, and ruin all that is larger than itself.

"If a State and county in a given case should be equal in extent of territory, and equal in number of inhabitants, in what, as a matter of principle, is the State better than the county? Would an exchange of names be an exchange of rights upon principle? On what rightful principle may a State, being not more than one-fiftieth part of a Nation in soil and population, break up a Nation, and then coerce a proportionately larger sub-division of itself in the most arbitrary way? What mysterious right to play tyrant is conferred on a district of country with its people, by merely calling it a State? Fellow citizens, I am not asserting anything: I am merely asking questions for you to consider. And now allow me to bid you farewell."

At Cincinnati, Columbus, Pittsburg, Albany, New York City, Newark, Trenton, Philadelphia and Harrisburg, Mr. Lincoln had magnificent receptions, and addressed large crowds of people, calling upon them to stand by the Union, the Constitution and the laws. At Harrisburg a change of programme on the part of Mr. Lincoln was decided upon. A special dispatch to the New York Times thus narrates the facts in the case:

"On Thursday night, after he had retired Mr. Lincoln was aroused and informed that a stranger desired to see him on a matter of life or death. He declined to admit him unless he gave his name, which he at once did. Such prestige did his name carry, that while yet Mr. Lincoln was disrobed, he granted an interview to the caller. Prolonged conversation elicited the fact that an organized body of men had determined that Lincoln should not be inaugurated, and that he should never leave Baltimore alive, if indeed he ever entered it. The list of names of the conspirators presented a most astonishing array of persons high in Southern confidence, and some whose fame is not confined to this country alone. Statesmen laid the plan, bankers endorsed it, and adventurers were to carry it into effect. As they understood Mr. Lincoln was to leave Harrisburg at nine o'clock this morning by special train, and the idea was, if possible, to throw the train from the track at some point where they would rush down a steep embankment and destroy in a moment all on board. In case of failure of this project, the plan was to surround the carriage on the way from depot to depot in Baltimore, and assassinate him with a dagger or pistol shot. So authentic was the source of information, Mr. Lincoln, after advising with his friends was compelled to make arrangements that would subvert the plans of his enemies. He did not want to yield, and Mr. Sumner actually cried with indignation."

Mr. Lincoln arrived at Washington on Saturday, the twenty-third—twelve days after he left Springfield—and in advance of all expectations.

Mr. Lincoln was inaugurated March 4, 1861, in front of the Capitol, the inauguration ceremonies being witnessed by a vast concourse of people. Before taking the oath, Mr. Lincoln pronounced in a clear, ringing voice, his inaugural address, to hear which there was an almost painful solicitude, to read which the whole American people and the civilized world awaited with irrepressible anxiety. With that address and the administration of the oath of office, the people were assured. All doubt, if any had previously existed, was removed. In the hands of Abraham Lincoln, the people's President, and himself of the people, the Government was safe.

Traitors were still busy plotting and planning. Troops were mustering in all the seceded States. On Friday, April 12, the surrender of Fort Sumter, with its garrison of sixty effective men, was demanded and bravely refused by the gallant Major Anderson. Fire was at once opened upon the helpless garrison by the rebel forces, numbered by thousands. Resistance was useless, and at last the National colors were hauled down, and by traitor hands were trailed in the dust. On Sunday morning, the 14th, the news of the surrender was received in all the principal cities of the Union. That was all, but that was enough. A day later, when the news was confirmed and spread through the country, the patriot people of the North were startled from their dreams of the future—from undertakings half completed—and made to realize that behind that mob there was a dark, deep, and well organized purpose to destroy the Government, rend the Union in twain, and out of its ruins erect a slave oligarchy, wherein no one would dare question their right to hold in bondage the sons and daughters of men whose skins were black. Their dreams of the future—their plans for the establishment of an independent confederacy—were doomed from their inception to sad and bitter disappointment. Everywhere north of Mason and Dixon's line the voice of Providence was heard:

"Draw forth your million blades as one;
Complete the battle now begun!
God fights with ye, and overhead
Floats the dear banner of your dead.
They and the glories of the Past,
The Future, dawning dim and vast,
And all the holiest hopes of Man,
Are beaming triumphant in your van."

"Slow to resolve, he swift to do!
Teach ye the False how fight the True!
How buckled Perfidy shall feel
In her black heart the Patriot's steel;
How sure the bolt that Justice wings;
How weak the arm a traitor brings;
How mighty they who steadfast stand
For Freedom's flag and Freedom's land!"

On Monday, April 15, President Lincoln issued the following proclamation:

"WHEREAS, The laws of the United States have been for some time past, and are now, opposed, and the execution thereof obstructed, in the States of South Carolina, Alabama, Florida, Mississippi, Louisiana, and Texas, by combinations too powerful to be suppressed by the ordinary course of judicial proceedings, or by the powers vested in the marshals; now, therefore, I, ABRAHAM LINCOLN, President of the United States, by virtue of the power in me vested by the Constitution and the laws, have thought to call forth, and hereby do call forth, the militia of the several States of the Union, to the number of seventy-five thousand, in order to suppress said combinations, and to cause the laws to be duly executed.

"The details for this subject will be immediately communicated to the State authorities through the War Department. I appeal to all loyal citizens to favor, facilitate, and to aid this effort to maintain the honor, the integrity, and existence of our National Union, and the perpetuity of popular government, and to redress wrongs already long endured. I deem it proper to say that the first services assigned to the forces hereby called forth, will probably be to repossess the forts, places, and property which have been seized from the Union; and in every event the utmost care will be observed, consistently with the objects aforesaid, to avoid any devastation, any destruction of or interference with property, or any disturbance of peaceful citizens in any part of the country; and I hereby command the persons composing the combinations aforesaid, to disperse and retire peaceably to their respective abodes, within twenty days from this date.

"Deeming that the present condition of public affairs presents an extraordinary occasion, I do hereby, in virtue of the power in me vested by the Constitution, convene both Houses of Congress. The Senators and Representatives are, therefore, summoned to assemble at their respective chambers at twelve o'clock, noon, on Thursday, the fourth day of July next, then and there to consider and determine such measures as in their wisdom the public safety and interest may seem to demand.

"In witness thereof, I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

"Done at the city of Washington, the fifteenth day of April, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and sixty-one, and of the independence of the United States the eighty-fifth.

By the President: ABRAHAM LINCOLN.
WM. H. SEWARD, Secretary of State."

The last word of this proclamation had scarcely been taken from the electric wire before the call was filled. Men and money were counted out by hundreds and thousands. The people who loved their whole country could not give enough. Patriotism thrilled and vibrated and pulsed through every heart. The farm, the workshop, the office, the pulpit, the bar, the bench, the college, the school house—every calling offered its best men, their lives and fortunes in defense of the government's honor and unity. Party lines were for the time ignored. Bitter words, spoken in moments of political heat, were forgotten and forgiven, and, joining hands in a common cause, they repeated the oath of America's soldier statesman: "By the Great Eternal, the Union must and shall be preserved!"

Seventy-five thousand men were not enough to subdue the rebellion. Nor were ten times that number. The war went on, and call followed call, until it seemed as if there were not men in all the free States to crush out the rebellion. But to every call for either men or money there was a willing and a ready response. The gauntlet thrown down by the traitors of the South was accepted; not, however, in the spirit which insolence meets insolence, but with a firm, determined spirit of patriotism and love of country. The duty of the President was plain under the Constitution and laws, and, above and beyond all, the people, from whom all political power is derived, demanded the suppression of the rebellion, and stood ready to sustain the authority of their representative and executive officers to the utmost extremity.

In the apportionment of troops covered by President Lincoln's proclamation, it was found that the quota of Illinois would be six regiments, of which fact Governor Yates was advised by receipt of the following telegram:

"WASHINGTON, April 15, 1861.

His Excellency, Richard Yates:

Call made on you by to-night's mail for six regiments for immediate service.

SIMON CAMERON,
Secretary of War."

Immediately upon receipt of the foregoing dispatch, Governor Yates issued the following proclamation:

"SPRINGFIELD, ILLINOIS, April 15, 1861.

I, Richard Yates, Governor of the State of Illinois, by virtue of the authority vested in me by the Constitution, hereby convene the legislature of the State, and the members of the Twenty-second session of the General Assembly are hereby required to be and appear in their respective places, at the Capitol, on Tuesday, the twenty-third day of April, A. D. 1861, for the purpose of enacting such laws and adopting such measures as may be deemed necessary upon the following subjects: The more perfect organization and equipment of the militia of the State, and placing the same upon the best footing to render assistance to the general Government in preserving the Union, enforcing the laws and protecting the property and rights of the people; also the raising of such money and other means as may be required to carry out the foregoing objects; and, also, to provide for the expense of such session.

In testimony whereof, I hereunto set my hand, and cause the great seal of the State to be hereunto affixed at the city of Springfield, the fiftenth day of April, A. D., 1861.

By order of the Governor: RICH'D YATES.

O. M. HATCH, Secretary of State."

Allen C. Fuller, of Boone county, was appointed Adjutant-General. General Order No. 1 was issued on the 15th, from headquarters at Springfield, directing all commandants of divisions, brigades, regiments and companies, to hold themselves in readiness for actual service; and on the 16th, Order No. 2 provided for the immediate organization of six regiments, and within ten days more than ten thousand men had offered their services; and in addition to the force despatched to Cairo, more than the full quota was in camp at Springfield.

The readiness with which the first call was made, together with the embarrassments which surrounded President Lincoln in the absence of sufficient laws to authorize him to meet the unholy, unlooked-for and unexpected emergency—an emergency that had never been anticipated by the wisest and best of America's statesmen, together with an under-estimate of the magnitude of the rebellion, and a general belief that the war could not and would not last three months, checked, rather than encouraged the patriotic ardor of the people. But few of the men, comparatively speaking, who volunteered in response to President Lincoln's call for seventy-five thousand men for three months, were accepted. But the time soon came when there was a place and a musket for every man. Call followed call in quick succession, until the number reached the grand total of 3,339,748, as follows:

April 15, 1861, for three months.....	75,000
May 4, 1861, for five years.....	61,748
July, 1861, for three years.....	500,000
July 18, 1862, for three years.....	300,000
August 4, 1862, for nine months.....	300,000
June, 1863, for three years.....	300,000
October 17, 1863, for three years.....	300,000
February 18, 1864, for three years.....	500,000
July 10, 1864, for three years.....	200,000
July 16, 1864, for one, two and three years...	500,000
December 21, 1864, for three years.....	300,000

When the news came that the rebels had fired upon Fort Sumter—that the first overt act had been committed, indignation filled the heart of everyone; and when the news came that the gallant Major Anderson had surrendered—that the Star-spangled Banner had by traitor-hands been trailed in the dust, all party feelings were laid aside, and the people of Sangamon county, with those of all the loyal States of the Union, were united together as one, and each and everyone determined that the insult should be wiped out, and that traitors should receive a just punishment.

A public meeting of the citizens of Springfield was called for Monday evening, April 16, which was to be addressed by John A. McClernand, Lyman Trumbull and others. To suit the convenience of the speakers, it was postponed until the following evening, on which occasion thousands of excited citizens assembled to listen to the addresses. The meeting was organized by calling N. M. Broadwell to the chair. Mr. Broadwell accepted the honor in a patriotic and eloquent speech, which was loudly applauded. A secretary was appointed, and also a committee on resolutions, composed of the following named gentlemen: Charles H. Lanphier, Edward L. Baker, Charles A. Keyes, N. W. Matheny, H. G. Reynolds, E. B. Hawley, B. A. Watson, C. L. Morrison, T. J. V. Owen and J. Bunn. While the committee were out Mr. McClernand took the stand by invitation, and was received with a storm of applause. He gave a full history of the secession movement, and pronounced secession a dastardly and cowardly way to commit treason. He said he had been a Democrat and was one now, but that he would sacrifice party on the altar of his country. He painted the evils of secession with the hand of a master—pointed out the way to defeat it, and closed with a powerful appeal to stand unflinchingly by their Government and their flag. He was frequently and loudly cheered.

Senator Trumbull was next called out, and was greeted with loud applause. He made a strong, telling speech, and roused the enthusiasm of the people to the highest pitch. Speaking of this Government defending itself and defending the Capital against the traitors, he said he scorned the idea of this great Government defending itself against secessionists. "Let us," said he, "make them defend Montgomery and Charleston." This sentiment was responded to by the vast audience by wild cheering, which lasted for some minutes. Mr. Trumbull closed by introducing Captain Wyatt, of Logan county, who had raised a company of volunteers and tendered them to the Governor. Mr. Wyatt was received with loud shouts of applause. He said he did not come to make a speech; he did not come to see the people, but he did come to see to it that his company was received. He said he was not a man of words, but a man of action. Others might talk; he was going to act for his country. He made a good speech, and at its close the crowd gave him three cheers.

The following resolutions were reported by the Committee, and unanimously adopted:

"Resolved, That the Union of the States, in the spirit of the Constitution, and the just administration and observance of its laws, are indispensable to the preservation of the liberties and happiness of the people.

"Resolved, That the Union of these States was intended by them all to be a perpetual Union, and that no power is reserved to any State to withdraw from the compact, except in the manner prescribed by the Constitution.

"Resolved, That the attempt now being made to dissolve the Union and destroy the Government by the array of military force, the seizure of arsenals and public property, the firing upon and capturing the forts and ships of the Government, the shedding of blood, and the dishonoring of the National flag, is revolutionary and treasonable, and, if successful, will reduce the Nation to anarchy, demoralization, and endless civil war.

"Resolved, That it is the duty of the Government to maintain its Constitutional authority throughout its entire jurisdiction by all proper means of compromise and conciliation; and when these fail, by the military power at its command.

"Resolved, That the Mississippi is a great National highway, in which the States of the Northwest have a right which they will not suffer to be disturbed or impaired by the attempted jurisdiction of any State or power whatever.

"Resolved, That it is the duty of all patriotic citizens of Illinois, without distinction of party or sect, to sustain the Government through the peril which now threatens the existence of the Union, and of our legislature to grant such aid of men and money, as the exigency of the hour and the patriotism of our people shall demand.

"Resolved, That, while we recognize the duty of thus sustaining the Government and preserving the Constitution, we shall continue to seek a restoration of peaceful relations between the States; and we earnestly recommend that a National Convention be called, for a final adjustment in a Constitutional manner, the difficulties now disturbing the peace and endangering the liberties of our beloved country."

The Zouave Grays, under command of Captain John Cook, offered their services on Tuesday, and were accepted by the Governor. This was the first company from Sangamon county, and the first on the Adjutant General's roll from the State.

Jacob Bunn, N. H. Ridgely and the Marine and Fire Insurance Company, principal banking institutions in Springfield, patriotically offered to Governor Yates a loan of one hundred thousand dollars to facilitate necessary preparations for organizing and collecting the State troops to aid in suppressing the rebellion. The war spirit was evidently high. The Journal, under date of April 20, only five days after the issuance of the proclamation, said:

"Springfield is ablaze with excitement. Flags are flying all over the city; the martial music of drum and fife resounds wherever we turn our steps; companies are being drilled in almost every hall of sufficient capacity, and, in fact, appearances indicate that something is going to be done. Numbers are employed on military duty, and find scope for the development of all their energies. Prominent men from different parts of the State are here, aiding by every means in their power, of advice and otherwise, the Executive in the discharge of his official functions."

A second company, under command of Captain Sands, was accepted from this county, but the good work did not cease. The City Council of Springfield, with commendable liberality, appropriated $10,000 from the city treasury for the purpose of defraying expenses attending the equipment of volunteers and for the support of their families while absent. The offer of the bankers of Springfield was accepted by Governor Yates, who addressed them the following letter:

"EXECUTIVE OFFICE,
SPRINGFIELD, Ill, April 18, 1861. }

To Messrs. J. Bunn, N. H. Ridgely and President of the Marine Fire Insurance Company:

GENTLEMEN:—Your communication of the 17th inst., tendering to me, and, through me, to the State of Illinois, the sum of one hundred thousand dollars, as a loan to facilitate necessary preparations for the organizing and collecting of the State troops to put down resistance to the laws and open rebellion, has been duly received.

Your generous offer is gratefully accepted, and permit me to express to you, on behalf of the State, my sincere thanks for the devotion you have shown to the honor of our noble State and our common country in this hour of peril. Your patriotic act will be a worthy example to other citizens, and will ever be a source of pride to yourselves and your families, as well as to your fellow-citizens. With the wish that the great unanimity of sentiment respecting the upholding of our Union and the laws of our country, and the many generous acts of patriotic citizens, denoting a spirit of earnestness and self-devotion, will have a most favorable effect in restoring peace and prosperity to the country, I remain, respectfully,

Your obedient servant,

RICHARD YATES, GOVERNOR.

On Tuesday night, April 23, the first troops left Springfield for the seat of war. Says a local reporter, under date April 24:

"The scene at the Great Western Railroad depot last night was worthy the pencil of an artist. Two companies from Quincy, two from Jacksonville, and a squad of artillery, with three guns and fifty men, the entire command numbering nearly five hundred men, fully equipped for active service, left under sealed orders. Before leaving, the detachment was formed into line, when the officers received their commissions and were sworn in, and a few touching and appropriate remarks were made by Captain Prentiss, who commanded the battalion. These companies were the flower of the camp, well drilled, soldierly, and fully qualified to defend the honor of our country. The Star Spangled Banner was sung with thrilling effect, and the soldiers took their place in the cars amid the hearty 'God bless them' of the crowd. In the gray of the night the scene was sublimely impressive. The half repressed ardor of the troops, fully alive to the responsibilities devolving upon them, sadly regretful of the causes which necessitated their services, but sternly resolved to allow no traitor hands to tarnish the glory of the starry flag which waved over them; the earnest farewells to parting friends—greetings, perhaps, the last they would be permitted to exchange on earth, all combined to impress beholders with the solemnity of the occasion. The feeling aroused in the North carries with it a deep significance. Anger slow to be called forth, only excited after long and patient forbearance, not loud nor noisy in its demonstration, but irresistible in its force as the cataract of Niagara, more terrible than the tempests of the Heaven—this was what we saw manifested last night. There was no hot-spur courage in that detachment, which flames up in an instant and exhausts itself as speedily; but a deep, quiet consciousness of wrongs too long endured, and which are now to be redressed. These troops do not go out to fight for the support of Illinois, or for the North, or for any section of the United States, but for the Star Spangled Flag, under whose folds they were born, and which they love better than their lives."

The first of the Sangamon county men to leave for the front was on Saturday morning, April 27, when Colonel Cook's regiment took its departure. Says the same reporter already quoted:

"At an early hour Saturday morning, April 27, the depot of the Chicago, Alton & St. Louis Railroad was crowded with men, women and children, assembled to bid good-bye to the Springfield boys of Colonel Cook's regiment, which, it was understood, was to leave at eight o'clock. The troops left the camp at seven o'clock, proceeded to the arsenal, where they were provided with arms, and thence marched to the depot, where they were drawn up in line on Jefferson street, and received the greetings of their friends and loved ones. The drenching rain which fell all the morning did not seem in the least to dampen the ardor of the soldiers, or prevent the ladies from crowding through the muddy streets to bid them good-bye. For about two hours and a half they stood in the shower, giving frequent vent to their patriotism and variety to the occasion by loud cheering, the train having orders to leave at ten o'clock. Our readers can fancy the leave-taking—we cannot attempt to portray it—for what pen can paint the feelings which swelled the hearts of fond mothers, sisters and wives as they bade farewell to those they loved so dearly, not knowing whether they would ever again be permitted to meet on earth?—or who can depict the emotions of those gallant boys, in whose breast patriotism and love for their country's honor struggled with regrets at their separation from those so closely entwined around their hearts? Those who were present felt all this deeply, and there are few in all our broad State who read these lines who have not, within the last few days, been witnesses of similar scenes, and who cannot, in some measure, appreciate the solemnity of the occasion. At length the companies were all seated in the cars, and as the long train swept gradually from the depot, drawn by two powerful locomotives, which never before bore a freight so precious, the air was rent by the loud shouts of the crowd on the platform, united with those of the men in the cars. The old toast, 'Woman, God bless her!' which we have all drank so often, came forcibly to the minds of all, for with Spartan firmness, those women, who all had on the receding train some son, or brother, or some 'dearer one and nearer one,' with the strong heart of patriotism, wept, but consented to the sacrifice for their country's sake. Forever bless their noble hearts!"

The patriotism was not confined to the aged. A little daughter of J. C. Luce, only about seven years of age, told her mother she was determined to enlist for a soldier—saying that although she could not carry a musket and shoot, she could take care of the wounded soldiers; make bandages and lint, read to them when restless, or write home to their friends their last wishes if they were about to die. As she was so extremely in earnest about the matter, she was allowed to go to Colonel Williams' office, who put her name down, and told her she was the first female volunteer he had on his list. She went home really thinking she had enlisted for the war, gathered up from the neighbors all the old sheets they would spare her, which she made into bandages—several hundred in all—for the surgical department. There was something deeply touching in the artless conduct of the little girl—so young, yet so earnestly anxious to do something to relieve the suffering of the wounded soldiers her fancy had painted on the black canvass of battle.

The year 1862 was a dark one for the Union armies. Defeated in the field and harassed by enemies in the rear, many friends of the Union were discouraged. Even in Sangamon county were to be found many who believed that the war was prosecuted in vain and that some compromise or peace measures should be adopted. The Government was urgently calling for volunteers, and enlistments were slow. At this juncture war meetings were held all over the county and every effort was made to awaken a more lively interest and to secure enlistments. At Chatham, on the evening of July 19, an enthusiastic meeting was held and the following resolutions adopted:

"Resolved, That this meeting is of the opinion that the war against treason and rebellion should be prosecuted with the utmost vigor, and that the sword should not be sheathed until the authority of the Federal Government is restored to its former power and glory.

"Resolved, That the thanks of this meeting are due to the Governor of this State for his untiring exertions in behalf of the troops on the battlefield, and for his zeal in making arrangements for the new troops required by the recent call of the President, and this meeting pledges itself to render him all the support in its power toward crushing out the rebellion."

This meeting was but one of many, all breathing the same spirit, showing a determination to stand by the Government to the end.

Some time in the fall of this year President Lincoln issued a proclamation stating that upon the first day of January, 1863, he would issue a Proclamation of Emancipation of the slaves in those States engaged in the rebellion, if, in the meantime, they did not return to their allegiance to the General Government. The rebel States, paying no heed to the note of warning, the proclamation was accordingly issued. Many loyal men throughout the North doubted the propriety and even the authority of the President in this matter. Meetings were held approving and denouncing the act throughout the Union. In Springfield a large meeting was held on Saturday evening, January 10, 1863, which was adjourned till Thursday, the 15th, which was addressed by several eminent speakers who had formerly acted with both parties, when the following resolutions were adopted:

"Resolved, That in the present condition of our National affairs, and in the existence of the troubles which surround our country, it is the duty of all good citizens cordially to support the National and State Administrations, and that we hereby offer to the Administration of Abraham Lincoln, President of the United States, and Richard Yates, Governor of the State of Illinois, our earnest and cordial support in the efforts of their respective Administrations to put down the present most infamous rebellion.

"Resolved, That while we admit that during the present terrible and unjustifiable rebellion it would be impossible for the President of the United States to discharge his duties so as to satisfy all the people of the United States, yet as he is the officer invested with the constitutional power to act as the Government in putting down the present rebellion, which is seeking our overthrow, it becomes the duty of all loyal citizens to strengthen the President's arm for the contest, and to give him that material moral aid and support, regardless of mere party differences of opinion, that will be effectual to put down insurrection and sustain our Government—and we hold that no man can be regarded as a lover of his country who will not make any sacrifice that is needed to sustain the Government under which he lives.

"Resolved, That it is the first and highest duty of the National Government to crush out the existing rebellion; that our own happiness, prosperity, and power as a people, and the fate of Republican institutions throughout the world are involved in this great issue; and in order to accomplish that result, it is both the right and duty of the Government to use all means recognized by the laws of civilized warfare.

"Resolved, That the Constitution of our fathers and the irrevocable laws of nature unite in indissoluble bonds the Great Northwest and the mouth of the Mississippi and the eastern seaboard; that we should be ready, if need were, to crush secession in the east, as in the south; and that we will never consent to a dissolution of the Union, or to an abandonment by the National Government of its constitutional authority over any, the least portion of our territory.

"Resolved, That we have no terms of compromise to propose to rebels in arms; that we should regard propositions by the loyal States for a cessation of hostilities as both fruitless and humiliating, and that any settlement of our National troubles by species of concession to the rebels, or by any mode short of an unconditional suppression of the rebellion, would be an acknowledgment of the principle of secession, and would be offering a premium to treason for all time to come.

"Resolved, That the Constitution of the United States confers upon the Government of the same, all the powers necessary to the effectual suppression of the rebellion, and to punish the rebels for a violation of their allegiance, and to this end it may deprive them of life, liberty or property, if required, in its judgment; and that an imperious necessity demanded of the President of the United States the issuing of his proclamation of freedom to the slaves in rebellious States and parts of States, and we pledge ourselves to sustain him in the same.

"Resolved, That the President, as commander-in-chief of the army, and executive head of the Government, has the same undoubted right to suspend the writ of habeas corpus, during an armed rebellion, as General Jackson had to suspend that writ in New Orleans; that even if individual cases of hardship have occurred in consequence of false information furnished to the Government, which it had good reason to believe to be true, still no thoroughly loyal citizen, who earnestly desires the suppression of the rebellion, would seek, for such causes, to create disaffection among the people towards the Government, or to make them believe their liberties are in danger; and that we have yet to hear of the first truly loyal man who believes himself in danger of military arrest or imprisonment in the so-called bastles.

"Resolved, That the late State Government of Virginia, having treasonably abdicated its legitimate authority, the same devolved upon that portion of her citizens which organized a loyal Government in that section of her territory where they could safely assemble, and that such loyal Government was invested with the whole power of the State of Virginia, and had the rightful authority under the National Constitution, with the sanction of Congress, to consent to the formation of a new State, carved out of its territory.

"Resolved, That the courts of the United States would be wholly inefficient to maintain its authority against rebels in arms, and that the only mode in which the rebellion can be put down is through the military arm of the Government, and that the proper duty of our courts is to follow, and not precede, our armies, and that we will hail the day when military aid can be dispensed with in the administration of our affairs, and the civil authority restored to its wonted supremacy.

"Resolved, That the Democratic principle that the frequency of elections and of submission to the will of the people as expressed at the ballot box, dispenses entirely with the necessity of forcible revolution to correct any real or fancied errors of administration, and this fact takes away all excuse for those who seek to inaugurate a state of anarchy or rebellion, and invests their crime with a ten-fold atrocity.

"Resolved, That, the gallant sons of Illinois who have gone forth to fight our battles, have achieved for themselves and their State imperishable renown; that the page which shall record their deeds will be among the brightest of our country's history, and having sealed their hatred of treason by the baptism of the battlefield, they will, upon their return, pronounce at the ballot-box their condemnation of all men who have dared to express a covered sympathy with traitors or to denounce the sacred cause for which they have shed their blood."

Among the speakers at the meeting was Colonel Cummings. He said that he appeared before them as a Democrat—always had been and was still a Democrat; but like a certain old Roman, his "voice was still for war." He was therefore a war Democrat, and was in favor of pushing the war with the utmost power of the Government until the unholy rebellion should be put down and an honorable peace secured. He fully endorsed the resolutions, and if he desired any change in them it would be simply to add "My country, right or wrong." After referring to the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus, and the Emancipation Proclamation, and defending the right of the President to suspend the one and issue the other, the Colonel referred to a suggestion that had found its way into print that New England should be thrown off and a Western Confederacy formed. "Another position," said he, "occupied by some of these gentlemen, is their expressed desire to cast off New England and form a Western Confederacy. And just here I would like to know who of these gentlemen is to be the President of this new Government. This question may be somewhat significant as applied to these men. But why cast off New England with all her glorious deeds and memories? The officers and soldiers of New England have done their duty nobly; have done what no one of these gentlemen have done—taken up arms, and on the battlefield defended the Government against its traitorous enemies. Witness the devotion of General Butler, General Banks, and the host of loyal hearts from New England, while traitors, both North and South, have been doing their utmost to destroy the Government, and tell me if New England deserves to be cast out of the Union? In addition to all this, Illinois has reason to be proud of New England, for she gave us that great statesman, that stern and unflinching patriot, Stephen A. Douglas, whose name will live and be honored in Illinois for all time. Besides all this, we have the fraternal greeting of New England to Illinois, at the battle of Fort Donelson:

"O, gales that dash the Atlantic's swell
Along our rocky shores!
Whose thunder diapason well
New England's glad huzzahs—

"Bear to the prairies of the West
The echoes of our joy,
The prayer that springs in every breast,
'God bless thee—Illinois.'

"Oh! awful hours, when grape and shell
Tore through the unflinching line;
Stand firm, remove the men who fell,
Close up and wait the sign.

"It came at last, 'Now, lads, the steel!'
The rushing hosts deploy;
'Charge, boys!' the broken traitors reel—
Hurrah for Illinois!

"In vain the rampart, Donelson,
The living torrent bars;
It leaps the wall, the fort is won,
Up go the stripes and stars.

"The proudest mother's eyelids fills
As dares her gallant boy;
And Plymouth Rock and Bunker Hill
Yearn to thee, Illinois."

The Colonel concluded his speech amid loud and long continued applause. Springfield and Sangamon county had spoken for the Union.

The year 1863 witnessed an effort on the part of many to secure peace between the States. On the 17th of June a mass convention was held at Springfield, presided over by Senator Richardson, which passed the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the further offensive prosecution of this war tends to subvert the Constitution and the Government, and entails upon this nation all the disastrous consequences of misrule and anarchy. That we are in favor of peace upon the basis of a restoration of the Union, and for the accomplishment of which we propose a National Convention to settle upon terms of peace, which shall have in view the restoration of the Union as it was, and the securing by constitutional amendments such rights to the several States and people thereof as honor and justice demand."

The effect of this meeting was to rouse the unconditional Union men to renewed action. A mass convention was, therefore, called and held in Springfield, Thursday, September 3, which was addressed by a number of the most eminent men of the country, among whom were Zachariah Chandler, of Michigan; J. R. Doolittle, of Wisconsin, and General McClelland, of Springfield. Strong resolutions were adopted pledging all to faithfully stand by the Government until the last traitor was disarmed. Among the resolutions were the following:

"Resolved, That we will lay aside all party questions and forget all party prejudices, and devote ourselves unreservedly to the support of our Government, until the rebellion shall be finally and forever crushed.

"Resolved, That whatever else may die, the Union shall live, to perpetuate civil liberty; whatever else may perish, the Government shall survive in all its Constitutional integrity; whatever else may be destroyed, the Nation shall be preserved in its territorial unity; and to this end we pledge anew our lives, our fortunes, and our sacred honor."

In the winter of 1863-4 much was done in Springfield in aid of soldiers' families. On Saturday, December 12, 1863, the farmers of the county, notwithstanding the condition of the roads, hauled to the city and distributed among the needy, ninety-three loads of wood. The Board of Supervisors during the same winter appropriated $5,000 to aid the suffering.

The gallant Seventh Regiment, an account of whose departure to the seat of war is given on a preceding page, in December, 1863, re-enlisted as veterans, and in January following, received a furlough to visit their homes. On Monday, January 18, the regiment arrived in Springfield. At an early hour that morning, flags were flung to the breeze from many of the business houses and offices around the square, and also from private dwellings, in anticipation of the arrival of the regiment. At about two o'clock the booming of cannon and the ringing of bells announced the fact they were near at hand. The streets were immediately crowded with men, women, and children, all surging in the direction of the Great Western depot, to witness the debarkation of the regiment from the cars and their march to the State House. So great was the interest felt to see this veteran and gallant regiment, that had sustained the flag of the country with so much honor to themselves and the State, that the teachers of the public schools allowed their pupils to go to the place of rendezvous to gratify their curiosity.

On the arrival of the cars at the depot, cheer after cheer was given to the veterans. After leaving the cars, they formed into line, and were escorted by the Fire Department, preceded by bands of music, to the Hall of Representatives. The galleries were crowded with ladies, to give the veterans a patriotic welcome home to Illinois. After the arrival at the Hall, Governor Yates was introduced to the regiment and large audience present. Three cheers were proposed for Governor Yates and three cheers for the "Old Seventh," which were given with a will.

The Governor addressed the assembly in a speech of about three-quarters of an hour in length, in which he spoke of the regiment as being one of the first that entered the field at the call of the country—their gallantry in many a hard-fought field, and welcomed them home to Illinois. At the close of the Governor's speech, General John Cook was called for, and proceeded to address them in a speech of about one hour in length, in which he gave a history of the regiment from the time of its organization and its march from Camp Yates to that time. Colonel Rowett, commander of the regiment, was next called to the stand, and delivered a brief and appropriate speech, in which he thanked the citizens of Springfield for their friendly welcome, as being totally unexpected, not having heard anything about the matter until about twelve miles of the city. He said the question of re-enlisting was propounded on the 22d of December, and the regiment said as Dave Lee said, "they would not stop fighting until the rebels did first." They did not say as some others did, "that they had tried it for two years and nine months, and now let others try it," but they were determined to fight until this rebellion was crushed out. His remarks were received with much applause. Major Estabrook delivered a short and telling speech which was well received. The exercises were interspersed with several patriotic airs from the band present, which added much to the interest of the occasion.

Never was there a more cordial and heart-felt reception than was extended by the citizens of Springfield to this veteran regiment. They seemed to vie with each other in their expression of gratitude to the brave men who had risked their lives in the defense of their country and homes. The regiment brought with them the National colors of the regiment, riddled and torn with shot and shell, showing the deadly nature of the conflict in which they had been engaged.

During the year 1864, a Presidential campaign occurred, in which the issues virtually were: Shall the Government be sustained in the prosecution of the war? The result of the election was such as to nerve the President to renewed action. Several calls were made for volunteers which were quickly responded to, and vigorous measures were pursued in the prosecution of the war.

The "Ladies' Loyal League of Springfield" was organized May 13, 1863. Two hundred and sixteen names were enrolled at the first meeting. At the expiration of the first year it numbered five hundred and twenty-nine. From the annual report of the secretary, Mrs. Paul Selby, in 1864, the following extract is taken:

"At its first organization, the League was simply designed as an associated expression of loyal sentiment, in which its members pledged themselves to an 'unconditional support to the National Government in its present struggle against rebellion, and to do whatever may lie in their power for the maintenance of our Government and the Union.' Beyond this, it had no distinctive object. But 'faith without works is dead.' It soon became evident that, to give vitality to the organization and fulfill the design of its creation, it must have some object for which to labor. This, indeed, was required by our further pledge to 'encourage our brave soldiers in the field by the language of patriotism, and to soothe the anguish of the sick and wounded by deeds of kindness; to discountenance every tendency to disloyalty, and to evince on every proper occasion our determination to stand by the flag of the Union; to honor those who bravely hazard their lives in its defense, and to express our abhorrence of every enemy, open or disguised, who would trail its proud glory in the dust.' This requires something more than professions—it requires action.

"In looking around for a field of operations, one opened to us at the very outset. In our midst were many families of those who, having patriotically offered themselves upon the altar of their country, had been compelled to leave those dependent upon them illy provided to carry on the 'battle of life' in their absence. The difficulty of their situation was still further increased by the expeditions continually advancing farther and farther into the enemy's country, separating soldiers still farther from their families, and rendering communication from them less frequent; from the unfrequent visits of paymasters to distant commands, often leaving the men composing them unpaid for several months at a time; by the fortunes of war, resulting in the capture and protracted imprisonment of many of our soldiers; and last, and saddest of all, the surrender of the lives of many in protecting that flag which they had volunteered to defend. The field here opened was a wide one,—and it expanded as we proceeded to explore it.

"The county Board of Supervisors had already done much to prevent distress which must otherwise have resulted, among this class of persons, by liberal appropriations of money; but it was practically impossible that this system should reach some of the most deserving cases. In some cases, those who needed and deserved assistance most, were most reluctant in making their condition known. Committees were therefore appointed in the various wards of the city, to seek out and investigate cases requiring attention. Besides, there were, almost weekly, arriving many individuals and families from the rebel States—refugees from their homes on account of Union principles. These often came among us in actual want of the common necessities of life, food and clothing—penniless, sick, dispirited, and suffering. Their condition appealed to every loyal heart, and to the best of our ability we have endeavored to extend to them some portion of the aid to which they stood in need.

"In this field, so nearly allied to that of the noble organization of patriotic and Christian women, the Ladies' Soldiers' Aid Society, we have labored for a year past, as we hope, not without results for good. Up to the first of June, when our fiscal year closed, as shown by the report of the Treasurer, the League has received into its treasury $817.90, of which $794.35 have been expended. About seventy-five persons and families have received aid from the association. This does not include donations of dry goods, groceries, shoes, clothing, etc., to the amount of several hundred dollars, contributions from various sources during the year.

"It is proper in this connection to state that the Ladies' Loyal League of Springfield is purely a local organization, and that its revenue has been derived solely from the citizens, churches, etc., of Springfield and its immediate vicinity. In no case has it received contributions from distant parts of the States.

"In these times, when our country is passing through the perils of the most causeless, wicked and most stupendous rebellion, there seems to be an especial demand for associated, organized effort. While the husbands, brothers, sons and fathers of the loyal women of America are baring their breasts to the foe upon the field in defense of our homes and all we hold most dear, is it not fitting we should do our part by endeavoring to lighten the burdens of war, to relieve the fatherless and the widow, to encourage and sustain the soldier as he goes to meet the enemies of our country. We have done little, it is true, in comparison with what was demanded of us. The demand for effort still remains. May it be said of each of us, 'She has done what she could.' MRS. P. SELBY, Secretary Ladies' Loyal League."

For 1864-5 the following named officers were elected: Mrs. S. H. Melvin, President; Mrs. John P. Reynolds and Mrs. McCulloch, Vice Presidents; Mrs. R. S. Lord, Treasurer; Mrs. Paul Selby, Secretary; Mrs. L. Niles, Mrs. H. Post, Miss R. H. Beach, Mrs. G. S. Mendell, Mrs. J. K. Dubois, Mrs. R. B. Zimmerman, Mrs. James L. Lamb, Mrs. M. Brayman, Mrs. A. M. Gregory, Mrs. George Boynton, Mrs. L. M. Snell, Mrs. J. G. Ives, Managers.

The year 1865 opened auspiciously for the Union armies. Evidences that the rebels were weakening were daily shown. In order to make one last grand effort to suppress the rebellion,

President Lincoln issued his proclamation for more men, and ordered a draft if not complied with by February 15. Previous to this time, Sangamon county had honored every call and had always an excess. In order to provide for this last call without resort to a draft, the Board of Supervisors were called together and passed a series of resolutions, among which was the following:

"Resolved, That the county of Sangamon, State of Illinois, in its corporate capacity, will pay a bounty of $500 to each volunteer who may enlist and be properly mustered into the United States service, and duly credited to any sub-district in said county, in arrears under said call; that the said county will pay a like bounty of $500 to any man who has heretofore or who may hereafter furnish a substitute, who has been or who shall hereafter be accepted, mustered into the service, and duly credited to any sub-district in said county in arrears under said call; and that said county will pay a like bounty of $500 to any man who may be drafted in said county and mustered into the United States service under said call."

N. W. Matheny, N. M. Broadwell and J. G. Ives were authorized to negotiate a loan for the county to enable it to pay the bounty offered.

MAJOR-GENERAL JOHN ALEXANDER MCCLERNAND.

Every public man becomes, in the highest and most sacred sense, the embodiment of his constituents, whose number expands in direct ratio with the dimensions of the position he is called to fill and the height he attains as a representative of the ideas, desires and interests of a people. He being thus an epitome of the community, State or Nation whose servant he is, his acts and his life become the property of the commonwealth with whose history his deeds are interwoven. Biography, then, of every public man is history; and so interblended is it with the important events of this American Republic that the complete biographies of a score of its representative officials would furnish a pretty satisfactory history of the Nation. The biography of Maj. Gen. John A. McClernand is of this character. Being a citizen of Sangamon county, the military life of Gen. McClernand will be of interest to every citizen of the county, especially as it embraces several campaigns and many battles in which Sangamon county men participated.

John Alexander McClernand is the only child of John and Fatima McClernand, and was born in Breckenridge county, Kentucky, in 1812.

Soon after the birth of John, the family removed to Shawneetown, Illinois, where subsequently the elder McClernand died, his son then being only four years of age.

The boyhood and youth of eminent men, though frequently devoid of interest, is often pregnant with instruction. We shall be prepared to form some estimate of the energy and indomitable will of young McClernand when we reflect that at the early age of twenty, he had already overcome difficulties which weaker minds would have shrunk from as insurmountable, and that he was in consequence enabled to take a respectable position at the bar in the practice of the legal profession. The same year, 1832, he volunteered as a private in the Black Hawk War, where he served with honor till its close. In his experience in the field, he laid that foundation of military knowledge, and gained that practical insight into human character, which have been so valuable to him in after life, and which, in the rebellion enabled him to serve his country so well in the important positions which he was called upon to fill, first as a Brigadier, and subsequently, as a Major General.

In 1835 he established the first Democratic press that ever existed in Shawneetown; and in the same year re-commenced the practice of law, which he continued with success, up to the time of his election to Congress, in 1843.

In 1836, he was elected to the State Legislature, from the county of Gallatin. In this session he successfully vindicated the character of the President (Jackson), from certain charges preferred against him by Governor Duncan. In this session he also advocated that mode of constructing the Illinois and Michigan Canal which was known as the "Deep Cut Plan," and which was finally adopted. He was elected, we believe, unanimously, by the legislature, as Commissioner and Treasurer of the canal, and so faithfully did he discharge the duties confided to him, that various public meetings throughout the country complimented him by resolution, recognizing the value of his services.

In 1838 he was urged by his friends to accept the nomination for Lieutenant Governor, but declined, on the ground that he was under the Constitutional age—thirty years.

Among the resolutions adopted at the same convention in which he was offered the nomination for Lieutenant Governor, Mr. McClernand prepared and offered the following, which he regarded, most justly, as breathing the spirit of true Democracy:

*John A. M. Mermand
Maj. Gen. U. S. Vols*

"Resolved, That the Democratic principle is founded on an imperishable basis of truth and justice, and perpetually striving to sustain society in the exercise of every power which can promote honor or happiness, and elevate our condition; that, instead of warring against order, and encroaching on the privileges of others, the spirit of Democracy maintains an active principle of hope and virtue.

"Resolved, That we recognize no power but that which yields to the restraints of duty, and is guided by mind: That we only seek to obtain influence by means of free conviction; that we condemn all appeals to brute force and the exercise of violence, and that our only means of persuasion are reason and truth.

"Resolved, That our first aim is to connect our party with the cause of intelligence and morality; to seek the protection of every right consistent with the genius of our Constitution and the spirit of the age. We desire to extend moral culture, and to remove, as far as possible, all inequalities in our human condition, by embracing all improvements which can ameliorate our moral and political state."

These resolutions tell their own story, and they have only to be read to be appreciated by all lovers of liberty, all true Democrats everywhere. They are chiefly remarkable as emanating from so young a mind, and they are applicable to all times and all circumstances:—for though they were written some forty years ago, when the political atmosphere was calm and serene, they yet embody the only principles on which a free government can stand anywhere. For these reasons, and because these principles have actuated their author through his whole life, both civil and military, as this record will attest, they demand our highest consideration and respect.

In 1840 Mr. McClernand was elected a second time to the legislature from the county of Gallatin. In this session, one of the Judges of the Supreme Court, Theophilus W. Smith, took exception to some remarks made by Mr. McClernand in a debate on a reform of the Judiciary, and sent a challenge to Mr. McClernand, which he accepted; but the Judge failing to appear, the meeting did not take place.

In 1839 Mr. McClernand was nominated by a State Convention, as one of the electors to support Van Buren and Johnson in the Presidential election. The result was a majority of about four thousand votes for Van Buren and Johnson in that part of the State.

Mr. McClernand was re-elected to the legislature in 1842, from the county of Gallatin. As Chairman of the Committee of Finance, he brought forward several measures calculated to relieve the State from those financial troubles which he attributed to the banking system; and he had the good fortune to see all these measures adopted.

In 1843, while still a member of the legislature, he was elected a Representative to the Twenty-eighth Congress.

Before taking his seat, he married Sarah, daughter of Colonel Dunlap, of Jacksonville, Illinois, of one of the most reputable and influential families in the State.

His first speech in Congress was on the bill to refund the fine imposed on General Jackson by Judge Hall, and it evinced the warm affection which he had cherished for that illustrious man.

During the same session, he delivered a speech on the Rock Island controversy, which was very extensively published.

During the second session of the same Congress, as a member of the Committee on Public Land, he brought forward a comprehensive and interesting report, accompanied by a bill for a grant of land to and in completion of the Illinois and Michigan canal.

By an act of the legislature, a change in the usual time for holding elections had been made, and Mr. McClernand was re-elected to Congress in 1844.

He was one of the members who insisted on the maintenance of the extreme claim to fifty-four degrees, forty minutes, in the Oregon controversy with Great Britain; and he was earnestly bent on its assertion. As Chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, he brought forward a bill, accompanied by a report, to grant to the State of Tennessee the public lands of the United States lying within her borders. This bill became a law.

He gave a zealous support to the Administration in its measures touching the Mexican war. He voted to place at the disposal of the Executive all the men and money required to give success to our arms. His views as to the justice of the war, the plan of prosecuting it, and its consequences, were fully explained in a speech delivered by him in Congress on the 16th of June, 1846.

During the first session of the Twenty-ninth Congress, he brought forward the bill to reduce and graduate the price of the public lands, upon the principles and details of which he had bestowed much labor and reflection.

In the ensuing session, as Chairman of the same Committee, he took an active part in favor of the bill to bring into market the mineral region lying around Lake Superior, valuable for its extent and the quantity and rich quality of the copper found there. This bill became a law.

During the same session, he was called upon by the Jackson Monument Committee to present their memorial, which he did. On that occasion, he pronounced an eulogy on General Jackson, which was highly esteemed, and an extract from which we give below.

"This is not the occasion to pronounce a formal eulogy on the man whose last aspirations were for the welfare, the glory and happiness of his country. But I may be allowed to say, that Andrew Jackson was a man of no common order. Left fatherless and friendless in his youth, he wrote the word excellior on his crest, and pushed his way upward and onward to power and distinction, from the rank of a private to that of a general, and from the position of a citizen to that of Chief Magistrate of the Republic. The name of Jackson, the indomitable, the strong willed, the honest, the unflinching,—the man of iron,—has become a household word to his countrymen—an invocation of patriotism and duty to all lands. What he said and did is written in that word of words and deeds accumulated from the wisdom and heroism of ages; and as a lesson and incentive of posterity, it will remain written forever. Endowed, perhaps, with a less bold and subtle philosophy than Jefferson, with a less dazzling and theoretic genius than Napoleon, he was the equal of either in energy and concentration of purpose—the superior of both in the attribute of common sense. His principles were lofty and stern—proof alike against power and corruption. Like Socrates, he could have written, unmoved, the ballot of his own ostracism, or watched by the flickering torches of night, untempted over the treasure which strewed the field of Plato. As a General he was active and daring, yet vigilant and judicious; to constancy and fortitude he added impetuous, almost romantic valor. At the battle of New Orleans, he won the crowning glory of his military career. There he confirmed the great truth proclaimed upon the classic plains of Marathon—the pre-eminence of free States in defense of their hearth-stones and independence, over the unwieldy empires of crowned conquerors. As it is the habit of a free people to delegate great authority to one man who is the reflex of the popular will—the individualized Agora, through which the voice of the Nation is heard, not only in the present, but in after times also, so, it is not to be wondered, that Jackson, with such qualities as he possessed, should have been that man to the people of his time. The pride we feel in the man is not a partizan pride; it arises from what he did for his country. There is no vandal hand to tear away the first leaf in chaplet of laurels, and the smoke of destruction which was to obscure his fame has passed away for ever."

In 1846 Mr. McClernand was elected a third time to Congress, and this time also without opposition. In the course of the following summer, he was frequently called upon to address the soldiers returning from the war. At a public dinner given in Fairfield, to celebrate the return of our Illinois Volunteers, being called upon, he delivered an address which thus concludes:

"Now, gentlemen, in conclusion, allow me to exhort you to support our civil institutions, as one of the highest duties incumbent on citizens and patriots. Study and understand their twofold character. Remember that they are both local and general, State and Federal; and to what is Federal accord the things which are Federal, and to what is State the rights of the States. In short, uphold the whole system of confining the action of the several parts to their appointed spheres. Thus guarded and protected, the Union will long endure as the ark of our political safety. Like the grain of mustard seed compared in the parable to the Kingdom of God, it will grow and continue to grow, until its shadow shall cover the whole earth."

In 1848 Mr. McClernand was re-elected to Congress, though not without opposition.

In 1849, as a member of a select committee on certain charges against President Polk for having established a tariff of duties in the posts of the Mexican Republic, Mr. McClernand, in a minority report on behalf of himself and Mr. Venable, another member of the committee, defended the action of the President with great power and incontrovertible argument.

In 1850, at the instance of other leading men, Mr. McClernand prepared and offered the first draft of the famous compromise measures of that year. But the same subject being taken up in the Senate by the committee of which Mr. Clay was the chairman, who reported a bill which passed both Houses. Mr. McClernand presided in a committee of the whole during its progress through the House. During this session Mr. McClelland delivered an elaborate speech on the same subject.

He also, at the same session, drafted the bill granting a quantity of land in aid of the construction of the Illinois Central Railroad and its Chicago branch. His colleague, Senator Douglas, being furnished with a copy, introduced it into the Senate, and, with amendments, it passed both Houses and became a law.

In the same year and during the same session, as chairman of the House Committee on Foreign Affairs, he brought forward a plan for the re-organization of the State Department.

In 1851, declining re-election, he retired from Congress, after eight years' faithful service and a most brilliant and successful career in the cause of his country and of good government, and removed to Jacksonville, Illinois.

In 1852 he was chosen a second time an Elector for President and Vice-President, and voted for Pierce and King.

In 1856 he made a powerful speech at Alton, Illinois, deprecating the repeal of the Missouri Compromise, and predicting danger to the country as its consequence.

This speech produced a great sensation at the time, and provoked the wrath of many of the Democratic leaders. Mr. McClelland being asked how he dared to give expression to such heterodoxical sentiment, answered, that it was "because he esteemed his country and his fame of higher value than the interests of party."

In 1856, he removed to Springfield, the capital of Illinois, and soon gained a commanding position in the State and Federal Courts.

In 1858, he wrote a letter on the Kansas imbroglio, which was extensively circulated.

In 1859, he was elected from the Capital to the popular branch of Congress, to fill the vacancy caused by the death of Major T. L. Harris.

In 1860, he introduced a bill repealing the law organizing the Territory of Utah, and merging that Territory in others. This was his plan for overcoming the ascendancy of the Mormons, and arresting the evils of polygamy.

But on the 14th of January, 1861, he delivered a speech in the House of Representatives on the Union and the phantom of "no coercion" while from its comprehensiveness, its accurate historical research, its close and conclusive argument, cannot be surpassed and scarcely equalled in the whole range of parliamentary literature. Those who wish to make themselves familiar with this great subject and its masterly treatment, ought, by all means, to peruse the speech as it was delivered. We shall only be able to give one or two passages here which appears to us perfect of their kind, and very gems of patriotism and eloquence. Mark the following:

"No! the Mississippi valley is a geographical unit. Its grand river, with its intersecting tributaries, reaching out in every direction to its utmost limits, is the hand of Almighty God binding it together in one homogeneous and complete whole. It is an organic body, inseparable except by violence to the laws of nature, and those other laws of commerce, education and society, which are the necessary results of the former. Let it be divided to-day, and ere long, when the frenzy of the hour shall have subsided, its dismembered parts will cleave together again by irresistible attraction; will reunite as the lips of an incised wound, by the just intention. A higher law than the slave-law must control the destiny of the Mississippi Valley, the law of mutual attraction and cohesion. I say this in no offensive, but in a philosophical sense, and the reconstruction jobbers of the day, if they would make permanent work, must bear it in mind."

Again, hear him on the subject of "coercion."

"We hear the clamor of 'coercion'—of coercion of States. What is the foundation for this clamor? Do the friends of the Union propose to invade South Carolina for the purpose of subjugating her people? Do they propose to force them to send her members of Congress back here, or to perform any other active Federal duty? Not so! All we propose is to protect the property and jurisdiction of the United States by defensive measures, no more. Is that coercion?"

"Again, sir, is it coercion of a State, for us to do that we are sworn to do—to support the Constitution and the laws and treaties of the United States? Is it coercion for us to maintain possession of the treasures and other property of the United States? To stay the violent and lawless hand that would tear down the noble structure of our Government? Nay, more, is it coercion for us to let the flag of the Union stand upon the bosom of our country where our fathers planted it? To let the eagle of America sweep with buoyant wing the entire domain of this great Nation? Is this coercion? Why, sir, it is a perversion of all language, a mocking of all ideas to say so! Rather is it coercion for a State to require us to submit to her spoliation of the posts, arsenals, dock-yards, custom houses, post offices and the arms and munitions of the United States. Such submission, sir, in my opinion, would be in the last degree reprehensible and disgraceful. Utter imbecility alone can tolerate it, and, if this be the condition of our Government, let us at once abolish it, and proclaim to the world the sad fact that the last and most auspicious experiment of free Government has signally failed!"

In April, 1861, at the instance of Governor Yates, Mr. McClernand being still a member of Congress, accompanied an armed volunteer force from the Capital of Illinois to Cairo and occupied that place.

While there, he caused the steamers passing from St. Louis to Louisville and other intermediate points in Missouri and Kentucky, to be brought to at Cairo, and thus he wrested from rebel agents a considerable quantity of arms and munitions designed for rebel use.

While at Cairo, he took great pains to inform himself respecting the condition of affairs in the southwest. He learned that there was, as yet, no rebel force either at Memphis, Corinth, Columbus or Madrid; and that public sentiment was still fluctuating between treason and loyalty, and that the most favorable opportunity for striking a decisive blow in the interest of the Union was still open.

Hastening back to Springfield, he laid this important fact before Governor Yates, and drawing up a plan of operations, accompanied the Governor to Washington, and laid it before the President, and, at the instance of the latter, before Scott, the General in Chief.

It would have been well for the interests of the country, had Mr. McClernand's plan been carried out at that time. But Kentucky neutrality seemed to stand in the way, until those strongholds were seized and fortified by the enemy. Then, indeed, the Government and the whole country awoke to a full sense of their importance, and no wonder; for before they could be removed, the battles of Belmont, Forts Henry and Donelson, the fields of Shiloh and Madrid, the naval battle of Memphis, and the sieges of Island No. Ten and of Corinth, had to be fought, all of which might have been saved, if Mr. McClernand's prudent counsel had been followed in time.

In July, 1861, Mr. McClernand took his seat in Congress, and was active and influential in inspiring and arming the Nation for the approaching conflict. With this view, he offered the following preamble and resolution:

"WHEREAS, A portion of the people of the United States, in violation of their constitutional obligations, have taken up arms against the National Government, and are now striving, by aggressive and iniquitous war, to overthrow it and break up the Union of these States; therefore,

"Resolved, That this House hereby pledges itself to vote any amount of money, and any number of men that may be necessary to insure a speedy and efficient suppression of such rebellion, and the permanent restoration of Federal authority every where within the limits and jurisdiction of the United States."

In the following month (August 4th), in common with his colleagues from Illinois, he was called upon by the President, to recommend to him a list of names for appointment as Brigadiers, and to fix the order of their rank. All his colleagues united in recommending him for the first appointment; but, refusing to recommend himself, and joining with the others in recommending U. S. Grant, the latter thus gained seniority of rank.

Immediately resigning his seat in Congress, Mr. McClernand returned to Illinois, with written authority to raise a brigade. His influence soon brought to his aid men of the highest character. There was considerable competition to join his command; and before the expiration of August, he was ordered to Cairo by Major General Fremont.

On the 5th of September, 1861, Brigadier General McClernand assumed command at Cairo, and within two hours afterwards he had provided the outfit and transports for the expedition which resulted in the occupation of Paducah by General Grant.

While at Cairo, he inspired the soldiers with a laudable ambition to excel in drill and in discipline. Under his command, Cairo itself became one of the most orderly and temperate cities of the Union.

On the 6th of November, he embarked his brigade at Cairo, under orders to descend the Mississippi and make a demonstration against Belmont, on the Missouri shore, opposite Columbus, in Kentucky. On the 7th he disembarked his forces, about a mile and a fourth above Belmont, and advanced rapidly upon that place. Several times he rallied his men and led them to the charge in person. Several times he rode between the hostile lines, and encouraged his men by his presence and example. His saddle harness was torn in several places by hostile bullets; his horse was wounded in two places; one of his aides was killed, and the horses of the others killed or wounded under them.

The enemy, after having been driven from their works, and their camp burned, were heavily reinforced from Columbus, and intercepted the Union forces on their return to their transports. Another battle must now be fought, to extricate our forces from perilous position,—and our little band of heroes proved themselves equal to the emergency. They fought with a valor and desperation that would do honor to veterans; and after a terrible struggle gained the landing, where our transports were waiting to receive them. General McClernand, with Captains Schwartz and Hatch, were the last to embark, and they remained on shore till the last transport was being pushed off.

In January, 1862, General McClernand made an armed reconnaissance of the enemy's stronghold, at Columbus. This expedition was designed as a diversion in favor of General Buell, who was expected to attack Johnson, at Bowling Green, and it caused a rebel force to evacuate Camp Beauregard, in Tennessee, destroy a railroad bridge across Obien river, and to seek shelter within the fortifications of Columbus; and by it the dormant Union feeling in the hearts of the people was greatly encouraged.

In February, 1862, General McClernand, commanding a division, led the advance of the fleet of transports up the Tennessee river; and on the 6th of that month, co-operating with the Mississippi flotilla under Commodore Foote, moved by land upon Fort Henry. That fortress, assailed in front by gunboats, and threatened in the rear by the rapid advance of McClernand, was abandoned by the enemy; leaving seventeen heavy guns to fall into our possession, besides eight field pieces, abandoned in their flight before the rapidly advancing forces of General McClernand.

On the 11th of February, McClernand led the advance against Fort Donelson, and on the following day attacked and drove in the enemy's pickets.

On the fall of Fort Henry, the rebel troops that had evacuated that position rushed across the peninsula to Fort Donelson, a distance of some ten or twelve miles, adding their strength to the already powerful garrison at that point.

General Buckner had been in command of that post; General Pillow, from Columbus, had already been ordered to strengthen him, and General Floyd was also ordered to proceed immediately to Donelson with heavy reinforcements. Guns, ammunition, and all the necessary material of war, were sent there in great abundance from Nashville. The rebels had made their preparations for a long and desperate struggle; and on the 13th of February there were assembled within the ramparts not less than twenty thousand troops. They were commanded by Generals Floyd, Pillow, Buckner and Bushrod R. Johnson. Floyd held the chief command.

These rebel forces, sheltered as they were behind the works of Fort Donelson, ought to have successfully resisted three or four times their number of an enemy in the open field,—yet the Union forces, which did not much exceed those of the rebels in number, in an incredibly short time overpowered the garrison and occupied the fortress, in spite of the efforts of the enemy to repel their attack. We shall soon see by what agency this was effected.

The disposition of the Union troops was as follows: General McClernand's division constituted the right wing of the besieging forces, and lay to the west and south of the fortifications; General Smith's division occupied the left wing, menacing the foe to north and west. As yet, there was no center; this was to be occupied by the troops which were expected in the transports, on their way with the gunboats. The two wings of McClernand and Smith, together, constituted a force of twenty thousand men, with seventeen batteries of artillery and from twelve to fifteen hundred cavalry. The two wings touched each other, and at that central point, directly west of the fort, General Grant established his headquarters.

Early in the afternoon of the 13th, "The Carondelet," one of the gunboats, arrived, and the entire fleet about midnight, when the work of disembarking the troops and stores commenced. By noon of Friday, 14th, the troops, ten thousand in number, were landed and marched to join their comrades, and, under General Lew Wallace, formed the center of the besieging force.

The morning of Saturday, 15th, opened cold and gloomy. A snow had fallen. The condition of both armies was miserable; that of the rebels desperate. They were now surrounded on all sides. They were shut in from reinforcements and supplies. During the night the rebel officers held a consultation and decided on a sortie. For this purpose, under the veil of darkness and the storm, they massed nearly their entire force upon the southern, or left wing of the fortifications. They also quietly moved several of their batteries to this position. It was their plan to cut through the National line at this point. The line, thus broken and thrown into disorder, would be compelled to make a sudden change of position. In the confusion of this change they were to be attacked both in front and flank and driven back to the outposts. The rebels hoped thus to effect a safe retreat to the South by cutting their way through our lines.

The National army enclosed the rebel fortifications in the form of a crescent. The extreme left touched the river on the north at the point where the transports landed. The extreme right touched upon Indian creek, at that time unfordable, on the south, and that creek emptied itself into the Tennessee river less than half a mile from the point touched by the right wing. As before stated, General McClelland was in command of the right wing, General Smith of the left, and General Lew Wallace of the center.

About daylight on the morning of the 15th (Saturday) the enemy, with nearly triple of McClelland's men, has made a furious attack on his line, in order to effect their purpose of cutting their way through his command and making their escape.

The enemy's habit of massing his forces and precipitating them upon a single point was not so familiar to our Generals at that time as it afterwards became, and no precautions had been taken to provide against or counteract it. On the contrary, General Grant had given orders on the previous day to Generals Wallace and Smith not to move from their respective positions on any account whatever until they should hear from him, and it unfortunately happened at this particular juncture that he was absent from his headquarters to consult Commodore Foote at the landing respecting a renewal of the assault by the gunboats. The consequence was that General McClelland, with an effective force under ten thousand men, had to sustain the brunt of the battle, unsupported, from the early dawn until 1 o'clock p. m., not a solitary shot having been fired from any other part of our lines. On him, therefore, and his heroic soldiers alone, rested the whole burden of this terrible conflict for more than seven dreary hours, and impartial history will attest how he and his men bore themselves during this fiery ordeal, so trying to the spirit of the man and the soldier. They came out of that ordeal like gold purified in the furnace, and by it were enabled to prove their undying patriotism, their unconquerable valor! Had they wavered or faltered never so little on that occasion, the battle was lost, and the great glory of the capture of Donelson would have eluded our grasp.

Hear what Abbott says on this subject in his History of the Civil War, volume 1, page 467:

"Our troops, as usual, were outnumbered, but they fought with a bravery never surpassed by veterans. Even the foe was constrained to do homage to their valor. Notwithstanding the vastly superior force of the enemy, and, though unsupported by adequate artillery, the National troops drove their assailants back twice almost into their intrenchments."

Though General McClelland's urgent appeals for re-inforcements were unanswered, owing to the absence of General Grant, still he fought on intrepidly against his overwhelming assailants, until the woods and thickets in his front were riddled and whitened with bullets, and the line which he and the enemy held alternately was strewn with the dead bodies of friend and foe.

The rebel General, Pillow, in his official report of this transaction, bears witness to the indomitable bravery and perseverance of our troops on this occasion. He says:

"The enemy did not retreat, but fell back, contesting every inch of ground."

And Abbott, in his History of the Civil War in America, says, speaking of this battle:

"For five hours, the blood-red tide of battle surged to and fro. For a long time, one brigade of General McClelland's division, under Colonel Oglesby, had to meet the whole force of the battle alone. General McClelland sent to General Wallace for re-inforcements, but he had received his instructions. General Wallace, however, forwarded his request to headquarters. General Grant was not there."

General Grant, having at length made his appearance, and re-inforcements arriving about the same time, the enemy were driven back within their intrenchments, and next morning (Sunday, 16th) they surrendered unconditionally, and were made prisoners of war.

General McClelland's forces having mainly fought this glorious battle, suffered, consequently, the greatest loss in killed and wounded, nearly every fifth man being found on the list of killed, wounded, or missing.

The personal bravery of General McClelland throughout the whole of this terrible conflict was so conspicuous that the members of his staff frequently remonstrated with him for exposing himself so recklessly to the bullets of the foe; but on such occasions he would answer that "it was a case of desperation, and that desperation knows no reserve." When his officers sent in dispatches, stating that they were hard-pressed, he would dash fearlessly among the men, and by his courage and example stimulate them to perform their duty, exhorting them to maintain their ground at all hazards, "till General Grant or re-inforcements should arrive."

This forcibly reminds us of the Duke of Wellington and the British army at Waterloo. Whilst the Duke's soldiers were being mowed down by the French artillery, and it seemed to some of his staff impossible that the troops could maintain their ground much longer, the Duke kept looking at his watch, and was heard to exclaim: "Would to God, that either night or Blucher would arrive!" Then, turning to his officers, he exclaimed: "Well, gentlemen, in any event, we must not submit while a man of us remains! What would they say of us in England?"

Immediately after the battle of Fort Donelson General McClelland was promoted to the rank of Major General.

March 4th, 1862, the division of General McClelland was ordered to march for the Tennessee river, and it arrived at Pine Landing on the 5th. On the 10th, he moved up the river and arrived at Savannah, Tennessee, on the same day.

March 26th, General McClelland had ascended to Pittsburg Landing, and encamped near the west bank of the Tennessee river, twenty miles from Corinth, where the rebels were in large numbers. On the 27th he wrote to General Grant, urging him to come up from Savannah and see that a proper disposition of the divisions were made to meet the contingency of an attack.

On the 6th and 7th of April, 1862, was fought and won for the Union cause, the celebrated battle of Shiloh, a victory like that of Fort Donelson, snatched from the jaws of defeat.

The forces of the rebels were over eighty thousand, and some say one hundred thousand, while the Union forces on the ground did not exceed forty thousand.

The attack was sudden and unexpected. The rebels had concentrated an overwhelming force, according to their usual tactics, for the purpose of crushing out the small body of Union troops in advance of the main army, and thus securing an easy victory over the remainder; and it is almost a miracle that they did not succeed, and that our forces were enabled to escape utter annihilation. But the same unflinching courage which had saved them before, came to their succor once again, and, by the same almost superhuman exertions, saved them from destruction.

When General McClelland had been aroused by the heavy sound of firing in his front, and observed the enemy to dash through the positions of General Prentiss, he at once realized the danger, and instantly prepared to meet it. Addressing a few brief but burning words to his soldiers, to inspire them with courage and arouse their patriotism, and seizing a standard and waving it in the breeze, he led his men to the attack. A terrible struggle ensued. But it will be more satisfactory if we give here a few extracts from General McClelland's official report of this great battle. He says:

"Before my left, consisting of the Third Brigade, could form for the support of General Sherman, the enemy had pierced General Prentiss' line, afterwards taking him and a number of his men prisoners, and rapidly forcing back General Sherman's left wing, was pressing on my left with a mass five regiments deep, bearing the American flag.

"Discovering that this honored emblem was not borne by General Prentiss' retiring forces, but was used by the enemy as a means of deception, I ordered the Third Brigade to form in line of battle, fronting the enemy's advance, nearly at a right angle with General Sherman's line. But before the order had been fully executed, the enemy had appeared within short musket range, and opened a deadly fire upon us.

"Colonel Raith, commanding the Third Brigade, ordered a charge upon the enemy, in which he fell mortally wounded, whilst encouraging his men by his heroic and daring example. Several other officers besides were killed or wounded in this charge.

"The situation of the Third Brigade was now most critical. Generals Prentiss' and Thomas' Divisions had retired, leaving the Brigade exposed to a combined attack of the forces of Beauregard and Polk, which were sweeping round on the right and left. In obedience to my command, the Brigade fell back, under the orders of Lieutenant-Colonel Engleman, about three hundred yards, and re-formed in front of my headquarters, joining the Second Brigade, under Colonel C. C. Marsh.

"The action, both by infantry and artillery, now became desperate all along the line. Our forces, however, were overborne by superior numbers, which still continued to flank the right of my line. Burrough's battery was soon lost, including seventy horses killed.

"Wholly unsupported on my left, to save my command from being surrounded, I ordered it to fall back about 200 yards, and to form at a right angle with the centre of my camp.

"Making another stand upon the ground here indicated, the contest was carried on for some time by infantry and artillery. Trees of considerable size were cut off or scathed by the rounded shot of opposing batteries, and considerable loss in killed and wounded was sustained on both sides.

"At length, checking the enemy in front, I pressed the advantage, driving him back some distance, but, re-inforced by fresh troops, his wavering lines were strengthened, and commenced turning my right and left, driving me back about two hundred yards, to the fourth position, in an open road, skirting an open field.

"Here I was joined by the Forty-third Illinois, by a portion of ——— battery, by a portion of Taylor's battalion, and by a portion of Sherman's division, and the contest was again renewed with increased fury on both sides.

"Continuing the sanguinary engagement, until several regiments of my division had exhausted their ammunition, and its right flank had been borne back and was in danger of being turned, the remainder of my command, with the exception hereinafter noticed, also fell back to the camp of the first brigade. Here the portion which had first fallen back re-formed, in obedience to my orders, parallel with the camp and fronting the approach of the enemy from the west, while the other portions formed at a right angle with it, still parting the approach of the enemy from the south. It was ten o'clock p. m., when my fifth line had thus been formed.

"I kept the enemy in check for some time by the fire of my batteries. Detained from a direct advance, he moved a considerable force to the right flank, with the evident intention to turn my left. To defeat this purpose, I ordered my command to fall back in the direction of the landing, across a deep hollow, and to re-form on the east side of another piled on the skirt of a wood. This was my sixth line.

"Here we rested a half hour, continuing to supply our men with ammunition, until the enemy's cavalry were seen rapidly crossing the field to the charge. Waiting until they had approached within some thirty paces of our line, I ordered a fire, which was delivered with great coolness and destructive effect. First halting, then wavering, they turned and fled in confusion, leaving behind them a number of riders and horses dead on the field.

"In the meantime, strengthened by large reinforcements the enemy continued his endeavors to turn the flanks of my line, and to cut me off from the landing. To prevent this, I ordered my left to fall back a short distance and form an obtuse angle with the centre, opposing a double front facing the enemy's approach. Thus disposed, my left held the enemy in check while my whole line slowly fell back to the seventh position.

"Here I re-formed the worn and famishing remnant of my division, on favorable ground, along a north and south road; supported on my right by fragments of General Sherman's division, and on my left by the Fifteenth and Forty-sixth Illinois, under command of Colonel Veatch, acting Brigadier. Hastily completing this disposition, I ordered up McAlister's battery, which took position about the center of my line, supported by the Eighteenth Illinois, Captain Anderson, Company F, commanding. The Seventh Illinois being separated from the Second Division, was formed by me as a reserve.

"The enemy renewed the contest by trying to shell us from our position. McAlister's battery replied with great spirit—first alone, and soon after in conjunction with another battery, whose name was unknown to me. Attempting so often in vain to turn the flanks of my line and gain its rear, the enemy now gave evidence of a change of tactics. Led by the Louisiana Zouaves, he advanced in heavy column to break our center, while we awaited his approach within sure range, and opened a terrible fire upon him. The head of his advancing column was instantly mowed down. The remainder of it swayed to and fro, a few moments, and then turned and fled. This second success in the two last engagements terminated a struggle of ten and a half hours' duration, namely: from six o'clock a. m. to four and a quarter p. m., and saved our army, transports and all, from capture."

Such is the simple but thrilling language in which the narrative of that terrible conflict is given by one who acted a conspicuous part in it, and who might justly say, "Quæque ipse miserrima vidi et quorum pars magna fui."

The last paragraph, in particular, is sublime, and reminds us more of the echo of Bunker Hill than anything else we remember in history: "We awaited his approach within sure range, and opened a terrible fire upon him. The head of his advancing column was instantly mowed down; the remainder of it swayed to and fro, for a few moments, and then turned and fled!"

It is not necessary to give further details of this terrible battle. It is known to all, that our army, being reinforced, attacked the enemy next morning and drove him from the field,—but it is also known that our victory was purchased dearly.

All comment on this great battle seems to us superfluous. We will venture the remark, however, that on no former occasion in this war, or in the annals of history were officers and men more severely tested, as to every quality which constitutes the soldier and the man, then our officers and men were tested in those two days' bloody conflict at Shiloh.

After the victory of Shiloh, preparations were made to advance upon Corinth. General McClelland's command was increased, by General Halleck's order, to a corps. This, together with his former command constituted the army corps of reserve.

Our troops advanced cautiously upon Corinth, and after a smart skirmish with a remnant of the enemy, purposely detached from their main body to deceive us, they took possession of Corinth, without further resistance, as it had been evacuated by the enemy. This conspicuous event occurred on the 30th of May, 1862.

By the 12th of June, General McClelland's forces had seized Bethel, Jackson, Bolivar, Somerville, and occupied all the country between Pittsburg Landing and Memphis, establishing order and quieting the fears of the inhabitants.

August 28th Major General McClelland left Jackson, Tennessee to report to Governor Yates, of Illinois, to assist in raising and organizing the new levies of that year. Not long after he left, the enemy returned to West Tennessee, seized Jackson and the railroads, stopped navigation on the Tennessee river, and pushed their incursions almost to Columbus.

Shortly after reporting to Governor Yates in Illinois, General McClelland repaired to Washington, by order of the Governor, on some business connected with the War Department respecting the organization of the troops.

While at Washington, General McClelland paid his respects to the President, and in the course of conversation, he pointed out to Mr. Lincoln, the necessity of opening the Mississippi, at an early day, to the traffic of the great Northwest.

The President seemed pleased with the familiarity displayed by the General with this subject, and invited him to reduce his ideas to writing, to which he gladly consented, and on the 28th of September, submitted to Mr. Lincoln an elaborate paper, setting forth and explaining his view in regard to the conduct of the war in the Southwest, and again urging the speedy organization of an expedition to carry these views into execution.

This document being the real motive power of the advance upon Vicksburg and Port Hudson, is destined to become of great historical importance, inasmuch as it changed completely the war policy of the Government, in that section of the country, substituting a war of aggression on the vital and vulnerable points of the enemy, for that desultory and inefficient border-warfare which had previously been the rule.

We shall here submit an epitome of that document, which will embrace its essential points in as small a compass as possible.

"Carry the war into the heart of the rebellion, as the surest way of crushing it out and of opening the Mississippi river.

"The opening of that river is itself an essential step towards crushing the rebellion.

"It is important in a military point of view:

"First—As affording cheap and easy communication between our troops scattered along the Mississippi and its tributaries, and would facilitate their concentration at any given point.

"Second—As cutting off all communication between the rebels to the east and west of that river."

"Commercially, the whole Nation is deeply interested in the free and unobstructed navigation of the Mississippi river, but more immediately and intimately is the great Northwest concerned in that important movement. The people of the whole Mississippi valley are painfully alive to this subject. They have not yet complained in this matter; they have sympathized with the Administration in the difficulties with which it had to contend, and, therefore, refrained from selfishly obtruding their own grievances upon its attention. Nay, they are grateful for what the Government has done, rather than complaining of what it has left undone.

"Yet, it is true that this river, which carries annually on its bosom a commerce amounting to $150,000,000, is virtually closed and rendered useless by an insignificant garrison at Vicksburg, so that the products of agriculture have been accumulating in the hands of the producers, until they have become well nigh worthless.

"If this continues, general bankruptcy must ensue, and the Government itself must suffer from the inability of the people to contribute to its support. No wonder the people, in large assemblies, should cry out earnestly for a relief which they would hail with such delight. If this is not conceded, have we not reason to fear a violent popular reaction unfavorable to the success of our arms and the cause which they are upholding?

"In order, then, to remove all obstructions to navigation, a force of sixty thousand men should descend the Mississippi in transports, conveyed by gunboats, to the mouth of the Yazoo river, and ascend that river to the first eligible landing on its south bank.

"This column, assisted by the gunboats, should then seize Vicksburg, and, having garrisoned that place, should advance upon Jackson, the capital of Mississippi, only forty-five miles distant, and, having in like manner seized and fortified that city, it should re-open the railroad to New Orleans. Our forces at the latter place might co-operate with this column in effecting this object.

"The column should next push forward to the junction of the Southern Mississippi and Ohio and Mobile railroads, at the town of Meridan, seventy-five miles east of Jackson, where it would be within threatening distance of both Mobile and Montgomery, the capital of Alabama. Having secured their places, our forces should establish a depot of military stores at Mobile, only one hundred and sixty-five miles by railroad from Montgomery, and this latter place is only seventy-five miles from Opelika, near the western boundary of Georgia, a most important place, for at Opelika the whole railroad system of the Southern States converges into the Montgomery and West Point railroad, which is one of the two links connecting that system by rail with the Gulf system. By seizing this place, the Atlantic communication by rail between the revolted States, east and west, would be severed.

"To aid this enterprise a Federal force should be advanced from Port Royal into the interior, and naval demonstrations ought to be made along the Southern Atlantic and Gulf coast. The Union forces now in West Tennessee or a portion of those in Kentucky, might be sent to seize the noticeable railroad triangle, of which Boyce and Dalton are the base, and Cleveland on the Tennessee and Georgia railroad is the apex. This would greatly facilitate the movement upon Vicksburg. This auxiliary movement is deemed indispensable, unless the column operating against Vicksburg should be increased to more than 60,000 men.

"The seizure of the above mentioned triangle would place our army in a favorable position to march South on Rome, in Georgia, one of the principal arsenals and manufactories of arms in the revolted States, or it might thence march northward on Knoxville, in Tennessee.

"The two railroads above alluded to are the umbilical cords of the two systems, and form their only band of union. By cutting these a serious blow would be struck at the rebellion.

"Experience proves that the rebellion cannot be conquered by a desultory border warfare. This can only be done by destroying the enemy's railroad communications, and by aggressive war upon his vital parts. These are in the Gulf States—the home and the first love of the arch-traitor who initiated our present National difficulties. Strike home a deadly blow on these States, and the rebellion will be virtually subdued."

Such, substantially, was the plan of operations which General McClernand laid before the President and Secretary Stanton, both of whom entirely coincided with the General in his views, and promised to give his plan due consideration at an early day. But the General-in-Chief, for some reason, appeared unwilling to consider the plan, pretending he was otherwise engaged. This delayed the execution of the plan considerably.

General McClernand, however, persevered against all obstacles, declaring that something must be done for the relief of the great Northwest, and so urged the matter, that Mr. Stanton at length informed him that an expedition of land and naval forces would be organized for the purpose of opening the Mississippi river, and that the land forces would for the present consist of thirty thousand men.

On examination, however, it was found that no forces could be spared from their present positions, and that a new force must be raised for the purpose; so that the Mississippi expedition was on the point of being abandoned for the present.

But this would not satisfy General McClernand. He again urged on the President and Secretary of War, the absolute necessity of the expedition, and so far prevailed, that they agreed to draft a confidential but conditional document, ordering Major-General McClernand to organize the troops remaining in Indiana, Illinois and Iowa, and such as should be raised by volunteering and draft, and to forward them to such point as may be designated by the General-in-Chief, that an expedition may be organized under General McClernand's command against Vicksburg, and to clear the Mississippi river and open navigation to New Orleans. The forces thus organized, however, were "subject to the designation of the General-in-Chief, according to such exigencies as the service, in his judgment, may require."

The day after receiving this order, Major-General McClernand left Washington and arrived at Indianapolis on the twenty-third of October, where he found Governor Morton disposed to aid him in organizing the contemplated expedition; as he afterwards found Governors Yates and Kirkwood, of Illinois and Iowa.

In the short space of sixteen days, General McClernand had forwarded from the different camps in Illinois, six regiments of infantry and one six gun battery, to Memphis, Tennessee.

From Indiana, five regiments of infantry; from Iowa, three had been forwarded to Columbus, Kentucky.

In addition to these, there was another regiment of infantry in Illinois under marching orders; and three others in the same State were ready for muster, and two other regiments of infantry in Iowa.

This great activity in those three States, and the rapidity with which these preparations were urged forward, demonstrated the energy and zeal of the General, as well as of the different Governors and State officers engaged in them, and clearly illustrates the deep interest which the people of the northwest felt in the re-opening of the "Father of Waters" to lawful navigation and commerce.

The Secretary of War relied largely on General McClernand's personal influence in the West, as well as in the local interest manifested in the expedition, for filling up the ranks with the elite of our western soldiers; nor was he mistaken. Men came forward in great numbers to enlist under the banner of a General who had distinguished himself in the Halls of Congress as their Representative, and who still more recently had won well merited fame and glory on the bloody battle fields of his country. Forty thousand troops were raised in thirty-five days.

But General McClernand, fearing that after all the project might be abandoned, and believing that General Halleck had disposed of the troops raised for the expedition, in some other way; and moreover, understanding that in answer to General Grant's enquiry respecting the command of these troops, General Halleck replied that he (Grant) should have the command of them. For these reasons, General McClernand expressed his views and feelings in a remarkable letter to the Secretary of War, of which we can only give here a brief synopsis:

"The avidity of the people for carrying out this expedition exposes all charged with it to the consequences of popular fury, if they fail in carrying it out.

"If, from any cause, it has become an uncertainty or shall be long delayed, I trust you will cut my supposed connection with it, and order me to other duty in the field at once.

"By the blockade of the Mississippi, the people have but one outlet open to them—that by the lakes and railroads alone. By combinations or otherwise, close corporations controlling these outlets have raised freights so as to stop shipments or sacrifice traders. The monopolists are interested in continuing the blockade. The people, therefore are not disposed to brook further delay in removing that obstacle; indeed, such delay may add another geographical question to the one which is now undergoing the arbitration of arms. Already there are those who look beyond Federal authority to secure the freedom of the Mississippi river. The resentment of the people will be inflamed by demagogues, to array them against the people of the East, on the pretended ground that the interests of the latter induce them to favor the blockade of the Mississippi.

"This sentiment is criminal, we must preserve the Union and the Government. Yet wise Statesmen will not overlook the difficulties and dangers which surround them.

"Let me, therefore, appeal to you and the President, to do something, and that quickly, to avert the rising storm, etc."

General McClernand, hearing from various rumors and newspaper reports, that his command of the expedition had been given to another, repeatedly telegraphed to Washington to ascertain the truth. At length, after much painful suspense, he was relieved of duty at Springfield, and ordered to report to General Grant, for "the purpose specified in an order of the General-in-Chief."

On his arrival at Memphis, General Hurlbut, who was in command, there informed him that General Grant had abandoned his plan of advancing upon Oxford, Mississippi, having been compelled to fall back to Holly Springs, forty-five miles distant from Memphis. General McClernand now received a communication from General Grant, to the effect that orders assigning him (General McClernand) to the immediate command of the expedition, had been forwarded to Memphis. General Grant also remarked, that he had received information from rebel sources, that Sherman had already attacked and captured Vicksburg.

The orders of General Grant were received by General McClernand on the 29th. They consisted of two letters; one dated Oxford, Mississippi, December 18, 1862, informed General McClernand of his appointment to the command of an army corps in Grant's department, giving him command of the Mississippi river expedition; and orders that the written instructions given General Sherman, shall be turned over to McClernand on his arrival at Memphis. The other letter of General Grant's was dated at Holly Springs, December 25, and was directed "to the Commanding Officer of the Expedition Down the River."

Leaving Memphis on the 30th, General McClernand arrived at Millikin's Bend next day, a few miles north of Vicksburg. Here General Sherman came on board the Tigress to turn over his instructions to the proper commander of the expedition and to consult him regarding further operations of the army. Here, for the first time, General McClernand was made aware of the real condition of the army which had been assigned to his command by the President and Secretary of War. General Sherman had left Memphis on the 20th of December, had attacked the enemy in his strongly fortified position along Chickasaw bayou on the 28th, and had been badly handled and repulsed with heavy loss.

Various opinions respecting this expedition have been entertained. The prevailing one is that it was gotten up without proper care, and was at once sent South to escape General McClernand and capture Vicksburg before the latter could arrive and take the command.

There seems, certainly, something suspicious in this whole transaction, as can readily be seen by what follows:

The order of the Secretary of War, bearing date October 21st, 1862, an order endorsed by the President, authorizes the Mississippi expedition, and assigns General McClernand to the command of it. On the 16th of December, General McClernand, hearing that he was superseded in the command, addressed a dispatch to the Secretary of War, inquiring, "Is this so? and shall it be so?" On the 21st of December General McClernand received the telegram from General Halleck, dated the 18th, by which he was informed that he (Halleck) had "transmitted a dispatch to General Grant assigning the latter to the general command of the expedition, and General McClernand to the immediate command of the land forces composing the same."

It is notorious that prior to the 16th of December, a portion of the forces sent on by General McClernand for his expedition were detached from General Grant's army and marched under General Sherman to Memphis, preparatory to embarkation for Vicksburg. It appears, therefore, conclusively that both Generals Grant and Sherman had received their orders in the premises before the date of General McClernand's dispatch to the Secretary of War, requesting to be informed whether or not he had been superseded in the command of the expedition. This injustice to General McClernand is still further demonstrated by the dispatches which passed between General Grant and Halleck. First comes Grant's dispatch to Halleck, dated Oxford, Miss., December 8th, 1862:

"General Sherman will command the expedition down the Mississippi. He will have a force of forty thousand men; will land above Vicksburg, at the Yazoo, if possible, and cut the Mississippi central wall, etc. I will co-operate with him, etc., etc.

Now hear a portion of General Halleck's dispatch, dated at Washington, December 7th, to which the above dispatch of Grant is an answer:

"GENERAL GRANT:—The capture of Grenada may change our plans in regard to Vicksburg."

Yes, the whole affair of the capture of Vicksburg had been planned and arranged between these two Generals, who determined that a citizen General should have nothing to do with it if possible, but they did not disdain to seize upon the ideas and plans of another and appropriate them to their own use, with a view of claiming all the honors and all the rewards.

We have still another link of evidence, in the instructions given Sherman by General Grant, and dated also at Oxford, Mississippi, December 8, 1862:

"GENERAL:—You will proceed with as little delay as possible to Memphis, Tennessee. On your arrival, you will assume command of all the troops there. As soon as possible, move with them down the river to the vicinity of Vicksburg, and, with the co-operation of the gunboat fleet, under Flag Officer Porter, proceed to the reduction of that place, in such a manner as circumstances and your own judgment may dictate," etc.

The above authentic documents prove clearly, that long before the 16th of December, namely, on the 7th and 8th, the plan of attack upon Vicksburg had been matured between Generals Halleck and Grant, and the instructions for carrying it out issued to General Sherman by General Grant.

On the 4th of January, 1863, General McClelland, having verified the condition of the army, assumed the command of it.

The original plan of General Grant having entirely failed in the execution, and his instructions not providing for any contingencies, the question arose, what was to be done with the army composing the Mississippi river expedition? General McClelland, in a letter to General Grant, proposed the following programme for the reduction of Vicksburg:

"Make Memphis the base of operations, put the railroad from Memphis to Grenada in running order, push forward the columns to the latter place, and to Jackson, marching upon the rear of Vicksburg, while the forces here and those below Port Hudson co-operate by such demonstrations as may be found practicable."

But General Grant, being hundreds of miles to the northward, and his communications with the Mississippi river being interrupted by guerrillas, was not expected to be able to respond to these propositions for several weeks. Hence, General McClelland was left to act according to his own judgment, and he decided not to lie idle at Milliken's Bend, waiting orders, but to improve the moral condition of his army, and stimulate its martial spirit, by striking a decisive blow at the enemy near the mouth of the Arkansas river, who were endangering our line of communication between Memphis and Vicksburg.

This movement, as well as the battle of Arkansas Post, which resulted from it, are minutely and eloquently described in the official report of General McClelland. Want of space prevents us from giving anything more than a mere synopsis.

General McClelland and his army safely arrived at the mouth of White river on the 8th of January, 1863. Ascending the Arkansas river, and landing at Notuh's farm, on the left bank, on the 9th, the work of disembarking was busily continued till noon of the next day.

In the meantime, General McClelland, accompanied by Lieutenant-Colonel Schwartz, of his staff, had reconnoitered the river road and a portion of the levee, within a mile and a half of Fort Hindman (better known as Arkansas Post). There they discovered that the enemy was abandoning a line of rifle pits about half a mile above the levee, under stress of the fire of one of our gunboats. Passing a cold night without fires or tents, in a position near enough to attack the fort, our chilled but faithful men were greeted by a bright and genial sunshine on the morning of the 11th.

By ten and a half o'clock a. m., the two corps were ready to commence the attack. General Steele's division formed the extreme right of the line of battle, reaching near the bayou. General Stuart and General A. J. Smith's divisions were formed on its left. One brigade of General Osterhaus's division formed the extreme left of the line, resting upon the river, in full view of the fort. Another brigade of the same division was held in reserve, while the remaining brigade was disposed on the opposite side of the river.

On the previous day General McClelland had requested Rear Admiral Porter, commanding the Mississippi squadron, to advance the gunboats and open fire on the enemy's works, for the purpose of diverting his attention, while the land forces should gain the positions assigned to them. Promptly complying, the Admiral advanced his boats and opened a terrible cannonade upon the fort, which continued an hour and more, and until after nightfall of the 10th. The different batteries of artillery were judiciously arranged in suitable positions, and the cavalry were disposed in the rear, with orders to force all stragglers to return to their ranks. Such was the disposition of the forces of General McClelland on the eve of the battle of Arkansas Post. On the other hand, the position of the enemy, naturally strong, was one of his own choosing.

Post Arkansas, a small village, the county seat of Arkansas county, is situated on elevated ground, above the reach of floods, and defining for some miles the left bank of the river. It was settled by the French in 1685, is fifty miles above the mouth of the river, one hundred and seventeen below Little Rock, and is surrounded by a fruitful country, abounding in cattle, corn and cotton.

Fort Hindman, a square, full bastioned fort, was erected within the village, upon the banks of the river, at the head of a bend resembling a horseshoe. The exterior sides of the fort, between the salient angles, were each three hundred feet in length, the face of the bastion two feet seven inches of an exterior side, and the perpendicular one-eighth. The parapet was eighteen feet wide on top, the ditch twenty feet wide on the ground level and eight feet deep, with a slope of four feet base.

A "banquette" for infantry was constructed around the interior slope of the parapet; also three platforms for artillery in each bastion and one in the curtain facing north. On the southern face of the northeastern bastion was a casemate containing a nine-inch columbiad. A similar casemate containing an eight-inch columbiad was constructed on the curtain facing the river, and another nine-inch columbiad was mounted on the salient angle of the southeast bastion, on a "centre pivot" barbette carriage. All these guns command the river below the fort.

Besides these there were four three-inch Parrott guns, and four six-pounder iron smooth-bore guns, mounted on field carriages on the platforms in the fort, which also contained a well-stored magazine, several frame buildings and a well.

General McClernand, having completed his arrangements, notified the Admiral to open fire on the fort, and that he (McClernand) would advance to the attack of the enemy's ranks.

At 1 o'clock p. m. accordingly, the gunboats opened fire, immediately followed by the fire of artillery along the right wing of the land forces, and soon after by the fire of artillery along the left wing. By 1:30 o'clock p. m. Morrey and Thayer's brigades and the two Smiths' brigades, of Sherman's corps, had gained position in a belt of woods, extending quite to the enemy's rifle pits. Checked here for a time by a severe fire of musketry from the enemy's works, they boldly resumed and continued the advance, supported by a reserve brigade, until they had approached within short musket range of the enemy's lines.

The artillery kept up a brisk fire on the fort for some time. Webster's twenty-pound Parrott guns on the river bank completely enfiladed the two faces of the northeastern bastion, some of their shots penetrated the embrasures of the casemates, and with others from the gunboats contributing to silence the gun inside of it, also the lighter guns in the northern curtain and the gun en barbette in the southeastern bastion, which appeared to be above the elevation of the gunboats' fire.

About 3:30 o'clock p. m., when the enemy's guns were silenced by the continued fire of the artillery and the gunboats, General McClernand ordered an assault, which after a severe but ineffectual struggle of the enemy, terminated in a formal surrender of the post, its armament, garrison and all its stores.

Thus, at 4:30 o'clock p. m., after three hours and a half of hard fighting, the Union forces entered and took possession of all the enemy's defences.

Seven stands of colors were captured, including the garrison flag. Besides, we captured five thousand prisoners, seventeen pieces of cannon, large and small, ten gun carriages and eleven limbers, three thousand stand of small arms, exclusive of many lost or destroyed, one hundred and thirty swords, fifty Colts' pistols, forty cans of powder, sixteen hundred and fifty rounds of shot, shell and canister for ten and twenty-pounder Parrott guns, three hundred and seventy-five shells, grape stands and canister, forty-six thousand rounds of ammunition for small arms, five hundred and sixty-three animals, together with a considerable quantity of quartermaster's and commissary stores fell into our hands. One hundred and seventy wagons and a large portion of the stores were destroyed for want of means to bring them away.

Our loss in killed, wounded and missing, was nine hundred and seventy-seven, while that of the enemy was much larger.

Although this victory of Arkansas Post was a most brilliant and decisive one, and second only to that of Fort Donelson, it was by no means approved of by General Grant, the commander of the department, who could not (or would not,) see the benefits derived therefrom. He peremptorily ordered General McClernand, who had intended to attack Little Rock next, to return with his army to Young's Point to dig canals. Thus this fine army, which by its brilliant success at Post Arkansas, been partially recovered from the consequences of its disastrous defeat under General Sherman, at Vicksburg, was again forced to forego all hope of actual service for the present.

Under these depressing circumstances, however, it was some consolation to General McClernand and his noble army, to know that their success were acknowledged and appreciated by the President, by the Governor of Illinois, and by the loyal masses over the whole Union, and this reflection caused them to be of good cheer. Mr. Lincoln had expressed his thanks to General McClernand and his brave troops "for this great victory gained at a time when disaster after disaster was befalling our armies," closing his letter of gratitude with these remarkable words: "Your success on the Arkansas was both brilliant and valuable, and is fully appreciated by the country and the Government."

How consoling also was the kind and encouraging letter of Governor Yates, of Illinois, to our brave soldiers and their beloved General. He says:

"I regard the victory of Arkansas Post, gained under the energetic generalship of a distinguished officer and citizen of Illinois, as second in importance and consequences to that of Fort Donelson, in which that officer also prominently participated. Fort Donelson and Arkansas Post, my dear General, I regard as the two great positive victories of the war in the West."

General McClelland and his troops were now employed, neither gloriously nor even usefully in digging a canal which, after all the labor expended on it, turned out to be totally insufficient for the purpose intended. In this fruitless labor they spent their precious time up to the 29th of March, 1863.

After many fruitless attempts to penetrate the State of Mississippi above Vicksburg, and to turn the rear of that city, it became a question of the highest importance, whether a point below, on the Mississippi river, might not be reached, and a way thus opened to the attainment of the same end.

General McClelland's corps was fortunately in a favorable condition to test the question, and only await an opportunity to do so. The General himself, sharing in the feeling of his troops, was rejoiced when he obtained permission to cross the peninsula from Milliken's Bend to New Carthage.

Accordingly, on the 29th of March 1863, a detachment of infantry, artillery and cavalry was ordered to march on to Richmond, Louisiana. These soon dislodged the garrison and occupied the place, capturing a few of the enemy in their retreat. This victory cut off all supplies to Vicksburg from that fertile region of country traversed by the Texas river, and the Bayou Macon.

On the night of the 3d of April, a bridge two hundred feet in length, was thrown across Roundaway bayou, at Richmond, and a way opened by which the troops were rapidly moved forward and so disposed, as to hold the only practicable land route between Milliken's Bend and Smith's Plantation, two miles north of New Carthage. Meantime, old roads were repaired, new ones constructed, boats were built for the transportation of men and supplies, twenty miles of levee sleeplessly guarded day and night, and every precaution taken to prevent the rising flood from breaking through the lines and engulfing the whole army.

Having taken possession of New Carthage, and driven the enemy in several skirmishes from positions which they had occupied to oppose the advance of our troops, on the 29th of April, General McClelland embarked the greater portion of his forces in steamers and barges, for Grand Gulf, which place he had previously reconnoitered, and found it to be a place of great strength. The gunboats were steamed toward the Gulf, and closely approaching the enemy's batteries opened fire upon them, while our troops held themselves in readiness in the transports to push forward and disembark, the moment the enemy's water batteries should be silenced. But the gunboats had to be withdrawn after a bombardment of five hours and a half, the principal batteries not having been silenced, and several of the gunboats being badly crippled.

But though foiled here, a footing must be gained at some other point, and Bruinsburg was decided upon. Hence General McClelland embarking his corps once more on the 30th, proceeded to that place and disembarked before noon. He then pushed on by a forced march as far as possible, in order to surprise the enemy next day in his position near Port Gibson, to prevent him destroying the bridge over Bayou Pierre, on the roads leading to Grand Gulf and to Jackson.

BATTLE OF PORT GIBSON.

About one o'clock, on the morning of the 1st of May, 1863, the advance of General McClelland's column was attacked near Magnolia Church, thirteen miles beyond Bruinsburg, and four from Port Gibson, by a light fire of the enemy's infantry and soon after by his artillery.

This attack was repulsed, and the General, coming up about dawn, learned of a negro that the enemy was in force in his front and intended to accept battle. By personal observation this was found to be correct, so preparations were made accordingly.

It would be impossible in our brief space to give a detailed account of this great battle and brilliant victory of our armies; suffice it to say that after many hours of hard and obstinate fighting on both sides, the enemy was finally driven from his first position with the loss of four hundred prisoners, two stand of colors, two twelve pound howitzers, three caissons and a considerable quantity of ammunition. About this time Major General Grant arrived on the field of action, from Bruinsburg.

The second position taken by the enemy was stronger than the first. It was a creek bottom covered with trees and underbrush, the approach to which was through open fields and rugged and exposed hill slopes. Here General Hovey and Carr's divisions again encountered the enemy. A hot engagement ensued, the result of which was to force the enemy back with considerable loss upon his center. Here, with a large concentration of forces, he renewed the attack, but after an obstinate struggle he was again beaten back upon the high ridge on the opposite side of the bottom and within a mile of Port Gibson.

At dawn on the morning of the 2d, General McClelland's whole corps triumphantly entered Port Gibson, through which place the enemy had fled the night before, burning the bridge across the Bayou Pierre in his rear.

The battle of Port Gibson was undoubtedly one of the most brilliant achievements of the war, and it was highly important as determining the splendid series of successes which followed. It continued twelve hours, and cost us eight hundred and three men in killed, wounded and missing.

The loss of the enemy was three stand of colors, six pieces of cannon, three caissons, a quantity of ammunition, a number of small arms, and five hundred and eighty prisoners. Their loss in killed and wounded must have been considerable.

One of the immediate results of this battle was the evacuation of Grand Gulf, only seven miles distant from Port Gibson. A naval force took possession of the Gulf without resistance.

BATTLE OF CHAMPION HILL.

On the 3d, General McClelland's corps, in obedience to orders, left Port Gibson and marched on the Raymond road to Willow Springs; on the 6th, to Rocky Springs; on the 8th, to Little Sand, and on the 9th, to Big Sand; on the 11th, it marched to Five-mile Creek, and on the 12th, to Fourteen-mile Creek, subsisting during the last thirteen days on six day's rations and what scanty supply the country afforded; was wholly without tents and almost without cooking utensils; yet was cheerful and prompt in the discharge of every duty.

Jackson, the capital of Mississippi, had been the objective point, but hearing that the enemy were advancing from Vicksburg and had crossed the Big Black, General Grant had changed the objective point to Edwards Station, a point on the Vicksburg & Jackson Railroad, nearly midway between these two places, and towards this point accordingly the several divisions were ordered to march.

In executing that order the enemy's pickets were encountered on the fifteenth, about four miles from Edward's station, at a place named Midway, or Champion Hill, from the fact of its being half way between Jackson and Vicksburg, and the reputed property of a citizen named Champion.

Here the two hostile armies encountered each other, and at 11 o'clock, a. m., the engagement became general all along the lines, and continued to rage with increasing fury, till noon, when the enemy were driven back with great slaughter, leaving in our hands about three hundred prisoners and eleven pieces of cannon. But, being reinforced, and rallying, he renewed the conflict with great fury and bore heavily on our men in turn, particularly on General Hovey's division of McClelland's corps. That officer being hard pressed, called for the support of a division of McPherson's corps, which, however, was too long delayed. When it finally came it also was borne back slowly, however, and disputing every inch of ground, till our men reached the brow of the hill.

Here they rallied and checked the advance of the enemy, and a heavy blow was struck by General Hovey, which seemed to retrieve the fortunes of the day on this part of the field.

By similar exertions in other parts of the field, the enemy was at length beaten at all points, and fled in confusion, the main body along the road to Vicksburg, a fragment to the left of this road, the former hotly pursued by General Carr's division, the latter by Lindsay's and Burbridge's brigades, until night closed in; each taking many prisoners.

The loss sustained by General McClelland's corps in this memorable battle was one thousand three hundred and thirty-three in the aggregate, exclusive of General Blair's loss, of which no report had been received.

The loss of the enemy must have been very great in killed and wounded. A large number of small arms were also taken, in addition to the captures already mentioned.

BATTLE OF BIG BLACK.

At 3:30 o'clock, on the morning of the 17th of May, 1863, General McClelland's corps again resumed the advance on the road to Black river bridge, six miles distant.

On the way, General Carr's division leading, captured a number of prisoners, and upon nearing a spot of wood marking the enemy's position, encountered and drove back his pickets.

Passing to the further end of the wood, the enemy was discovered in force, strongly entrenched, General Carr's division having entered the wood, was immediately formed in obedience to General McClelland's order, General Lawler's brigade on the right, resting its flank near Big Black, and General Benton's brigade on the left, and the right of the railroad. The different batteries of artillery were placed in commanding positions, and the action soon became general.

After some further arrangements had been made, the right, center and left of General McClelland's corps engaged the enemy with increased effect. General Lawlor, aided by another division, dashed forward, under a heavy fire, across a ravine and narrow field, and with fixed bayonets, carried the enemy's works, routing them and capturing many prisoners. This brilliant achievement determined the success of the day. Fleeing towards a steamer which formed a bridge across Big Black, most of the enemy escaped to the commanding bluff on the other side, while others, hotly pursued by Benton's brigade, and the right of Lindsay's, were cut off from victory, and were made prisoners.

No victory could have been more complete. The enemy burnt the bridge on which he had passed, also two other steamers, and the railroad bridge. About one thousand, five hundred prisoners, with their arms, fell into our hands, eighteen pieces of cannon, and a considerable quantity of ammunition and cotton. A number of the enemy were found dead upon the field, but his loss in killed and wounded could not be ascertained.

The loss on the part of the Union army was limited to General McClelland's corps, which alone were engaged in this battle. The loss was in all, three hundred and seventy-three killed, wounded, and missing.

A bridge having been hastily thrown across the Big Black on the night of the 17th, General McClelland crossed next day, and took up his line of march for Vicksburg, only twelve miles distant.

Early on the morning of the 19th, General McClelland, accompanied by his staff, made a personal reconnoissance of the approaches to Vicksburg.

The enemy's defenses consisted of an extended line of rifle-pits, occupied by infantry, and covered with a number of strong earthworks, occupied by artillery so arranged as to command, not only the approaches by the ravines and ridges in front, but also each other.

THE SIEGE OF VICKSBURG.

In obedience to orders, General McClelland's corps moved forward, and in conjunction with the other corps of the army, commenced the siege of Vicksburg, about 6:30 o'clock a. m. Skirmishers were thrown forward, who engaged the enemy's skirmishers, and artillery was opened from the most commanding positions upon the enemy's works, and a body of infantry observed between them and Burbridge's brigade, on the right.

About 10:30 o'clock an order came from Major General Grant to all the corps commanders to gain as close a position as possible to the enemy's works, until 2 o'clock p. m., and at that hour to fire three volleys from all their pieces in position, when a general charge of all the corps along the whole line should be made. Another advance was accordingly made by all the corps, and the ground gained was firmly held, but the enemy's works were not carried. A number of brave officers and men fell in this advance.

Lively skirmishing continued during the two following days (20th and 21st), and a nearer approach to the enemy's works was made. On the evening of the 21st, General McClelland received an order from Major General Grant, to the following effect:

"A simultaneous attack will be made to-morrow, at 10 o'clock a. m., by all the army corps of this army. During the day, army corps commanders will have examined all practical routes over which troops can possibly pass. They will get in position all the artillery possible, and gain all the ground they can with the infantry and skirmishers. At an early hour in the morning a vigorous attack will be commenced by artillery and skirmishers. The infantry, with the exception of reserves and skirmishers, will be placed in columns of platoons, or by a flank if the ground will not admit of a greater front, ready to move forward at the hour designated, when all will start at quick time, with bayonets fixed, and march upon the enemy without firing a gun, until the outer works are carried. Skirmishers will advance as soon as possible after the heads of columns pass them, and scale the walls of such works as may confront them."

General McClelland communicated General Grant's order to his division commanders the same evening, and used every possible exertion in order to secure success.

Five minutes before ten o'clock a. m., his columns of attack moved forward, and within fifteen minutes, Lawler's and Landrum's brigades had carried the ditch, slope and bastion of a fort. Some of the men rushed into the fort, where they found a piece of artillery, and saw the men who had served it escaping behind another defence. All these daring men were shot down, except Sergeant Joseph Griffith, of the Twenty-second Iowa, who, recovering from the stunning effects of a shot, seized his loaded musket, and captured and brought away thirteen rebels, who had returned and discharged their pieces. We are happy to say that this heroic soldier has been since promoted. The colors of the One hundredth and thirtieth Illinois were planted upon the counterscarp of the ditch, while those of the Forty-eighth Ohio and Seventy-seventh Illinois waved over the bastion.

The above particulars we have gleaned from General McClernand's valuable report to General Grant. We shall give the remainder of what we have to say on this subject in his own words. He continues:

"Within fifteen minutes after Landrum's success, Benton's and Burbridge's brigades, fired by the example, rushed forward and carried the ditch and slope of a heavy earthwork and planted their colors on the latter. Crowning this brilliant feat with a parallel to Sergeant Joseph Griffith's daring, Captain White, of the Chicago Mercantile Battery, carried forward one of his pieces by hand, quite to the ditch, and double-shotting it, fired into an embrasure; disabling a gun in it nearly ready to be discharged, and scattering death and dismay among the rebel cannoners.

"Men never fought more gallantly, nay, more desperately. For more than eight long hours they maintained their ground with death-like tenacity. Neither the blazing sun nor the deadly fire of the enemy shook them. Their constancy and valor filled me with admiration. The spectacle was one never to be forgotten. * * *

"Alarmed for his safety, the enemy hastened to mass large numbers from his right and left on my front. * * All my forces were now engaged. Failure and loss of my hard won advantages became imminent.

"Advising General McArthur (who was on his way from Warrenton) of the state of affairs, I requested reinforcements, and notified General Grant of the fact. At 11 o'clock a. m., I also informed him that I was hotly pressed. * * * Again, at 12 o'clock, that I was in partial possession of two forts, and suggested whether a vigorous push ought not to be made all along our lines.

"Responsively to these dispatches, General Grant directed me to communicate with General McArthur, to use his forces to the best advantage, and informed me that General Sherman was getting on well. This dispatch was dated 2:30 o'clock p. m. About the same time, I received information that General Quimby was coming to my support. * * *

"But McArthur's division being several miles distant, did not arrive till next day; two brigades of General Quimby's division coming up late in the evening, and much exhausted, their services were not available, and night set in and terminated the struggle before either of these brigades could be fully applied; indeed, before one of them was entirely formed. My loss during this memorable day comprised three-fourths of my whole loss before Vicksburg. My whole loss was one thousand four hundred and eighty-seven, in killed, wounded and missing."

On the 30th of May, General McClernand issued a congratulatory order to his troops, which was highly creditable to him and to them, but which seemed not to have been so well received by the General-in-Chief, on the ground that General McClernand's Adjutant had neglected to furnish General Grant with a copy. This omission was made the pretext for the dismissal of General McClernand from his command, and for his banishment from the department.

This congratulatory address is one of the most soul-stirring and powerful war papers we have ever perused, but it must be read entire in order to be appreciated, and it will not bear to be cut up into fragments.

On the 18th of June, General McClernand received the following dispatch from General Grant:

"GENERAL:—Inclosed I send you what purports to be your congratulatory address to the Thirtieth Army Corps. I would respectfully ask if it is a true copy. If it is not a correct copy, furnish me one by bearer, as required by the regulations, &c."

To this General McClernand replied as follows, on the same day:

"MAJOR GENERAL GRANT:—I have just returned. The newspaper slip is a correct copy of my congratulatory order, No. 721. I am prepared to maintain its statements. I regret that my Adjutant did not send you a copy promptly, and I thought he had."

The following order, dated the same day, was the reply received by General McClernand:

"Major General John A. McClernand is hereby relieved of the command of the Thirteenth Army Corps. He may proceed to any point he may select in the State of Illinois, and report by letter to the headquarters of the army for orders. Major General E. O. C. Ord is hereby appointed to the command of the Thirtieth Army Corps, subject to the approval of the President, and will immediately assume charge of the same."

To this General McClelland replied that, having been appointed by the President to the command under a definite act of Congress, he might justly challenge General Grant's authority in the premises, but forbore to do so for the present. He also wished that any statement of fact in his congratulatory order, to which exceptions might be taken, should be made the subject of investigation, not doubting the result.

On the 23d of June, General McClelland addressed a letter to the President of the United States, which sets forth the facts of his removal, and enters at some length into its pretended cause. He is at a total loss to account for the fact that he has been dismissed, and says he is in doubt as to what the real cause of his dismissal was: "If my Adjutant delayed sending a copy of a harmless order, I was ignorant of it, and avowed my right at it. * * * It was impossible for me personally to superintend the routine of the Adjutant's office. The contents of the order (issued to my soldiers) were true, and reflected on no one, and were couched in no hurtful language. General Grant could only have arrested and tried me if I had offended.

* * * I ask for redress and that justice which it is the right of the humblest citizen to demand, and which it is the bounden duty of those having the power to afford.

"I challenge an investigation both of General Grant's conduct and my own," commencing with Belmont and terminating with Vicksburg, and he asks, indignantly, "If I was worthy to be trusted in leading the advance to Belmont, to Fort Henry, to Donelson, to Port Gibson, to Champion Hill and to Big Black; if I planned the successful battles of Arkansas Post, Port Gibson, Champion Hill and Big Black, and gained the largest, perhaps, the only measure of success at Vicksburg on the 22d; if, in all these battles, I either bore the brunt or a material part; if only two days before my dismissal and banishment General Grant deemed himself justified in adding one division certainly and two other divisions contingently to my command, making it larger than the two others in my corps combined, why should I have been prescribed at the moment when it was supposed Vicksburg must fall, and the Mississippi river expedition, which I had early advocated, if not originated, would soon be crowned with success? What-ever may be said to the contrary, I am in no wise responsible for the failure at Vicksburg. General Grant planned that assault, and is alone responsible. * * * Many of his ablest officers deemed it unwise and fatiguitous. They could not see that an assault by an attenuated line of attack on the most elaborate works ever seen on this continent could eventuate in success."

In answer to various letters from General McClelland, he received from the Secretary of War a communication dated Washington City, August 29, 1863. The following is an extract:

"The President instructs me to say that no charges against you have come to his knowledge requiring an investigation by a court of inquiry, nor have any been made against General Grant which in his judgment require such an investigation. An investigation, therefore, will not be ordered."

General McClelland then requested an investigation of his own conduct as a United States officer in the present war, or if that may not be, of his conduct in connection with the Mississippi river expedition, or that from Millikin's Bend around to Vicksburg, and resulting in the fall of that place.

In answer to this reasonable application, Mr. Stanton says:

"The President directs me to say that a court of inquiry, in hearing any one of the subjects specified in that letter, would withdraw from the field many officers whose presence is indispensable to the service. For these reasons, he declines, at present, your application."

A personal appeal was made to the President, to which he replied that he was very "grateful for his services and the early interest which he took in the life-and-death struggle of the Union; that no charges requiring the interference of a court of inquiry had been brought against him; that General Grant's statements of his reasons for dismissing General McClelland he (Mr. Lincoln) had never seen nor sought to see; that his interference between them could not but be of evil effect, and that it was better to leave it where the law of the case had placed it; that the permanent estimate of what a General does in the field is fixed by the 'cloud of witnesses' who have been with him in the field, and that, relying on these, he who has the right needs not to fear!"

In his report of the operations of the 22d, General Grant intimated that the position which he occupied at the time gave him a better opportunity of observing the movements of the Thirteenth Army Corps than the commander of it enjoyed. He says: "I could not see McClelland's possession of forts, nor necessity for reinforcements, as he had represented, up to the time I left, which was between twelve m. and one p. m., and I expressed doubts of their correctness,—which doubts the facts subsequently, but too late, confirmed."

Now, to this, General McClelland replies:

"General Grant was about a mile and a-half to the right of my position, which was a commanding one—only five or six hundred yards in the rear of the center of my advance and of the enemy's works. I did see flags of my corps planted on the enemy's works, and did see officers and men of my command enter them, and rebel captives brought out by them."

General McClelland proves these statements by testimony, in addition to General Lawler's dispatch, stating that "we ought to have reinforcements," and to that of Colonel J. Landrum, commanding the Second Brigade, both of whose commands formed one of General McClelland's columns of attack—who (Landrum) says "our men are holding the flanks of the fort in our front," we will here submit a few extracts from the letters of respectable gentlemen who were eye witnesses to what they attest.

W. M. Stone, Colonel of the Twenty-second Iowa, says: "I was in command of the Twenty-second Iowa, which regiment was in the Second brigade, Fourteenth division of the Thirteenth army corps. On the evening of the 21st of May, I was served with a notice, (or copy) of an order directing the assault to be made next day, at 10 a. m. I was informed by my brigade commander, General Lawler, that I would have the advance, and that I could approach any point of the enemy's works I considered the most salient, and in any form I thought proper. Between sundown and dark I went up to within fifty yards of the enemy's lines. My observation satisfied me that the fort next the railroad could be carried more easily and with less sacrifice than any other point in our front, and I determined to direct my regiment against it. I took my regiment over the hill in front of Maloney's siege battery that night, and had it in readiness for the morning's work.

"At a little before 10 o'clock next morning, by my time, I received the order to advance, and

I did so immediately and directly against the fort, * * and within ten minutes from the time we started, my men entered it and held it to my knowledge for over an hour. The fort was small and the open space inside very limited, and but few men could find room in it.

"When the enemy were driven from the fort, they also retired from the rifle-pits, on our right between that and the railroad. The Eleventh Wisconsin had also advanced against the second fort, some three hundred yards from the first one, and I saw the enemy leave that one. They also retired from the pits between the two forts, and went down the hill into the ravine beyond, toward the city. I stood with Lieutenant Colonel Dunlap, of the Twenty-first Iowa, on the highest and most exposed point, near the fort. We saw them leave, and conversed about it. I sent word back to General Carr to send me a brigade and I would hold the works; I regarded the thing as easily done. I do not know that my message reached the General. I then regarded the door to Vicksburg as opened, and so said to Colonel Dunlap. * * * *

"I ordered the color-bearer of the Seventy-seventh Illinois to bring up his colors, as mine were down in the hollow on the left, and my own men planted them on the top of the fort. Soon after this my own colors were brought up and placed beside them. They remained there, to my knowledge, till six o'clock in the evening.

"Had we been reinforced at any time before noon by a fresh brigade, I have no doubt that the whole army could have gone into Vicksburg. I stated this opinion to several after I went back. There were no interior works at that time in the rear of the works we held, as I could see far beyond. Maloney's battery of siege guns was about five hundred yards directly in the rear of our position, and commanded a fine view of all our movements. I do not know where General McPherson's headquarters were, but I should think there was no point from which our operations could have been so correctly observed as from this battery. General Grant was at or near McPherson's headquarters according to his report.

W. M. STONE,

Late Colonel Twenty-second Iowa."

Harvey Graham, Lieutenant-Colonel of the Twenty-second Iowa, says:

"It is my firm conviction and belief that had the Thirteenth Army corps been re-inforced by a few brigades, thus enabling you to send support to the front, the success of your command would have been complete. Victory was in your hands, but was wrested from you by superior numbers."

In fact, Colonel Graham confirms the testimony of Colonel Stone in every particular, so that it would be but repeating the same thing to give his letter in full. So does Major Atherton, of the Twenty-second Iowa. Sergeant Rugg, Company A, Seventy-seventh Illinois Infantry, certifies that he saw the flags of the Seventy-seventh planted on the rebel forts, and that the National colors were afterwards carried in and captured, together with a number of men, after night-fall.

To all this, add the testimony of Lieutenant Colonel Warmoth, Captain Mason, Captain Blount, of the Seventeenth Ohio Volunteer Infantry, and a whole "cloud of other witnesses" too numerous to mention, but which may be consulted in General McClelland's Protest.

We here subjoin a brief synopsis of General McClelland's summing up of this evidence. He says:

"These documents not only prove all I have denied or approved, but they prove more. They prove the promptness of my assault; the planting of my colors on the enemy's works, and their occupation by my men; that prisoners had been captured and brought out of the fort assaulted by Lawler and Landrum; that an officer brought word to me afterwards that the same fort was ours and that it should not be further fired upon. That Lieutenant Colonel Graham, of the Twenty-second Iowa, wrote a note inside the fort stating it was ours, and that the Twenty-second Iowa advanced against one fort and the Eleventh Wisconsin against another; that Colonel Stone saw this himself, and saw the enemy retire from both.

"They prove that I could have used more men in making my assault (which General Grant denies,) and with timely reinforcements would have crowned with success; that my position was much more favorable than General Grant's for seeing what was going on in front of my lines; that my position was near the center of my line and only five or six hundred yards from the enemy's works, while that of General Grant was about a mile and a half, to the right of my position; that my dispatches to General Grant were a qualification rather than an exaggeration of my success; and that the reinforcements, finally ordered by General Grant, did not arrive in time.

"General Grant says that the works entered by Sergeant Griffith, from their position, could give no practical advantage, unless others to the right and left of it were seized and held at the same time.

"Is not this assertion too broad? Is not this as much as to say; that no practical advantage could have been derived from taking any part less than the whole of the enemy's works at once * * that the only condition of our success was the impossible one of carrying the whole of the enemy's line, which was larger than our own, at once, and consequently, that our attack must have been by line instead of by column, as he directed; and yet, strange enough, he censures me for asking the co-operation of a simultaneous attack, according to the terms of his original plan, and without which, according to his own admission, no practical advantage could have resulted from Griffith's partial success. By his own showing, I only asked for what his original plan promised, and what, by his own admission, was necessary to our success.

"This, of itself, is a sufficient refutation of the charge, that what I asked for makes me responsible for the increase of our mortality list by full fifty per cent. No! General Grant's order of the 21st of May makes him responsible, not only for my loss, but for our whole loss. He knew well our diminished numbers, then exhausted, and the roughness of the ground, and he had at least a partial knowledge of the enemy's strong position. This order for the assault of the 22d, was deemed by all judges as an unfortunate one, and more likely to bring disaster upon ourselves than upon the enemy."

General McClelland's removal struck the officers and men of his command with astonishment and surprise. When they heard of it they rushed in crowds to his tent, and many, with tears in their eyes, expressed their deep sympathy, and they presented a written address to their General, replete with confidence and regard.

But his friends and former constituents at home were no less surprised and grieved at this event than the brave soldiers and officers who were so long his comrades and the sharers of his toils and dangers. The people were anxious and impatient to learn the cause, and hundreds of his townsmen flocked to his mansion to ascertain it, but the General was careful not to utter a word, or even a hint, that might implicate his military superiors in blame. He merely assured his friends, and they believed him, that he had faithfully discharged his duty to his country, and had done no act of which he or they could feel ashamed, and that he hoped a speedy investigation, which he had petitioned for, would re-instate him in his proper position before the country and the world.

General McClernand was invited to speak at various public meetings, and wherever he went he was received with marks of approbation and enthusiastically cheered for the noble and patriotic course he had pursued.

So long as our noble language shall endure, his great speech at Indianapolis, on the 20th of August, 1863, will be read with admiration and delight by every lover of liberty and pure democratic government in the country or in the world. We cannot find space for this speech, and it must be read entire to do it justice. We must, however, give one brief extract:

"It is said, however, that we cannot conquer the rebellion. And indeed is that so? Is it not an insult to loyal men and to the North to say so? What! twenty millions of freemen not able to uphold the Constitution and the laws against the efforts of eight millions of rebels? What! the right, backed by wealth and power and National renown, not able to put down the enemy? What! a people who have voluntarily poured out their blood and treasure, as the people of the North have done, not able to vindicate their superiority in this contest? He who says so, if not a traitor himself, is not in sympathy with the earnest, enthusiastic, determined masses of the North.

"When and where were North men finally subdued? Never! Their arms conquered the 'Roman World.' Their enterprise compassed the globe itself. Their genius is dispelling the superstition of ages, and everywhere illuminating the path of man to a higher and nobler civilization. As the great blazing orb of day itself, they have coursed the earth and left a radiance behind, tracing in light the track of their glorious transit."

The following extract from the Jacksonville Journal, will illustrate the popular feeling towards General McClernand at that time. This is a report of a mass meeting held in that town in the summer of 1863, for the purpose of giving the General a reception after his removal from his command before Vicksburg. The Journal says:

"His (McClernand's) exposition of the objects of the Union, the causes of the war, the end, objects and deep criminality of the conspirators, of the infamy and final utter ruin of all who either co-operate or sympathise with them, whether in the North or South, was truthful and just in all points, statesmanlike and philosophical, and in many points peculiarly eloquent and fervid."

His letter to the President, taken in connection with the well known subsequent events in his military career, clearly show that the great Northwest owe, to say the least, as much to General McClernand, for the opening of the Mississippi river and the fall of Vicksburg, as to any other man.

Innumerable testimonials of the same kind might be added, had we the space to record them.

Having long waited, in the hope that some inquiry should be made into the case, and that justice should be done to him, and having received no answer from Washington to his protest up to the 15th of December, he frequently urged his friends to remind the President of his case. Governor Yates, being in Washington, called the attention of the President to General McClernand's protest, who replied that he had not yet read it, but that he would do so as soon as he got time.

At last he wrote the following letter to the Hon. Lyman Trumbull:

"SPRINGFIELD, Ill., December 15, 1863.

Hon. Lyman Trumbull, U. S. Senator:

DEAR SIR:—I believe you are aware of the reason that has restrained me from resigning my military commission. It is because friends, both of the President and myself, have protested against it. I have been led to believe that both were averse to such a step. If I am mistaken in this, so far as the President's views are concerned, or if I am not to be made useful by being assigned to an active command, I wish to know it. In either case, I shall resign, and relieve both the President and myself from further trouble. I think, however, that the President should indemnify my public character by placing it in as favorable a light as he found it. Let him say to the people I have done well, or show wherein I have done ill. If he has read the papers I have forwarded to him, he must be convinced that gross and cruel injustice has been done to me. If he would summon me before him, I doubt not that I would be able to turn the tables upon my enemies. Can you enlighten me upon this point? If the task is not an ungracious or troublesome one, oblige me by doing so.

Your obedient servant,

JOHN A. MCCLERNAND."

To the above letter, General McClernand received the following answer, dated at Washington, December 20, 1863:

"Major-General John A. McClernand:

MY DEAR SIR:—I had had a conversation with the President in regard to your position, before the receipt of yours of the 15th.

The President is aware that you have been unjustly treated, and in reply to my suggestion that he ought to do something for you, stated that when he got another matter off his hands (alluding to the Missouri troubles), he would see what could be done for you. Hon J. Gillespie was present at the interview, and, should you meet him, he may be able to tell you more particularly what occurred, though I have given you the purport. I shall endeavor to see the President again at an early day.

Yours very truly, LYMAN TRUMBULL."

Here we see the impression which the perusal of General McClelland's protest made on Mr. Lincoln—an impression which it cannot fail to make on every impartial reader. It convinced him that General McClelland had been "unjustly treated," and induced him to say that when he got another matter off his hands, he would see what could be done for him.

Believing himself without any hope of redress, and being unwilling to receive pay any longer for services which were merely nominal, he came to the conclusion to tender his resignation, and he did so accordingly on the fourteenth of January, 1864.

The resignation of General McClelland was not received, and he soon afterwards was ordered to report to General Banks, and returned to the command of his old Thirteenth Army Corps.

The campaign in the rear of Vicksburg calls for some general observations. As a military conception it was bold and far-reaching. It united the perceptions of the statesman with the skill of the practical military strategist. Its execution was marked with unflinching vigor and persistency amid trying difficulties and critical perils. It comprised a rapid succession of victories, adding to the glory of the Union armies. The battles of Port Gibson, Raymond, Jackson, Champion Hills, Black River Bridge, and the surrender of Vicksburg fell within a shorter space of time than the battles of Lodi, Castiglione, Arcola, and the surrender of Mantua, and when distance of time shall have clothed them with the colors of vivid imagination, they will be taken to denote a campaign as brilliant as that of the French in Italy, in 1796, led by General Bonaparte.

General McClelland was as much, if not more, identified with the authorship and execution of the movement in the rear of Vicksburg as, or than, was any other commander. Hence, it is not surprising that many persons should have murmured at his sudden and peremptory exclusion from participation in the final act of the drama, realized in the downfall of Vicksburg. Nor is it surprising that many loyal and distinguished men should have desired and rejoiced at his restoration to active military duty. The public is often just when individuals, swayed by passion, prejudice or envy, are unjust.

It followed, by order of President Lincoln, communicated by Mr. Stanton, Secretary of War, that General McClelland was, in fact, restored to active command. This order bore date of the 23d of January, 1864, and directed General McClelland to report for duty to Major General Banks, commanding the Department of the Gulf. This order reached General McClelland at Springfield, Illinois, on the 31st. Tidings of the fact were eagerly welcomed by the press and the people. To give expression to the prevailing sentiment, an ovation was improvised, which was to take place at the hall of the House of Representatives. The hall, at an early hour, was filled with military and non-military attendants, including many ladies. Captain Isaac Keyes officiated as Chairman, and Presco Wright and L. M. Snell as Secretaries. General John Williams and Colonel Dudley Wickersham, Hons. Charles S. Zane, H. G. Fitzhugh and Charles W. Matheny, and H. C. Myers and L. Coleman were appointed a committee to wait on General McClelland and escort him to the hall. While the committee was away on its errand, bands discoursed martial music, and the Union Glee Club sang patriotic songs for the entertainment of the audience. Upon the return of the committee with General McClelland, accompanied by Governor Yates, Colonel Matheny, Colonel Mudd, Major Schwartz, Hon. J. Grimeshaw, Hon. O. H. Hatch, Hon. J. K. Dubois and other distinguished men, and, on the subsidence of the applause evoked by their appearance, Hon. Shelby M. Cullom, in pursuance of previous appointment, rose and said:

"GENERAL McCLELLAND:—Your friends and fellow-citizens in this city have been informed to-day that you were about to leave for the scenes of war. They are here now in haste to testify to their appreciation of your merits and valuable services in this terrible crisis of our country.

"The loyal people of this city and State, ay, and Nation, have waited long and impatiently to hear the announcement that you were again permitted to take the field in defense of the old flag and the free institutions of our land. They have sometimes felt that the Government, with that great and good man, our President, at its head, was failing to recognize, in some instances, its truest patriots and defenders; but true to his nobler impulses and generous heart, Mr. Lincoln, though slow sometimes, as we think, always sees and protects the right; and to-night you are on the eve of leaving our city to report to General Banks.

"Sir: Your neighbors and friends here remember well your bravery and patriotism, as displayed in the battles of Belmont, Fort Henry, Donelson, Shiloh, Arkansas Post, and the rapid series of battles fought by you and the brave boys in your command prior to the memorable siege of Vicksburg. The people of Springfield and Illinois are proud to know that they have brave Generals as well as humble soldiers, who never turn their backs to traitors. * * *

"It is no flattery to you, sir, to say that we feel and know that you have done much towards maintaining the Government. In the halls of Congress, when the rebellion first began to threaten, your voice was loudly heard in behalf of the Government. From your official position as a legislator, you went to the battle-field impelled by the same patriotic desire. From the battle-field, with the smoke of battle still upon you, you returned home under orders, where your energy and ability have done much to kindle a burning patriotism in the hearts of the brave boys of the Prairie State. You go again to the field. The good will of the loyal people of this State will follow you; they will watch your movements with interest; and when you have finished your military career, and this war is over and the country saved, we shall be glad to welcome you home again with new and brighter laurels upon your head."

This address struck the key-note of both the General's and the people's temper, and was loudly applauded.

The General's reply was spontaneous and characteristic. He said, in substance: "You have been pleased, sir, to allude to my services in the field, and the regard in which I am supposed to be held by the Thirteenth Army Corps. I have only to say that I have tried to do my duty, in all circumstances, and that I am rejoiced—not so much on my own account as on that of our common country—that that corps has rendered valuable and victorious service in its behalf. None could have borne themselves more bravely and nobly than the officers and men of that corps under my command. At the call of duty, the corps always advanced fearlessly and with alacrity, in the face of danger and death. It has passed the ordeal of many battles, and still survives, though with decimated numbers; to add, with opportunity, to its hard-won laurels. Composed of western men, for the most part, it will continue to be, I doubt not, a faithful exemplar of western spirit and character. All that I claimed for it in the bloody assault upon the defences of Vicksburg was performed by it,—and the statements seen to the contrary are evidently false.

"I hope, sir, the future will afford no cause of regret, either to you or anyone, for the honor conferred on me by this popular demonstration, for which I return my sincerest thanks.

"I assure you no effort or sacrifice of mine shall be spared to merit your continued regard and confidence, and to push on the great cause of our country to a successful termination—a cause for which each and all of us should be willing to devote our lives and fortunes, if necessary. Adieu, my friends."

When the prolonged and rapturous applause with which the General's remarks were received had subsided, Colonel Loomis reported from a committee, a series of resolutions which were offered as expressive of the sense of the meeting, upon the subject to which they relate. They are couched in the following terms:

"WHEREAS, Our distinguished townsman and friend, Major General John A. McClernand, is about to leave us to assume an important command assigned him by the President in the Department of the Gulf, be it

"Resolved, That we remember his history as a Representative of Illinois in the councils of the Nation, as one who dignified the position with all the qualities of a just and able statesman; one who, when the dignity and honor of the Government were assailed and the perpetuity of the Nation endangered by traitors, was among the very first to raise his voice to sustain the legally constituted authorities and to demand the rigid enforcement of the laws, regardless of past political associations, personal prejudices or private interest, and in his bold and manly support of the Government before the people to prove that of all else, he loved his country best.

"Resolved, That after voluntarily surrendering his seat in Congress, and taking up the sword in defense of the position he there assumed, we have watched his course in rallying his friends, the people, to the battle standard of the Union, his command in the army of the West on those fields which have made the luster of our arms imperishable, with feelings of the profoundest gratitude.

W. Hope Davis, M.D.

"Resolved, That our most earnest sympathy, wishes and prayers accompany him from home and friends to the scenes of future conflict. His past services, his name and fair fame will be remembered as among the names whom a loyal people will delight to honor."

The final resolution expressed hearty commendation and approval of the President's order assigning General McClernand to a prominent position in General Banks's command, and anticipated their cordial co-operation to conserve the interests of Constitutional Government and human freedom.

Governor Yates, Colonel Matheny, Hon. Jackson Grimshaw and others, followed in glowing tributes to the services rendered by General McClernand, at and since the commencement of the war; and to the gallantry and unwavering constancy of the Thirteenth Corps. The resolutions were adopted in the same spirit they breathed, that is with unanimous acclaim.

We have dwelt upon these incidents as evidencing what was the co-temporaneous opinion of eminent and well informed men in respect to General McClernand's military merits, and the unexpected order that retired him for a time, from the command of the Thirteenth Corps and active service in the field, and so barred him from sharing the final fruits and glory of the memorable campaign against Vicksburg. We have dwelt upon them to vindicate the truth of history, and to dispel the vague and groundless rumors, which passing from mouth to mouth, have long clouded the path of an honest and deserving man, whose life and services are worthy of a place in the history of the Nation, as well as of Illinois.

On the 15th of February, General McClernand reported in person to General Banks, at his headquarters in New Orleans.

On the 20th, General Banks made the following order:

"By the direction of the President, Major General John A. McClernand, United States Volunteers, will relieve General E. O. C. Ord, in command of the Thirteenth Army Corps."

On the 23d, General McClernand issued the following order:

"HEADQUARTERS THIRTEENTH ARMY CORPS:—The undersigned hereby resumes command of the Thirteenth Army Corps. All officers on staff duty at these headquarters, except Major General Ord's personal staff, will continue in discharge of their present duties until otherwise ordered.

"Comrades! In thus renewing our former relations, I cannot forbear the expression of my gratification at so welcome an event. The memories of our common trials and successes in the service of our beloved country have endeared you to me. I never will cease to admire your heroism and applaud your virtues. Arkansas Post, Richmond, New Carthage, Port Gibson, Grand Gulf, Champion Hills and Big Black are so many testimonials to your gallantry and good conduct. These brilliant victories, rapidly achieved, together with the triumph of Major General Banks in reducing Port Hudson, reopened the Mississippi river to the pining commerce of the grateful millions who inhabit its valley. Your assaults of the 19th and 22d of May upon the defenses of Vicksburg, will ever justly rank among the prodigies of military daring and constancy. All that I claimed for you in that and other respects, in my congratulatory order of the 30th of last May, stands unshaken by time and official scrutiny. Indeed, its contents, as the plain and simple truth, have become a part of the authentic history of the war. That I was not permitted to share in the consummation of the Mississippi campaign, by leading you into Vicksburg, is my misfortune, rather than my fault. My non-participation in that memorable event was involuntary and constrained, and is deeply regretted by me.

"I am profoundly thankful to the President that he has interposed to restore us to each other, after a separation that has been, to me, so long and painful. Your services, meantime, in this department are unfamiliar to me, but I doubt not that they are worthy of your antecedents, of the character of the distinguished commander whom I succeed, and of the able and successful chief of this important department.

"Comrades! New fields of duty and peril are before us. Let us hasten to make them historic with the valor and success of American arms. Our cause is a just one; approved, as we trust, by God and the civilized world. Our countrymen are spectators of our conduct; their hearts throb in unison with our ardor, our courage, and our devotion. Let us not disappoint their just expectations."

This stirring appeal was not miscalculated; a pre-existing military and popular sentiment in New Orleans was eager to welcome it. General McClernand's arrival at that city was hailed with congratulations, notably by a body of the Second Illinois Cavalry, which had re-enlisted, and was about to return on leave of absence to their homes.

The General returned their congratulations in brief but grateful terms; "wishing them a safe trip home, a happy time there, a speedy return, and the country an early and permanent peace."

The press echoed the feeling of the rank and file and the people; announcing the "expectation that he would resume command of the corps;" adding, "Nothing could be more eminently proper. No commander ever enjoyed the confidence and affection of his men to a greater extent. And the confidence was mutual. It was the Thirteenth Corps that won the General's laurels, and it was under his gallant leadership that the corps became immortal."

The General, however, found that the corps had been dismembered, and scattered in detachments all the way from the Mississippi to the Rio Grande. This was a painful vicissitude to veterans who had so long maintained an intact organization, and who were wedded to each other by the memories of their common sufferings and glory.

General Banks was now busied with preparations for the Red river expedition. General McClelland, meanwhile, was informing himself of the condition and particular geographical dispositions of the different detachments of the corps, and desired, if it might be, that these detachments should be re-combined for effective, independent, co-operative service. But contrary to his desire, it fell out that shortly before General Banks embarked for the Red river expedition, he ordered General McClelland to proceed to Matagorda Island and assume the control of military affairs on the coast and frontier of Texas, and after arriving there to visit the several principal points occupied by the United States forces, and to report frequently and fully to the department headquarters, making such suggestions as he may deem for the good of the service.

In order to a full apprehension of the latent as well as the express import of this order, it is necessary to indulge at least a partial survey of the cotemporaneous situation within and on the coast, and southern frontier of Texas. Within, loyal citizens were hunted down as wild beasts by marauding bands of rebels. Often they were murdered without regard to age or sex; often their dwellings were burned; often they were impressed into the rebel army; in short, ever exhibition of patriotism, either by act or word was visited with a swift and vengeful expiation. Hope was yielding to despair.

On the coast, and across the Rio Grande, a stealthy but extensive trade was carried on in the exchange of cotton for arms and munitions, which were used to sustain the rebellion. This trade was in violation of the laws of war, and President Lincoln's proclamation of blockade.

Civil war was distracting and desolating Mexico; a civil war, waged on the one side by the Emperor Maximilian, supported by the arms of the disaffected Mexicans and the French—the whole deriving its inspiration from Napoleon III.; on the other side by the Republic of Mexico, represented by President Juarez. The imperial forces of Maximilian, flushed with success, were sweeping down to the Rio Grande, driving before them the tottering and fleeing government of the republic, and must soon, if not arrested, confront the United States forces on the narrow line of that stream. The "Monroe doctrine," a traditional American protest against the extension of the monarchical systems of the Old World to the Western Continent, and dedicating that continent to the destiny of popular government was in these events already violated, and, as was believed, perhaps, by the great body of the American people, because our own domestic strife invited it by opportunity and a supposed immunity.

At the same time a horde of the most turbulent and dissolute characters of Texas, congregated at Metamoras, Mexico, in view of the United States forces, was conspiring by offensive bearing and the calumnies of a press in that city, inspired and owned by themselves, to embroil the United States with the Imperial Government of Maximilian and Napoleon. In these delicate and fortuitous circumstances, an act of portentous interference, a random shot, nay any untoward accident might suffice for that purpose, or to entail some other unhappy complication.

Thus General Banks' order virtually charges General McClelland with the part and responsibilities of a publicist and diplomatist and a commander. He was to make suggestions on passing and possible events which might enter into the motives or action of his government in momentous affairs affecting the peaceful or belligerent relations of nations.

Crossing the Gulf, he arrived at Matagorda Island on the 8th of March, established his headquarters there, saw the outpost at Indianola withdrawn in obedience to General Bank's order, reorganized the forces so withdrawn with those on the island into brigades, and a division, assigning to each a commander, drove back the reconnoitering parties of the enemy, and sent counter parties of reconnoissance into the interior, established relays of mounted couriers from his headquarters twenty miles to the foot of the island, to bring information of any hostile attempt to cross by a shallow reef from the mainland to the rear of his camp, offered the refuge of this camp to fugitive loyalists, augmented his supplies, and on the 30th embarked with his staff on the steamer Clinton, for other posts. On the same day the vessel was driven by a gale on the bar off Arkansas Post, and probably would have been lost in sight of other wrecks, but for the assistance lent by the General and his staff to the officers and crew of the vessel. After seven hours peril, the vessel escaped and anchored over night in a neighboring pass.

On the three succeeding days, the General visited the posts respectively on Mustang Island and at Brazos, Santiago, and Point Isabel, inspecting them and their garrisons, and reviewing the latter, and left such orders as their condition and service seemed to require.

The ruins of the works commemorative of General Taylor and the war with Mexico, were viewed by General McClernand hard by; but, on a survey of the situation and relations of the post at Point Isabel, he determined to abandon it, and build a railroad from Brazos to a point on the Rio Grande below Brownsville, for the transportation of troops and stores, and as answering a better purpose.

On the 2d of April, he arrived by stage at Clarksville, an American town nearly opposite Bagdad in Mexico. At Clarksville, he saw off the mouth of the Rio Grande a fleet of merchant vessels flying the flags of different nations, and waiting, presumably, for cargoes of contraband cotton, brought to Metamoras and Bagdad, from Texas. He also saw a French ship of war riding at anchor, and learned that another had the day before sent a small boat around with a cannon to sound the approach to the mouth of that river. These circumstances were viewed by him as carrying a sinister and ominous import, but, much to his satisfaction, he found a United States man-of-war on the look-out for what might happen.

After inspecting the garrison at Clarksville, and impressing the officer in charge of it with the importance of vigilance and firmness in the discharge of his trust, he resumed his journey by stage, and arrived at Brownsville at 8 o'clock that night. Here he heard of mutual estrangement and suspicions between General Herron, who was in immediate command on the frontier, and Cortina, who was Governor and Commandant of the State of Tamaulipas.

On the 3d, General McClernand determined on rebuilding old Fort Brown upon a larger scale of area and defences, in order to meet the contingency of any attack which the Mexicans, French and Confederates might make collectively or separately, and also appointed a review of the troops for the same day and invited Governor Cortina to visit it, who, accepting the invitation, did so, accompanied by his civil and military staffs. The review was of the second division of the Thirteenth Corps, consisting of infantry, cavalry, artillery and engineers, assembled near old Fort Brown, wearing new uniforms and carrying bright arms. The appointments of the corps were complete. It passed in review in splendid style, and executed several manœuvres with practiced skill and promptitude. Governor Cortina was delighted, and, turning to General McClernand, exclaimed: "Oh! that our forces were so perfectly equipped. Then we would be able to turn back the tide of victory against the Imperialists."

The military exercises finished, the Governor and his staff returned with General McClernand and a number of his officers to partake of a banquet, which had been ordered by the latter, and had been spread by a German comrade and admirer of General Houston, of Texan renown. Confidence now restored between the military authorities on both banks of the Rio Grande, the Governor the next day sent an invitation to the General and his staff and other officers to partake of a State dinner at Metamoras, the capital of Tamaulipas, and they, accepting, were met by the Governor, attended by his staff and a cavalry guard, at the river and escorted to the city, amid the acclaim of church bells and salvos of artillery. The banquet was a sumptuous and elegant one, and, when it was over, the General unbelted his sword, and, advancing in the presence of the assembly, presented it to the Governor, remarking that "it was offered as a token of his personal sympathy for the cause of the Mexican Republic, and in the belief that it would be as faithfully used in that cause as it had been in the cause of the American Union." The effect was electrical, the spectators enthusiastically approved, and the Governor himself, falling upon the General's breast, passionately replied: "I will try to prove myself worthy of the gift and the honor it imparts. We are friends to the death. I offered my services to the Union cause in the beginning. I will offer them again, with those of my adherents who will not fall away, if the French should unhappily drive me out of my country. I am familiar with Texas, and can be useful to you there." The banquet was supplemented with a magnificent ball at the palace, attended by the Governor, wife and daughter, and all the elite of the city. At a late hour the dancing ceased, and the General and his party were escorted back to the river with the same state they had been escorted from it. On the way back the General, reverting to the strained state of the Mexican finances, urged the Governor to seize and sell the large stores of cotton at Metamoras, and turn the money received into the public treasury for public use, and to banish from the city the turbulent host of American rebels that infested it. The Governor replied, "He had the good will to do so, but whether of his own motion was a delicate question." Resuming the subject next day, through one of his officers, he offered to send an agent with any that the General might send, to urge it upon the favorable consideration of the Government, then at Monterey, and, as an evidence of his earnestness, without delay repressed rebel machinations and disorders at Metamoras. Governor Hamilton and Colonel Haynes, both of Texas, by appointment of General McClelland, and joined with an agent appointed by Governor Cortina, proceeded to Monterey on this mission, of which, under date of the 25th, near Brownsville, Colonel Haynes made full report, from which we take the following extract:

"In an interview with the President (Juarez), at which was present the Secretary of the Treasury, I urged upon him the importance to their Government of availing themselves of your proposition, and represented to them the open violation of the laws of neutrality long continued on this frontier, in furnishing the rebels with arms, ammunition, and all supplies of war; and that the continuance of this trade through their territory was not calculated to increase the good-will which yourself, as well as the great body of the people felt, in this country, for the Mexican nation in its struggle for nationality.

"The President replied that no trade in articles contraband of war should hereafter be carried on, and that such trade heretofore had been the work of Governor Vidanri, in contravention of orders from the Supreme Government; but as for the seizure of cotton in Mexico, for reasons already given, that could not be done.

"A few days after, I requested an audience with General Negrete, the Minister of War, to whom I stated that, as he was a soldier, I should speak more freely. * * * I represented to him the injury done us by the immense supplies of material of war which had been openly carried into the hands of the rebels, through Metamoras and Monterey, and that so far as we could see there had been no diminution of these supplies; that such trade could but be offensive; * * * that both cities were filled with rebel agents and spies, some of them wearing the rebel uniform; that they had been allowed to establish a newspaper at Monterey, to misrepresent and malign our government; that commissioners had been received and treated with about the cotton trade; * * that this cotton belonged to the rebel Government, notwithstanding any flimsy pretense of ownership on the part of private owners * * . I represented * * the friendly feeling existing in our country towards his; * and asked him, if the cotton should be seized by force, * * if his Government would consider the seizure an act of hostility? His reply was, 'We would have to make a great outcry about it, but not a musket should be fired.'

Colonel Haynes adds that intelligence of the object of his mission having in some way transpired, it was jealously and actively opposed by interested agents waiting about the government.

General McClelland left Brownsville on the 8th with the intention of early returning and resuming the work which he had commenced or projected at that place, and arrived at Matagorda on the 9th.

On the 17th, an order came from General Banks to General McClelland, much to the surprise of the latter, that he should hasten with reinforcements and report to former, wherever he should be found on the Red river. Crossing the Gulf with the First Division of the Thirteenth Corps, to New Orleans, General McClelland learned there the details of the failure of the Red river expedition, and the fearful decimation of a detachment of that corps as one of its calamitous incidents. Re-embarking at New Orleans on river transports, he arrived at Alexandria, Louisiana, with the First Division about night-fall of the 24th, and immediately reported the fact to General Banks, who welcomed him in terms of surprise and compliment. The same night he disembarked his forces and marched to the front. Fortunately, he arrived in time to assist in the work of averting further disaster.

On the 26th, he advanced his forces, and covered the retreat of a cavalry picket, of which he caused report to be made to General Banks, as also of his purpose to accept or force an engagement with their pursuers. General Banks at first sent a message of approval, but followed it by another, ordering General McClelland to fall back with his forces to a defensive line quite near Alexandria. Had this engagement transpired, there is persuasive reason to believe that it would have issued in a victory, reversing the current of the campaign, and redeeming its character, for it was a fact, subsequently ascertained, that only a portion of the rebel forces lingered about Alexandria, while the rest had been sent in two detachments—one to co-operate with General Price in Arkansas, the other to cut our communication by water below Alexandria. Beating the force lingering about Alexandria, we could have turned upon the one descending by the right bank of the river, and beaten it also, and then have marched into Texas to meet General McGruder, or into Arkansas to co-operate with General Steele against Price at our discretion. In other words, opportunity served for a venture to cut off the enemy's forces in detail. This was in accordance with the spirit of the General's part in the great campaign upon the Cumberland, the Tennessee, the Arkansas, and Mississippi. Without daring, great opportunities are sometimes lost.

The evacuation of Alexandria was now, no doubt, in the contemplation of General Banks, but an obstacle presented itself, which deeply agitated the minds of all. The Red river was subsiding, and the Mississippi Flotilla, moored above the rapids near Alexandria, unless it was extricated before the evacuation took place, must be left to fall into the hands of the enemy. Such a catastrophe would have sent a shudder through the minds of all loyal men. It engaged General McClelland's anxieties, in common with those of the whole army; and, although he was now confined to his tent by severe sickness, he lent his co-operation, through the skill and energy of his pioneer corps and a regiment of Wisconsin infantry in the work of extrication, which was finally crowned with success, amid great joy.

About the 12th of May, the curtain dropped upon the painful scene of evacuation, and the gunboats and the army started on their doleful return to the Mississippi. At the same time General McClelland was carried on stretchers on board a transport, already crowded with the sick and wounded, and accompanying female nurses, started down the Red river for New Orleans. Intelligence of the boat and of the identity of the boat carrying him, had in some way as was subsequently learned, reached the rebels, who waylaid the boat for some distance and fired into it from the cover of trees and houses. The pilot was wounded and replaced by another, and men and women terrified by the danger, resorted to the General lying helpless on his cot, with an appeal to order the colors to be struck, and the boat to be landed and surrendered. Instead, he ordered that a wall of boxes, beds, and chairs should be raised on the guards and about the pilot house as a defense, and that the boat should continue her passage until she escaped or went to the bottom. This ended the question of surrender, and the boat kept on her way to Fort de Russe, where the General was transferred to a hospital boat and carried to New Orleans. For a while after his arrival there, his physicians despairing of his recovery, he beckoned them to him and whispered: "Take courage, I am not dead yet, but with help will recover." He lingered there, however, until the 12th of June, when he was borne on stretchers to a steamer and carried by it to Illinois.

When he had so far recovered as to be able to resume service, he asked to be re-assigned to duty in the field or permitted to raise and command a special corps to itinerate the Mississippi between St. Louis and New Orleans on armed steamers, for the purpose of protecting the commerce of that river, and to relieve and remit to their several organizations in the field the multitude of garrisons disposed along that river. Waiting for a reply and receiving none, on the twenty-eighth of July he tendered his resignation, but failing to be assigned to duty and the tender of his resignation not being accepted, he renewed the latter in November, 1865, putting it upon the ground, among others, that he was "unwilling to retain an office without opportunity to exercise its functions." His resignation was finally accepted.

Thus ceasing his connection with the military service, he addressed himself to the task of regulating his private affairs, and in 1870 resumed the practice of the law. In the same year he was invited by the Legal Bar of Springfield to become a candidate for Judge of the Circuit Court, and, accepting the invitation, was elected to that station without opposition.

As Judge he evinced the same qualities of diligence and readiness that had characterized him as a commander. His learning, abilities, and impartiality were admitted; and clearing the docket, encumbered with cases which had been accumulating for years, he ceased his judicial functions in June, 1873.

In 1876, as President of the Democratic National Convention at St. Louis, he delivered an address which, for both style and matter, was much admired and commended; and in 1878, as marshal of the day, he conducted the ceremonies which signalized the transfer of the colors and battle flags of the Illinois Volunteers from the old Arsenal to the hall prepared for their reception in the new State House, and on the same occasion delivered an eloquent address.

THE BEGINNING OF THE END.

On Monday morning, April 3, 1865, at eight o'clock, General Weitzel entered the city of Richmond, at the head of his troops, it having been evacuated by the rebels the day previous. The news was quickly flashed over the wires, and before night of that day it was known all over the land that Richmond was ours, and the final victory was near at hand. Richmond, the seat of rebel power, the stronghold of rebel armies, after having been fortified by every appliance of skill and science, and having withstood all the assaults of the Union armies for four years—had at last fallen!

There was great rejoicing in every city, village and hamlet throughout the country, and nowhere more so than in the homes of the loyal citizens of Sangamon county. But this was only the beginning of the good news. Every succeeding day brought the cheering news that other rebel strongholds had fallen; thousands of prisoners had been captured, and the rebels had been disheartened. No one doubted the dark war cloud had been pierced by the sunlight of peace.

On Sunday, April 9, General Lee surrendered his entire army to General Grant, and on the morning of the 10th, the State Journal celebrated the victory in startling head lines, as follows:

VICTORY!

GLORY TO GOD IN THE HIGHEST.

PEACE AND GOOD WILL.

THE BEGINNING OF THE END.

LEE SURRENDERED.

HIS WHOLE ARMY CAPTURED.

LAST ACT IN THE GRAND DRAMA.

THE UNION TRIUMPHANT.

TREASON CRUSHED.

A mass meeting was called, in the following terms, for Monday evening, to celebrate the victories:

"The loyal citizens of Springfield and vicinity who rejoice over the recent success of the Union armies in Virginia, and their triumph over the hosts of treason and rebellion, and who would do honor to the names of Grant, Sheridan, and their brave compeers, whether officers or soldiers, and to all others, both of the army and navy, who have contributed in any way to those glorious successes, are invited to assemble at the State House, this (Monday) evening, April 10, for the purpose of commemorating the capture of Richmond and the brilliant victories lately won. Let the thunder of the cannon, the ringing of the bells, the brilliant display of fireworks, processions, music, bon-fires and illuminations test the joy of the people.

"There will be speaking in the Representative Hall and the rotunda of the State House, by the following gentlemen: Governor Oglesby, General Isham N. Haynie, Hon. Shelby M. Culom, Colonel James H. Matheny, Hon. James C. Conkling, Hon. William H. Herndon, John E. Rosette, Charles S. Zane and E. L. Gross.

"Let all turn out to do honor to our 'brave boys in blue,' and exchange congratulations in view of a speedy return of permanent peace, with the Union preserved, the Constitution vindicated, rebellion punished and freedom triumphant."

When the foregoing call was issued it was not known that General Lee had surrendered, although the call and the news of the surrender were published in the same paper. As soon as the fact was known, however, at a very early hour Monday morning, all business came to a standstill; flags leaped as if by magic from public buildings and private residences all over the city. One hour later, and the business houses about the square were principally closed, and almost the entire population sought the square and public thoroughfares to congratulate each other on the glorious news that came borne on the wires from Old Virginia. Another hour and the excitement became intense; the enthusiasm of the citizens knew no bounds, and their feelings found expression in hurrahs and songs, processions of various kinds, and to make the scene more joyous, the church and fire bells rang a merry peal, which was kept up for some hours, until the whole air was filled with the many sounds of a general jubilee. Flags were attached to houses, horses vehicles, hats, coats, and finally almost every place where a flag could be displayed. Flags were seen upon houses where they were never seen before. The enthusiasm was contagious.

At about 2 o'clock the Pioneer Fire Department, preceded by a band of music, the Pioneer Hose Company, the Journal Cart, with a fine escort with flags, and the Star of the West Hose Company, appeared in procession upon the streets and marched around the square and through several of the principal streets. This was an impromptu procession and attracted considerable attention.

During the afternoon a novel sight appeared upon the public square, which elicited shouts and the applause of the multitude. The show consisted of a large mule covered with a blanket, bearing the inscriptions, on one side, "Jeff Davis' Last Ride," and on the other "Jeff Davis and Suit," while over the tail of the animal hung the inscription, "Lee's End." Upon the mule was mounted an individual personating Jeff Davis, and by his side walked an attendant in mask and wearing ragged regimentals, followed by a forlorn looking escort. Shouts arose from every quarter where Jeff and his attendant passed. There also appeared a company in black masks, headed by a "six foot" fellow in a blue mask, on horseback, who marched his brigade from point to point, much to the amusement of the crowd. Hacks, buggies, wagons and drays, filled with a joyous, jubilant set of fellows, waving flags, singing, and shouting, were driven around the square.

The square was profusely ornamented with flags and drapery of red, white, and blue. Among the most conspicuous houses decorated were those of Stuart & Lutz, Matheny & Co., C. M. Smith & Co., J. Thayer & Co., R. F. Ruth, E. B. Hawley & Co., Kimber & Ragsdale, C. A. Gehrman, John Williams & Co., and Hammerslough Bros. The headquarters of Adjutant General Haynie, Marshal Keys, and Captain Campbell were most beautifully decorated with flags. Governor Oglesby displayed from his mansion the gallant Eighth regiment flag, under which he and his regiment fought at Fort Donelson. From the former residence of President Lincoln, a splendid flag was displayed.

At about four o'clock the Twenty-fourth Michigan regiment arrived from Camp Butler, under command of Brigadier General Morrow, and marched around the square, preceded by the splendid post band of Camp Butler, and afterwards paraded the State House yard, where they were addressed by Governor Oglesby and Brigadier General Morrow.

About half-past six o'clock, a salute of twenty guns was fired, after which there was a grand display of fireworks. Immediately after the fireworks, the Fire Department had a grand parade and torchlight procession, in which all the companies of the Fire Department joined, also a large number of the Fenian Brotherhood, wearing their badges and carrying a banner which elicited the admiration of all. "Old Bob," a splendid old horse of dark bay color, with the eye of an eagle, swelling nostrils, and a proud and elastic step, formerly the property of President Lincoln, was led in the procession by a colored groom. He attracted a large share of attention, from the fact that he had carried President Lincoln many hundred miles during his political campaign. "Old Bob" sported a rich blanket of red, white, and blue, thickly studded with flags, and bearing the inscription, "Old Abe's Horse." The flags were nearly all secured by the people as mementoes.

About 8 o'clock a large and enthusiastic meeting was held at Representatives' Hall, addressed by those mentioned in the call. Never was such enthusiasm and joy manifested as on this occasion. The day will long be remembered by the citizens of Springfield.

The general Government now issued orders to stop drafting and recruiting, believing the war to be almost at an end. General Johnston with his command was the only considerable force our army now had to contend. True, scattered detachments of rebel forces were throughout the South, but the number was small. After considerable negotiations, Johnston surrendered his forces on the 28th day of April, on the same terms granted to Lee.

ASSASSINATION OF PRESIDENT LINCOLN.

Amid all the rejoicing over the evacuation of Richmond, the capture of Lee, and other Union victories, the startling intelligence was flashed across the continent that President Lincoln was assassinated. Instantly every expression of joy vanished, and sorrow filled the hearts of all. Abraham Lincoln, the great, the noble and good, struck down by the hand of an assassin! The news was too dreadful to believe, and each hoped against hope there was some mistake in the intelligence. The news was received in Springfield at a very early hour on the morning of the 15th of April, and spread rapidly through the city. Citizens began to gather upon the streets, listening to the dispatches, or discussing the horrible details. The minds of loyal men and women were overwhelmed with mingled horror and sorrow, in view of the event which had deprived them of a valuable friend and former townsman, and the Nation of an honored and patriotic President. Before 8 o'clock the news had spread generally through the city. The business houses which had been opened were, by common consent, closed almost immediately, and the stillness of the Sabbath prevailed, except as indicated in the anxious faces and hurried inquiries upon the streets.

As soon as the telegraph office opened, the anxiety to procure further details became intense, and the appearance of the bulletins was awaited with impatient and eager interest. Soon came the intelligence that the President was dead. All feared the worst, but still clung to hope. The announcement fell with a crushing weight upon all loyal hearts, though all had reason to expect the event. By-and-bye there came a rumor that Secretary Seward was dead also. All felt that the Nation had suffered the loss of two of its noblest leaders. Then came the rumor that Booth, the assassin of the President, had been captured. This, though unconfirmed, gave great satisfaction. In the afternoon the intelligence came that Mr. Seward was not dead, and that his wounds were not considered mortal. This relieved, to some extent, the painful anxiety that pressed upon all.

Soon after the death of President Lincoln became known, the principal business houses were draped in mourning. Flags were draped and placed at half mast, and various other emblems of the general sorrow were displayed. Among the buildings draped were the State House, and offices of the different State officers: the headquarters of General Cook, commanding the district, of General Oakes, Assistant Provost Marshal General of the State, and of Captain Keyes, Provost Marshal of the District; the hall of the Fenian Brotherhood and Union League; the Postoffice, the chambers of the City Council, all the business houses on the public square and principal streets, the principal hotels, churches, the houses of the different fire companies, newspaper offices and the Soldiers' Home. In many cases black was gracefully intertwined with white or the National colors. Much the larger portion of private houses were similarly draped, or bore some emblem of mourning. The bells of the different churches and engine houses were tolled during the morning. At the State Arsenal the cannon were tastefully draped with the American flag, and over the entrance the stars and stripes were artistically arranged and draped in mourning, whilst from the flag-staff floated a dark colored pennant at half mast. The whole city presented a funeral aspect, as if the Death Angel had taken a member from every family. Never was there a day of such universal solemnity and sadness seen in this or any other city.

A meeting of the City Council was held in the morning, and in response to a call issued in the course of the forenoon, a very large and solemn meeting of citizens assembled at the State House, to take into consideration the terrible calamity that had befallen the city and Nation. At 12 o'clock, m., the meeting was called to order by Hon. S. M. Cullom, who said:

"Fellow-Citizens:—We are met together to mourn over a great calamity. Abraham Lincoln, your fellow citizen, who went out from this city four years ago, called by the American people to preside over the Nation, is no more. He has been stricken down by the hands of a dastardly, bloody assassin. In view of the long acquaintance, and the sympathy existing between that great and good man and our fellow citizen, J. K. Dubois, I nominate him to preside over our meeting."

The nomination was unanimously confirmed by the meeting, and upon assuming the chair, Mr. Dubois spoke briefly and pertinently, alluding to the long and friendly intercourse between himself and the lamented dead.

The following named were chosen Vice Presidents of the meeting: Stephen T. Logan, John Williams, William F. Elkin, Elijah Iles, N. H. Ridgely, E. B. Hawley, Thomas Condell, James L. Lamb, Gershom Jayne, Richard Latham, A. G. Herndon, Rev. Albert Hale, and Rev. J. G. Bergen. For Secretaries, were chosen James C. Conkling, E. L. Baker, and E. L. Merritt.

John T. Stuart addressed the audience, condoling with it upon the deep grief which had befallen the American people, and relating some interesting circumstances connected with his last interview with the martyr President. On his motion, the following-named were appointed a Committee on Resolutions: John T. Stuart, S. M. Cullom, S. H. Treat, Milton Hay, Lawrence Weldon, William Jayne, O. M. Hatch, B. S. Edwards, and Alexander Starne. The committee, thereupon, after retiring a few minutes, reported the following, which were adopted:

"WHEREAS, We have learned by telegraph from the City of Washington of the assassination of President Lincoln;

"AND, WHEREAS, We, his neighbors and friends, regard his death as a great and irreparable National calamity.

"Resolved, therefore, That we, his neighbors and friends, without distinction of party, forgetting all past differences of opinion, unite in solemn accord in the expression of our deep sympathy for his family, his friends, our country, and the peace of mankind, for this his untimely death, in this hour of our country's struggle, when were to be called into exercise those high qualities of head and heart which have endeared him as a man, and made him distinguished as a President.

"Resolved, That since the unexampled success of our arms, we have with patriotic pride beheld indications upon the part of Mr. Lincoln of a policy of restoration and reunion, in the consummation of which the peace of the country and the wonted National integrity would again be restored to our stricken Union.

"Resolved, That in this National bereavement it is the duty of all good citizens to rely with confidence and hope on the over-ruling Providence of God, preserve calmness, and faithfully submit and adhere to the sovereign laws of the land.

"Resolved, That, inasmuch as this city has for a long time been the home of the President, in which he has graced with his kindness of heart and honesty of purpose all the relations of life, it is appropriate that its 'city of the dead' should be the final resting place of all that on earth remains of him that is mortal, and to this end we respectfully request the appointment of a committee on the part of the City Council, to act in conjunction with the Governor of the State, with a view of bringing his remains for interment."

The City Council, at a called meeting, passed the following resolutions:

"WHEREAS, A sad and deplorable calamity has befallen the Nation in the violent death of Abraham Lincoln, President of the United States,

"WHEREAS, It becomes us, a people, to bow solemnly in awe to the mysterious dispensations of Providence; and,

"WHEREAS, To us the sudden dispensation may seem dark and inscrutable, and, trusting as we do in the guardian kindness of Him who 'holds the Nations in the hollow of His hand,' therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Common Council of the City of Springfield, That we, in common with every true American heart, deplore the sad calamity befallen us as a people, and join the universal sorrow that hangs upon the Nation to-day, like the pall of death.

"Resolved, That in this terrible hour of sadness and gloom, when darkness shadows the counsels and judgments of men, and a strange and unnatural fear is chilling every heart, and fearful forebodings of coming disaster gather gloomily about us, it becomes us to turn trustingly and hopefully to the God of Nations, and in humbleness and humility receive the stroke of His chastening rod; but yet feeling an abiding faith that in this, the hour of our desolation, that He will be to us, for all time to come, "as the shadow of a great rock in a weary land."

"Resolved, That although the murderous hand of treason has stricken to death the chosen Executive of the Government, yet the Government itself 'still lives,' and will live, as the glorious embodiment of political life, liberty, and human hope.

"Resolved, That we, the Common Council of the City of Springfield, deeply sympathize with the bereaved family, and much deplore the heavy loss which they have sustained in the unexpected and sudden death of a husband and father.

"Resolved, That the City Council Chamber be clothed in mourning for sixty days.

"Resolved, That the members of the City Council wear the usual badge of mourning for sixty days."

On a preceding page is given the address of the martyr President on taking his departure for Washington. The scene at the depot was an impressive one. The simple and touching eloquence of the great and good man saddened every heart and moistened every eye, and many turned away, as the train moved off, with misgivings and forebodings for the future. He was as he said, "going to assume a task more difficult than that which devolved upon Washington." The oppressive sadness which seemed to hang over him was shared by many friends. There seemed to be prophecy in the last sentence of his speech—"With these few words I must leave you, for how long I know not. Many felt that they were portentous of the dreadful death which at last overtook him. Mr. Lincoln never returned to the city of his adoption alive.

"Bow low your heads, Prone on the earth, and grovel in the dust!"
Bow low your heads—
The last sad tribute to the good and just!
Bow low your heads!
The greatest grief that e'er befell mankind
Lies on the heart, and preys upon the mind!

"Weep for the loss,
O Freedom! of thy greatest champion.
Weep for the loss,
O Greatness! of thy brightest diadem.
Weep for thy loss,
O Honesty and Truth! O Patriot Worth!
Thy loss and ours—the loss of all the earth.

"A Nation's tears
Bedew the bier whereon his dust doth lay;
A Nation's tears
Are hallowed in their contact with his clay.
A Nation's tears
From its deep heart upwell in bitter woe.
Nor seeks to check their still increasing flow.

"O Martyr pure,
Thy country's altar's sanctified anew;
O martyr pure,
Slain for thy love and faith unto the true.
O martyr pure,
As thou hast died for Freedom, so do we,
Her children, dedicate our lives to thee!"

On Wednesday, April 19, the funeral obsequies of President Lincoln occurred in Washington. In accordance with the recommendations of the Acting Secretary of State at Washington, and the proclamation of Governor Oglesby, services for the purpose of solemnizing the occasion, were held at the First Presbyterian, Second Presbyterian, Third Presbyterian, Methodist Episcopal, North Baptist, German Catholic, English Lutheran and First Baptist Churches. All places of business were closed.

It having been announced that the remains of Mr. Lincoln would be brought to Springfield for interment, in accordance with a universally expressed desire, it was arranged that the funeral train should make stops at several points on the road in order to give the people an opportunity of viewing the lifeless body of him who was of the people, and whom the people loved. At Baltimore, Harrisburg, Philadelphia, New York, Albany, Buffalo, Cleveland, Columbus, Indianapolis and Chicago, many thousands turned out, public and private buildings were draped in mourning, and such honors were paid to the dead as were never given any hero of ancient or modern times.

Extensive preparations were made in Springfield to receive and deposit in their last resting place the remains of one they loved so well. Thursday, May 4th, was appointed for the funeral. On the previous day the long funeral train arrived. Never was there a day in the annals of the city so fraught with solemn interest. A day in which the remains of the beloved Chief Magistrate of a great people were returned to the midst of his friends and neighbors, who loved and revered him through a long life, for final sepulchre. All former demonstrations on the death of great and good men were insignificant compared with the grief and sorrow on this occasion. The day broke bright and beautiful upon the vast crowds which at an early hour had sought the city to witness the return of all that was mortal of the late President. Long previous to the time appointed for the arrival of the remains, crowds of people, numbering thousands, were gathered at the Chicago & Alton depot, and along the line of the road for a long distance. Every building and house-top in the vicinity was covered with anxious and solemn men, eager to see the funeral train. Never was there such an assemblage gathered under such solemn circumstances. Every class was represented in the throng of human beings and intense was the feeling and anxiety that had called them together.

Previous to the arrival of the funeral train, minute guns were being fired by a section of Battery K, Second Missouri Light Artillery. The deep booming of the guns gave a solemn interest to the scene.

The funeral train had been announced to arrive at 8 o'clock a. m., but did not make its appearance until a few minutes before 9 o'clock. When the "pilot engine," dressed in mourning, made its appearance, which was understood to precede the funeral train by ten minutes, the feelings of the people were intense, but only manifested by the almost breathless silence which pervaded the vast crowd.

Just previous to the arrival of the train, which consisted of nine cars beautifully draped in mourning, one of which contained the remains of the late President, the committee of reception, the military, and the members of the several delegations made their appearance and formed according to programme on Jefferson street, under direction of General Cook. The remains were then transferred from the funeral car to the beautiful hearse tendered by the Mayor of St. Louis to the Mayor of Springfield, drawn by six superb black horses, draped in mourning and wearing plumes upon their crests. The hearse was also draped, the corners being surmounted with black plumes, the whole presenting a solemn and magnificent spectacle.

After the procession was formed it proceeded to the Hall of Representatives, where the catafalque, resting on the dais underneath the canopy, and opened by the embalmer, after which the guard of honor took their stations around the remains, guards being placed in various parts of the hall and at the entrances. The coffin, when opened, revealed the marked and well-known features of the noble dead, which wore a calm expression,—and had it not been for a slight discoloration of the face, it would have appeared as though he had "fallen into a quiet sleep."

At a few minutes past ten o'clock a. m., the arrangements having been completed, the vast crowd was admitted to review the remains. In doing so, they entered at the north entrance of the capitol, and passing through the Hall, along the side and around the head of the coffin, thence into the rotunda, leaving by the south door. It was estimated that twenty-five thousand persons entered the Hall in the course of ten hours.

The scene inside the Hall was most solemn and impressive; the elegance and appropriateness of the decorations, the rich catafalque underneath a splendid canopy, the silent dead, the officers and guard, making up a sad picture. The decorations were in most excellent taste; the general arrangement being such as to make them correspond with the room, which is a semi-circumcollonade of eleven Corinthian columns, supporting a half-dome, the straight side being toward the west, in the centre of which was the Speaker's chair (which was removed for the occasion). At the apex of the dome was a rising sun, radiating to the circumference. On the floor a dais was erected, ascended by three steps; on the dais, a hexagon canopy supported on columns twelve feet high, the shaft covered with black velvet, the capitals wrought in white velvet, with silver bands and fillets; the canopy rising seven feet in the centre, tent-shaped, covered with heavy black broadcloth in radiating slack folds, surmounted at the apex and at each angle with heavy black plumes with white centre, with draped eagle on the center of each crown-mould; the cornice, corresponding with the capitals, covered with black velvet, the moulding and bands of silver; the lining of the canopy was of white crepe, in radiating folds over blue, thick set with stars of silver, with black velvet and silver fillets inside the cornice; between columns a rich velvet valance, in folds, with heavy silver fringe, from under which depended velvet curtains extending from each column two-thirds of the distance from the capitals to the cornice, looped with bands, the whole so disposed as to exhibit both columns and capitals inside and out. The effect of the canopy, with its supports and drapery, was very imposing, the whole being unique and elegant, combining lightness with massiveness with great effect. Twelve brilliant jets of gas, burning in globes, shining from the columns, lit the interior, reflecting from the folds of the canopy a soft and pleasing light.

The catafalque was covered with black velvet, trimmed with silver bands, and adorned with thirty-six stars of burnished silver—twelve at the head, and twelve at each side. The floor of the dais was covered with evergreens strewn with white flowers. The steps of the dais were covered with massive broadcloth drapery, bordered with silver.

The columns of the Hall were draped with black crepe, and the capitals festooned and entwined with the same, and ornamented with rosettes. The cornice was appropriately draped, and bearing around the entire circumference, in large, white letters, on a black ground, the words of President Lincoln at Independence Hall, Philadelphia, February 22, 1861: "SOONER THAN SURRENDER THESE PRINCIPLES, I WOULD BE ASSASSINATED ON THE SPOT." In front of the gallery, were black velvet panels, nine feet by two and a half, having silver bands and fringe, with crossed olive branches in the center. Above the gallery were looped curtains of black crepe, extending around the semi-circle. Below the gallery were white crepe curtains, with black looped upon it. Each column was ornamented by a beautiful wreath of evergreens and white flowers.

On the top of the gallery, and extending around, was a wreath of evergreens. The Corinthian cornice is continued on the west, at each side, twenty-three feet, toward the center, supported by pillars of the same order, the space between being surmounted by an obtuse arch, reaching within one foot of the apex, projecting six inches, leaving a depression resembling a panel, thirty-three feet wide by thirty-seven feet high at the extreme height. In the upper portion of this was placed a blue semi-circular field, sixteen feet across, bearing stars six inches in diameter, and from which radiated the thirteen stripes of the American flag in delicate crepe, two feet wide at the circumference of the blue field, increasing in width to five feet at the extreme lower angle, breaking on the dais below, and the pilasters on either side, the whole surmounted by cloud work in blue and black crepe, and so disposed as to correspond with the blue field, stars, and radiated panel of the ceiling. The center red stripe falls opposite the opening in the curtains at the head of the catafalque. On the cornice, each side of the flag work, were placed two mottoes, corresponding to that on the semi-circular cornice, forming together one, in these words: "WASHINGTON THE FATHER; LINCOLN THE SAVIOR." A life-sized portrait of Washington, the frame draped in blue crepe, stood at the head of the catafalque. The interior decorations were perfected under the direction of G. F. Wright, the catafalque by Colonel Schwartz, and the exterior of the building by E. E. Myers.

The coffin was probably the handsomest ever constructed in this country. It was mahogany, lined with lead, and covered with black cloth of the richest and most expensive quality, heavily fringed with silver, with four silver medalions on each side in which were set the handles. The outside of the coffin was festooned with massive silver tacks, representing drapery, in each fold of which was a silver star, the outer edges adorned with silver braid, with five tassels, five inches in length, each side having upon it four massive handles, and at the head and foot were stars. Upon the top was a row of silver tacks, extending the entire length on both sides, about two inches from the edge. Upon the center was a silver plate encircled by a shield, formed also of silver tacks, and the face lid and top were united with five silver stars. The inside of the face lid was raised white satin, the centre piece being trimmed with black and white silk braid festooned at each corner with four silver stars.

The buildings around the public square, and a large majority of the private residences of the city, were beautifully draped, manifesting the sorrow of the people at the tragic death of a loved one. The late President's house was tastefully decorated with the National mourning colors and evergreens. It was visited by many visitors from abroad. The following poem, without credit, was published in the Journal:

"LINCOLN! thy Country's Savior, hail!
We bid thee welcome, but bewail;
Welcome unto thy chosen home;
Triumphant, glorious dost thou come.

"Before the rebels struck the blow
That laid thee in a moment low,
God gave thy wish: it was to see
OUR UNION SAFE, OUR COUNTRY FREE.

"A country where the gospel truth
Shall reach the heart of age and youth,
And move, unchained, in majesty,
A model land of liberty.

"When Jacob's bones, from Egypt borne,
Regained their home, the people mourn,
Great mourning then at Ephron's cave,
Both Abraham's and Isaac's grave.

"Far greater is the mourning now;
Our land one emblem wide of woe;
And where thy coffin-car appears,
Do not the people throng in tears?

"Thy triumph of a thousand miles,
Like eastern conqueror with his spoils—
A million hearts thy captive led,
All weeping for thy Chieftain dead.

"Thy chariot, moved with eagle's speed
Without the aid of prancing steed,
Has brought thee to thy destined tomb:
Springfield, thy home, will give thee room.

"LINCOLN, the martyr, welcome home!
What lessons blossom on thy tomb:
In God's pure truth and law delight,
With firm unwavering soul, do right.

"Be condescending, kind and just;
In God's wise counsels put thy trust.
Let no proud soul e'er dare rebel,
Moved by vile passion sprung from hell.

"Come, sleep with us in sweet repose,
Till we, as Christ from death arose,
Shall in His glorious image rise
To dwell with Him beyond the skies."

The crowd in Springfield on this occasion was very great. Thousands could not obtain a place to lay their head during the long night of Wednesday, May 3. All night long the sound of tramping feet was heard upon the pavement as the weary night watches wore away. The interest to see the remains was unparalleled, and ere it was light upon Thursday morning, the crowd was pressing in long columns toward Representatives Hall. At about 10 o'clock, a. m., the coffin was closed, and the beloved features were shut out from the people forever. While these preparations were being made a choir of two hundred and fifty singers assembled on the steps of the Capitol, and under the direction of Professor Meissner, sang "Peace, troubled soul," by Paesillo. The harmony was very fine and it had a solemn but pleasing effect. As the remains were being brought out of the Capitol to be placed in the hearse, the choir sang with fine effect, Pleyel's hymn, "Children of the Heavenly King."

After the remains were placed in the hearse, the procession was formed and wended its way to Oak Ridge Cemetery. It was one of the most imposing ever seen in this country. On its arrival at the cemetery, the remains were placed in the tomb, after which the choir sang the "Dead March in Saul"—"Unveil thy Bosom." Rev. Albert Hale then made an eloquent, feeling and appropriate prayer, after which the choir sang the following dirge, composed for the occasion. Music by George F. Root; words by L. M. Dawes. It was sung with much feeling and effect:

FAREWELL, FATHER, FRIEND AND GUARDIAN.

"All our land is draped in mourning,
Hearts are bowed and strong men weep;
For our loved, our noble leader,
Sleeps his last, his dreamless sleep.
Gone forever, gone forever,

Fallen by a traitor's hand;
Though preserv'd his dearest treasure,
Our redeem'd beloved land.
Rest in peace.

"Through our night of bloody struggle,
Ever dauntless, firm and true,
Bravely, gently forth he led us,
Till the morn burst on our view—
Till he saw the day of triumph,
Saw the field our heroes won;
Then his honor'd life was ended,
Then his glorious work was done.
Rest in peace.

"When from mountain, hill and valley,
To their homes our brave boys come,
When with welcome notes we greet them;
Song and cheer and peeling drum;
When we miss our loved ones fallen,
When to weep we turn aside;
Then for him our tears shall mingle,
He has suffered—he has died.
Rest in peace.

"Honor'd leader, long and fondly
Shall thy mem'ry cherished be;
Hearts shall bless thee for their freedom,
Hearts unborn shall sigh for thee;
He who gave thee might and wisdom,
Gave thy spirit sweet release;
Farewell, Father, friend and guardian,
Rest forever, rest in peace. ♦
Rest in peace."

A portion of Scripture was then read by Rev. N. W. Miner, after which the choir sang, "To Thee, O Lord," from Oratorio of St. Paul. The President's last Inaugural was read by Rev. A. C. Hubbard, when the choir sang the dirge, "As when Thy cross was bleeding," by Otto. At the conclusion of the singing, Bishop Simpson delivered a most eloquent funeral oration, which was listened to with marked attention, and at its conclusion, "Over the Valley the Angels Smile," was sung. After a few remarks by Dr. Gurley, the following hymn and doxology was sung:

FUNERAL HYMN.

"Rest, noble martyr! rest in peace;
Rest with the true and brave,
Who, like thee, fell in Freedom's cause,
The Nation's life to save.

"Thy name shall live while time endures,
And men shall say of thee,
'He saved his country from its foes,
And bade the slave be free.'

"These deeds shall be thy monument,
Better than brass or stone;
They leave thy fame in glory's light,
Unrival'd and alone.

"This consecrated spot shall be
To Freedom ever dear.
And Freedom's sons of every race
Shall weep and worship here.

"O God! before whom we, in tears,
Our fallen Chief deplore;
Grant that the cause, for which he died,
May live for evermore."

DOXOLOGY.

"To the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost,
To God whom we adore,
Be glory as it was, is now,
And shall be evermore."

After benediction by Rev. P. D. Gurley, the troops and the fire department re-formed and marched back to the city, where they were dismissed to their respective headquarters. Thus ended the obsequies of the late President Abraham Lincoln.

THE END.

While the funeral obsequies of President Lincoln were taking place, our armies were fast gathering around the rebel hosts, and seldom a day passed but more or less of them were captured. Jeff Davis, the rebel chief, fled from the capital of the Confederacy, Lee was a prisoner, and Johnston surrounded. A few days more and both Davis and Johnston were captured, and with their capture the Confederacy collapsed. Regiment after regiment of Illinois troops were dispatched to Camp Butler for final payment, and discharged during the summer and early fall. A royal welcome did they receive. The noble ladies of Springfield who labored earnestly and zealously to relieve their wants while in the field, now sought to show their regard by kind and thoughtful attention on their return. On the fourth day of July it was planned to celebrate the day by a public reception and welcome to the returning soldiers. On that day, at an early hour, people began to arrive from the surrounding country, and by nine o'clock the streets wore the appearance of a gala-day. About half past nine o'clock, a train of forty cars, drawn by two locomotives, filled with soldiers from Camp Butler, arrived in Springfield, where, after forming in line, they marched to the square, and from thence to Wright's Grove, west of the city. On arriving at the Grove, the soldiers were marched to the speakers' stand, when after prayer by Rev. Albert Hale, J. C. Conkling, President of the day, introduced Governor Oglesby, who spoke substantially as follows:

"Mr. President, Fellow Soldiers and Fellow Citizens:—The pleasant duty of extending a welcome to these brave soldiers has devolved upon me, and when this duty is performed you will listen to a prayer and oration; and when this part is over, the fair ladies and citizens of this place have cordially invited you to a good dinner, if not our best in all respects, it is good for the stomach. On the 4th day of July, 1860, found us at peace with all the world and ourselves. We had been progressing in everything that constitutes a great people. Intellectual and material wealth had made us one of the first Nations of the earth.

"The 4th day of July, 1861, found us at peace with the world but at war with ourselves. This year thirteen States, under the erroneous doctrine of State rights, that a man's allegiance to his State took precedence of his allegiance to his Government, seceded from the Union, on what they called the ordinance of secession. On the 21st day of July, we stood dishonored before the world by the events of Bull Run. Our beautiful and loved flag was dishonored and trailed in the dust.

"The 4th of July, 1862, found us in better condition. We had captured Fort Donelson, had obtained possession of Kentucky, most of Tennessee, and had opened the Mississippi river two hundred and forty miles below Cairo. A large number of the bravest and best men of the country had responded to their country's call and had gone forth to fight its battles.

"The 4th of July, 1863, found us in possession of Vicksburg; we had won the battle of Gettysburg, and taken many important points. The disgrace of Bull Run had been wiped from our flag, and the seven days' battle and defeat had been wiped out, the rebels had been whipped. We now held the rebels by the neck by a cord of American soldiers, and they were pulling the cord at both ends."

Continuing, the Governor spoke in glowing and eloquent terms of the 4th of July, 1864, when Grant swept the country, and with the army of the Potomac, held the rebels as in a vise. The fourth of July, 1865, was glorious. Glory to God, said he, for the grandeur and happiness of our condition; and thanks to the brave men as instruments in carrying forward the great work of redeeming the country. Their names were written in the hearts of a grateful people, and should be inscribed on tablets of marble and of iron in testimony of their great and glorious services. He welcomed them home from the bottom of his heart—he welcomed them home in the name of the city and its brave and generous people. His duty was done; he did not come to advise them in relation to their deportment, or to tell them to be good citizens, but to tell them they were among men and women who respected and honored them as the brave defenders of their country. Without the presence of the brave soldiers, the people would not be so happy to-day. He referred in eloquent terms to the principles of the Declaration of Independence, and asked them if they could stand upon the platform therein contained, as applied to rebels and traitors? We will hold them, he said, as we hold the rest of mankind: enemies in war; in peace, friends. As for himself, he was not exactly prepared for it—not exactly cool enough—could not adopt it just then. For the last four years they had been at war; they were his enemies, and he would think about adopting the sentiment hereafter. He closed his remarks amid the greatest applause.

After the Veteran Reserve Band had discoursed some fine music, the President of the day introduced Robert J. Ingersoll, who delivered an oration such as only he could deliver, after which a benediction was pronounced by Rev. N. W. Miner, and the soldiers formed in line and marched to the tables, where a grand charge was made upon the good things provided for the occasion, and all felt happy and thankful for the blessings received and that the "cruel war" was over.

After dinner, a large number of citizens assembled at the stand, where a number of toasts were read, among which were the following:

"The Day we Celebrate.—The principles of liberty promulgated in the Declaration of Independence, by our fathers of 1776, have been triumphantly vindicated by their heroic children; and we meet in 1865 to rejoice in the fact the inspired maxims of that immortal instrument are no longer 'glittering generalities,' but the assured and absolute basis of the Government, and destined so to be, to the latest generation."

"The Soldiers of Illinois.—In vindicating the honor of the flag and preserving the National Union, they have conferred immortal honor upon their State."

To this sentiment General Brayman responded in some eloquent and appropriate remarks, in the course of which he alluded to the lofty patriotism and self-denying spirit which led the volunteer soldiers to enlist in the great work of redeeming their country. He referred to the glorious day which was being celebrated, and to a restored country and a free people. His reference to the noble and brave soldiers of Illinois was just and flattering to them and the State they represented. To the memory of Abraham Lincoln, he paid a just and eloquent tribute—no circumstances could daunt him; he was equal to every emergency.

"The Loyal Women of the North.—Their persistent devotion to the cause of their country—their patient endurance, unwearied labors, heroic sacrifices, and inspiring cheerfulness and hope through the long midnight of agony and woe—all this is at once the most beautiful and sublimest spectacle of the war. God bless and reward the loyal women of America."

Captain George R. Weber responded to the foregoing toast in some eloquent and appropriate remarks, which were received with great applause:

"The Patriotic Soldier of Illinois.—Their patient endurance and impetuous valor have shed imperishable lustre upon the arms of the State that delights to do them honor—braver and truer men never trod on battle-field—welcome, thrice welcome from the fields of their renown."

Colonel George H. Harlow responded in appropriate remarks:

"Our Fallen Heroes.—We miss them here to-day. 'They sleep their last sleep, they have fought their last battle; no sound can awaken them to glory again'—but shrined in the hearts of a grateful people, their names and deeds shall live in immortal glory."

This sentiment was received in silence.

"Richard Yates.—The 'Cour de Leon' of the Union hosts of Illinois, during the four years of war. Traitors hated him as Governor; they will hate him worse as United States Senator."

This sentiment was received with immense cheering, and music by the band.

CHAPTER XVIII.

A history of Sangamon county, without a record of her brave sons in the field, would indeed be incomplete. The reader can well understand the historical sketches of the regiments must be short; and even then, only those can be given that are represented by any considerable number of men from Sangamon county. A full and complete list of soldiers from the county is given, as far, at least, as can be compiled from the Adjutant-General's reports. When possible, the list of the various regiments have been revised by some one familiar with the names.

SEVENTH INFANTRY.

The Seventh Infantry Illinois Volunteers is claimed to be the first regiment organized in the State of Illinois, under the first call of the President for three months' troops. The Seventh was mustered into the United States service at Camp Yates, Illinois, April 25, 1861, by Captain John Pope, U. S. A.; was forwarded to Alton, St. Louis, Cairo and Mound City, where it remained during three months' service.

The Seventh was re-organized, and mustered for three years' service July 25, 1861, by Captain T. G. Pitcher, U. S. A.; proceeded to Ironton, Missouri, and joined the command of Brigadier General B. M. Prentiss, August 23, 1861; marched to Cape Girardeau, Missouri, where it remained some time; Colonel Cook commanding post. The garrison consisted of a brigade: Seventh and Twenty-eighth Illinois and McAllister's battery. General Grant commanded the District of Cairo.

Was with the reconnoitering expedition under General Grant, in the rear of Columbus, Kentucky. During the battle of Belmont, was sent to Elliott's Mills, just above Columbus. On February 3, 1862, embarked for Fort Henry, and on the 12th for Fort Donelson; taking part in the investment and siege of that place, February 13, 14 and 15, and was in the last charge on the left of the enemy's works. At Donelson, the regiment was commanded by Lieutenant Colonel Babcock. Colonel Cook was commanding Third Brigade, Second Division; Major General C. F. Smith commanding. Loss, three killed, including the gallant Captain Mendall, of Company I, and nineteen wounded.

February 21, 1862, left Fort Donelson for Clarksville, Tennessee, Major Rowett commanding; Lieutenant Colonel Babcock, absent—sick and Colonel Cook commanding brigade. Ordered to Nashville, and afterwards to Pittsburg Landing, where it arrived February 22, 1862. Was engaged continually, April 6 and 7, at the battle of Shiloh under command of Lieutenant Colonel Rowett, Colonel Babcock being absent—sick, and Colonel Cook having been promoted to Brigadier General on the 21st of March.

Loss at battle of Shiloh.—Two commissioned officers and thirteen men killed, and seventy-nine wounded.

Was engaged up to May 30, with Third brigade, Second division, and in centre of right wing, moving upon Corinth—meanwhile having several skirmishes with the enemy. On evacuation of Corinth May 30, by the enemy, the regiment marched to Farmington and Booneville Mississippi, repairing roads and bridges and returned to Corinth June 11, 1862. At battle of Corinth, October 3 and 4, 1862, the regiment was engaged both days entire, on right of Third brigade and still in Second division. Colonel Babcock was in command. On 5th of October marched in pursuit of enemy as far as Ruckerville and returned on 10th.

Loss at Corinth.—Two commissioned officers and six men killed, forty-six wounded. Also twenty-one prisoners, who were afterward exchanged and returned to duty.

R. F. Root

December 18, marched to Lexington Missouri, in pursuit of guerrillas, April 16, 1863, marched with General Dodge's command through Iuka, Glendale and Barnsville to Bear Creek, on the Alabama line.

On 17th, deployed as skirmishers, drove the enemy from the creek, and as soon as the cavalry had crossed, companies C and K pushed forward at a double quick, in support of a battery.

The remainder of the brigade then crossed, and moving forward to Cherokee, engaged the rebels. The Seventh on the right killed twelve of the enemy, and captured two prisoners. At dark retired, and next morning removed back to Bear Creek.

April 25, again moved forward to Tuscumbia, and the same evening to South Florence, joining the Ninth Illinois (mounted) infantry. The next day, moved with main column to Town creek. April 28, crossed Town creek, and drove the enemy three miles, and remained on the ground during the second night with the Second Iowa infantry. On 29th, re-crossed, and returned to Corinth with the command, arriving May 2. Loss during this expedition, one man killed—accidentally shot.

May 12 to June 8, 1863, guarded railroad from Bethel to Jackson, Tennessee. June 18, mounted by order of Major General Dodge, and the remainder of the month was scouting through West Tennessee. July 7 to 9, on scout. July 26 to August 5, on expedition, under command of Colonel Rowett, of the Seventh, capturing forty-two prisoners, including one Colonel and two Captains, and many horses and mules. Lost one man, accidentally killed. Again went out with 100 men of the Tenth Missouri cavalry. Had several skirmishes, and captured twenty prisoners.

September 26, commenced a four days' expedition with the Seventh Kansas cavalry, Colonel Rowett in command. Had some very brisk skirmishes, and captured thirty prisoners and several horses, and mules. October 4, relieved Eighteenth Missouri at Chervalla, and was again relieved on the 28th.

October 26, proceeded to Iuka. Here guarded approaches until the 6th of November, when marched to Eastport, and crossing the Tennessee river, moved on flanks of Dodge's command, capturing horses, etc., and fighting guerrillas until November 12, when camped at Pulaska. November 17 to 19, scouted to and beyond Lawrenceburg, capturing thirty prisoners. December 10, ordered on scout toward Shreve creek and Florence, Alabama. Engaged Moreland's battalion, and captured thirty-five prisoners, including four commissioned officers.

The enemy left eight dead on the field, and many wounded.

Besides the above skirmishes and marches, detachments of the regiment had been constantly employed carrying dispatches, and have had many small skirmishes, captured many prisoners, etc. December 22, 1863, the regiment re-enlisted as Veteran Volunteers, and January 7, 1864, started to Springfield for the Veterans' furlough.

The regiment was mustered out July 9, 1865, at Louisville, Kentucky, and arrived at Camp Butler, July 12, 1865, for final payment and discharge.

In the three months' service, Sangamon county was represented by the Colonel of the regiment and Companies G and I. In the three years' service it had, when organized, the Colonel, Lieutenant Colonel, Surgeon, and a large number of men, as will be seen in the accompanying roster.

The promotions, during the service, of men from Sangamon county, in the Seventh Infantry, was as follows: Colonel Cook, to Brigadier General; Andrew J. In the line of promotions from the men of this county are the following: George T. Allen, from regimental to brigade surgeon; Balzer Grebs, from the ranks of Second Lieutenant.

This regiment was first called into the State service for thirty days under the "Ten Regiment Bill." It rendezvoused at Jacksonville, Illinois, and was mustered into the service of the State for thirty days, on the 4th of May, 1861.

On the 25th of the same month it was mustered into the United States service for three years, by Captain Pitcher, U. S. A.

The regiment remained at Camp Duncan, Jacksonville, until the latter part of June, for instructions; then proceeded to Quincy, Illinois, and from thence to Missouri, July 5, where, in connection with the Sixteenth Illinois Infantry, it did good service in keeping down the rebellion.

The forces under Martin E. Green, were dispersed, and James Green, United States Senator, a fomentor of secession, was captured and paroled. The regiment left Rolla, Missouri, for Jefferson City, accompanying General Fremont on his memorable campaign to Springfield, Missouri, after General Price; then returned and went into winter quarters at Otterville.

In the month of February, 1862, the regiment was ordered to Fort Donalson, where it arrived the day subsequent to its surrender; was brigaded with the Fifteenth and Forty-sixth Illinois, and Twenty-fifth Indiana, and assigned to the Second brigade, Fourth division, under Brigadier General Stephen A. Hurlbut.

In the meantime, Colonel Palmer had been promoted, and Major Hall, Seventh Illinois cavalry, originally Captain of one of the companies, had been promoted to Colonel.

From Fort Donalson the regiment proceeded to Fort Henry, where it embarked on transports and proceeded up the Tennessee river to Pittsburg Landing.

In the sanguinary engagements of the 6th and 7th of April, when the regiment first smelt powder from the enemy, the loss in killed and wounded was fully one-half the command engaged. The colors which came out of this bloody conflict, with forty-two bullet holes through them, fully attest the gallantry of the command in the memorable struggle. In the grand charge on the enemy, of April 7th, which was the consummation of that splendid victory over the hosts of rebels, the Fourteenth Illinois was in the advance and led by Colonel Hall. In the official report of General Veach, commander of the brigade, to which the Fourteenth was attached, the following language is employed. "Colonel Hall, of the Fourteenth Illinois, led with his regiment that gallant charge on Monday evening, which drove the enemy beyond our lines and closed the struggle of that memorable day."

The regiment took an active part in the siege of Corinth. After the evacuation, it proceeded to Memphis, and thence to Boliver, Tennessee.

October 4, 1863, the Fourth Division, under General Hurlbut, was ordered to proceed to Corinth, as a "forlorn hope," to relieve the beleaguered garrison at that place; but the gallant Rosecrans, before Corinth was reached, had already severely punished the enemy, and the "forlorn hope" met the retreating rebels at the village of Metamora, on the Hatchie river. In the glorious victory that followed eight hours' hard fighting, the Fourteenth Illinois well sustained its reputation earned at Shiloh.

The regiment constituted a part of the right wing of Grant's army, in the march into Northern Mississippi, through Holly Springs, to Yaconee Patafa, under the immediate command of the lamented McPherson. VanDorn having recaptured Holly Springs, and General Sherman being unable to effect a dislodgment of the rebels from Vicksburg, Grant's army was obliged to retreat; and on January 18, 1863, the Fourteenth Illinois went into winter quarters, at La Fayette, Tennessee.

Early in the spring the command was ordered to Vicksburg, where it took part in the siege of that stronghold until its final fall, July 4, 1863. Also, accompanied the expedition to Jackson, Mississippi; taking part in the siege until its evacuation.

In August, proceeded to Natchez, and formed part of the force which marched across the great swamps of Northeastern Louisiana, to Hairsburg, on Wichita river, and captured Fort Beauregard, where, the spring before, the ram "Queen of the West" had been sunk. It accompanied General Sherman on his Meriden raid. After the return, a large portion re-enlisted as veterans,—though its time would have expired in a few months. Returning from the North, where it had been on veteran furlough, it formed a part of the army in the advance on Atlanta.

Here the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Illinois Veterans, ever together since the fall of 1862, sharers of each others' sorrows and joys, weary marches and honorably earned laurels, were consolidated into the "Fourteenth and Fifteenth Illinois Veteran Battalion."

The battalion was detailed to guard railroad communications at and near Ackworth, Georgia, a most important and dangerous duty, as it was the only route by which General Sherman could supply his immense army with subsistence, etc.

In the month of October, 1864, when the rebel General Hood made his demonstration against Sherman's rear, a large number of the battalion were killed and the major part of the balance were taken prisoners and sent to Andersonville prison. Those who escaped capture were mounted, and, on the grand march to the sea, acted as scouts, and were continually in the advance, being the first to drive the rebel pickets into Savannah, Georgia.

During the long and weary march through North and South Carolina, the battalion was on duty day and night, being constantly in the presence of the enemy, gaining notoriety as skirmishers. The battalion was the first to enter Cheraw, South Carolina, and Fayetteville, North Carolina, and also took part in the battle of Bentonville.

At Goldsborough, North Carolina, in the spring of 1865, the battalion organization was discontinued, a sufficient number of organized companies of recruits having arrived by way of New York and Morehead City, North Carolina, to fill up the two regiments, Colonel Hull again being assigned to the command of the Fourteenth.

After the capitulation of Johnson, the regiment marched to Washington, D. C., where, on the 24th of May, it took part in the grand review of Sherman's army. It afterwards proceeded by rail and river to Louisville, Kentucky, thence, by river, to Fort Leavenworth, Kansas; thence marched to Fort Kearney, Nebraska Territory, and back.

Mustered out at Fort Leavenworth, Kansas, September 16, 1865, arriving at Springfield, Illinois, September 22, 1865, where it received final payment and discharge.

The aggregate number of men who have belonged to this organization was one thousand nine hundred and eighty, and the aggregate mustered out at Fort Leavenworth was four hundred and eighty. During its four years and four months of arduous service, the regiment marched four thousand four hundred and ninety miles; traveled by rail, two thousand three hundred and thirty miles, and by river, four thousand four hundred and ninety miles, making an aggregate of eleven thousand six hundred and seventy miles.

Sangamon county was represented by men in Companies G H and I, the greater number being in Company G. Only one promotion made; Balger Grebe being promoted from private to Second Lieutenant.

HISTORICAL MEMORANDA—BY LIEUTENANT-GENERAL U. S. GRANT.

I was appointed Colonel of the Twenty-first Illinois Volunteer Infantry by Governor Richard Yates, some time early in the month of June, 1861, and assumed command of the regiment on the 16th of that month. The regiment was mustered into the service of the United States in the latter part of the same month.

Being ordered to rendezvous the regiment at Quincy, Illinois, I thought for the purpose of discipline and speedy efficiency for the field, it would be well to march the regiment across the country, instead of transporting by rail.

Accordingly, on the 3d of July, 1861, the march was commenced from Camp Yates, Springfield, Illinois, and continued until about three miles beyond the Illinois river, when dispatches were received, changing the destination of the regiment to Ironton, Missouri, and directing me to return to the river and take a steamer, which had been sent there for the purpose of transporting the regiment to St. Louis. The steamer failing to reach the point of embarkment, several days were here lost. In the meantime, a portion of the Sixteenth Illinois Infantry, under Colonel Smith, were reported surrounded by the enemy at a point on the Hannibal & St. Joseph railroad, west of Palmyra, and the Twenty-first was ordered to their relief.

Under these circumstances, expedition was necessary; accordingly, the march was abandoned, and the railroad was called into requisition.

Before the Twenty-first reached its new destination, the Sixteenth had extricated itself. The Twenty-first was then kept on duty on the line of the Hannibal & St. Joseph railroad for about two weeks, without, however, meeting an enemy or an incident worth relating. We did make one march, however, during that time from Salt river, Missouri, to Florida, Missouri, and returned in search of Tom Harris, who was reported in that neighborhood with a handful of rebels. It was impossible, however, to get nearer than a day's march of him.

From Salt river, the regiment went to Mexico, Missouri, where it remained for two weeks; thence to Ironton, Missouri, passing through St. Louis on the 7th of August, where I was assigned to duty as a Brigadier General, and turned over the command of the regiment to that gallant and Christian officer, Colonel Alexander, who afterwards yielded up his life, whilst nobly leading it in the battle of Chickamauga.

U. S. GRANT,

Lieutenant General.

The Seventh Congressional District Regiment was organized at Mattoon, Illinois, on the 9th of May, 1861. On the 15th of May, it was mustered into the State service for thirty days, by Captain U. S. Grant.

On the 28th of June, it was mustered into United States service for three years, by Captain Pitcher, U. S. A., with Captain U. S. Grant as Colonel. Colonel Grant was commissioned Brigadier General, August 6, 1861, and was succeeded by Lieutenant Colonel J. W. S. Alexander, who was killed, September 20, 1863, at Chickamauga. On the 4th of July, 1861, the regiment marched for Mosoure. On the 22d, arrived at Mexico, where it remained until August 6, when it proceeded by rail to Ironton, Missouri. October 20, marched from Ironton, and on the 21st participated in the battle of Fredricktown. Remained at Ironton until January 29, 1862. Marched with General Steele's expedition to Jacksonport, Arkansas, where it was ordered to Corinth, via Cape Girardeau. Arrived at Hamburg Landing, May 24, 1862. On the evacuation of Corinth, pursued the enemy from Farmington, Mississippi, to Booneville. Returning from the pursuit, it formed a part of an expedition to Holly Springs. On the 14th of August, 1862, was ordered to join General Buell's army, in East Tennessee. Marched via Eastport, Mississippi; Columbia, Tennessee; Florence, Alabama; Franklin, Murfreesboro and Nashville, Tennessee; and arrived at Louisville September 27, 1862. Engaged in the battle of Perryville, October 8, and Chaplin Hill. Company F, Captain David Blackburn, was the first in Perryville. From thence marched to Crab Tree Orchard and Bowling Green, Kentucky, and to Nashville, Tennessee.

When the army marched from Nashville, December 26, 1862, this regiment formed a part of the Second Brigade, First Division Twentieth Army Corps, and was in the skirmish at Knob Gap.

On December 30, in connection with Fifteenth Wisconsin, Thirty-eighth Illinois, and One Hundred-and-First Ohio, it had a severe engagement with the enemy near Murfreesboro, where it charged the famous Washington (rebel) Light Artillery, twelve Parrott guns, and succeeded in driving every man from the battery, when it was compelled to fall back by a division of rebel infantry. During the battle of Murfreesboro it was fiercely engaged, and did gallant duty, losing more men than any other regiment engaged.

The Twenty-first was with General Rosecrans' army from Murfreesboro to Chattanooga, and was engaged in a severe skirmish at Liberty Gap, June 25, 1863. Was engaged in the battle of Chickamauga, September 19th and 20th, where it lost two hundred and thirty-eight officers and men.

Colonel Alexander being killed, and Lieutenant Colonel McMackin being wounded, Captain C. K. Knight took command of the regiment.

After the battle of Chickamauga, the Twenty-first was attached to First Brigade, First Division, Fourth Army Corps, and remained at Bridgeport, Alabama, during October, November, and December, 1863.

Mustered out December 16, 1865, at San Antonio, Texas. Arrived at Camp Butler January 18, 1866, for final payment and discharge.

The Twenty-sixth Infantry, Illinois Volunteers, was mustered into the United States' service, with seven companies at Camp Butler, Illinois, August 31, 1861, and were ordered to Quincy, Illinois, for the protection of that place. Not having been armed, the regiment did general duty with hickory clubs.

During the autumn, the regiment did duty on the Hannibal & St. Joe Railroad, and were armed with old English Tower muskets—Colonel John Mason Loomis, commanding post at Hannibal.

Prior to January 1, 1862, three more companies were raised, completing the organization. February 19, 1862, left Hannibal, Missouri, for the South, stopping at Commerce, where the regiment was assigned to Brigadier General J. B. Plummer's brigade, Brigadier General Schuyler Hamilton's division, Major General John Pope's corps.

Arriving at New Madrid, March 3d, and were engaged in action there. Marched to Point Pleasant, and arriving on the 6th, engaged rebel gun boats, sharp shooters, and prevented the landing of the enemy.

Marched to intercept the flying enemy from Island No. 10, and assisted in capturing many prisoners.

After remaining some time at New Madrid, joined an expedition against Fort Pillow. Returning, proceeded up the Ohio and Tennessee rivers to Hamburg Landing. Took part in the siege of Corinth. May 8 and 9, were engaged at Farmington, the regiment losing five killed and thirty wounded. Lieutenant Colonel Charles H. Tinkham was among the wounded.

Colonel Loomis commanded brigade, and General Stanley the division. May 28, engaged the enemy one mile from Corinth, the regiment losing four killed and twenty-five wounded. Major Gilmore was wounded.

Company G, of the Twenty-sixth, was the first to enter Corinth on evacuation by enemy. Engaged in pursuit to Boonville, and returned to Clear Creek, four miles from Corinth. June 23, ordered to Danville, Mississippi, where it remained till August 18, 1861, at which time joined brigade commanded by Colonel R. C. Murphy (Eighth Wisconsin), and marched for Tusculum. Arrived 21st. September 8, with Forty-seventh and Twenty-sixth, Lieutenant Colonel Tinkham commanding. Marched to Clear creek.

September 18, marched for Iuka; 19th, were engaged with the enemy in a brigade commanded by Lieutenant Colonel J. A. Mower, of the Eleventh Missouri. Enemy evacuating in the night, it joined in pursuit, arriving at Corinth October 3, and participating in the battle of Corinth.

After the battle, followed the retreating enemy as far as Ripley, ten days afterward arriving again at Corinth, where it stayed until November 2. Marched, via Grand Junction, Holly Springs, and Lumpkins Mill, toward Tallahatchie river, the enemy being fortified on south side of river. Regiment was here detailed to guard a commissary train to Hudsonville, during the trip losing two men killed and two wounded, by guerrillas.

Ordered to Holly Springs for guard duty; thence to Oxford, Mississippi, where remained until December 20.

Ordered to Holly Springs, to prevent the capture of that place. On 21st, reached that place, enemy having fled. Remained here during the year, Colonel Loomis commanding the post, and Lieutenant Colonel Gilmore as chief of outposts.

In the beginning of the year 1863, the post at Holly Springs was broken up, and the army fell back to Lagrange, Tennessee, where the regiment was assigned to duty as provost guard, Colonel Loomis commanding the post. Here it remained until March 8th.

March 3, the regiment was brigaded with the Nineteenth Illinois, Twelfth and One Hundredth Indiana, Colonel Loomis, commanding.

March 8th, the brigade marched from Lagrange to Collierville, Tennessee, where they remained three months, engaged in fortifying the place and defending the railroad against guerrillas and bushwhackers.

June 7th, left Collierville for Memphis. The following day they embarked for Harnes' Bluff. The regiment subsequently went into camp at Oak Ridge, where it remained until after the fall of Vicksburg.

On the afternoon of July 4th, started in pursuit of the retreating forces of General Johnson. The siege of Jackson was marked by severe skirmishing, in one of which Captain James A. Dugget, of Company C, was instantly killed by a round shot through the breast, and a number of men were killed and wounded. About the 22d of July, began the march back to Vicksburg, and when the troops crossed Black river they went into camp for the summer. September 28, the camp was broken up and the regiment marched into Vicksburg and there embarked for Memphis, where it arrived on the 7th of October.

Here a few days was given for the purpose of outfitting the men, preparatory for the long march across the country from Memphis to Chattanooga, to relieve the besieged Army of the Cumberland.

The march began at 8 a. m., October 11th. Arrived at Bridgeport, November 15th, and on the 24th and 25th, took an active part in the battle of Mission Ridge, losing in killed and wounded, one hundred and one officers and men. Among the officers severely wounded were, Lieutenant Colonel Gillmore, Captain James P. Davis, company B, Adjutant Edward A. Tucker, and Lieutenant William Polk, company B.

The next morning started before daylight in pursuit of the defeated and flying enemy, followed them to Ringold, Georgia; burnt the bridges and destroyed the railroad; then returned to make the march of two hundred miles, without supplies, cooking utensils, camp equipments or change of clothing, to the relief of General Bunsides, at Knoxville. Returned to Bridgeport in the latter part of December; were re-clothed, paid off, and marched to Scottsboro, Alabama, and went into winter quarters.

On the 1st of January, 1864, there were five hundred and fifteen men present for duty, of whom four hundred and sixty-three re-enlisted as veterans. Of sixty-one men present in company K, sixty re-enlisted. January 12, started home on veteran furlough. At the expiration of furlough, returned to the field with ranks well filled with recruits. Arrived at Scotsboro' March 3, and remained until May 1, when it started on the great Atlantic campaign. The regiment was actively engaged in all the marches, skirmishes and battles which finally resulted in the capture of Atlanta. On the 3d of August, a detail of nine hundred men was made from the division to charge the enemy's skirmish line. The charge was to be made over an old field, covered with high grass, a distance of about four hundred yards. When the signal was given, the men started on a keen run for the rebel works. John H. Wilson, of company D, which was raised in Sangamon county, a stout, active fellow, out-ran the rest, and soon found himself in front of a rebel pit, which had been concealed by the tall grass, filled with seventeen men and a commissioned officer. He drew up his musket, and told them "to fight or run, and that blamed quick." All surrendered except the officer, who started to run, when Wilson shot him. It was laughable to see "Buck," as he was called, marching back with his seventeen prisoners. By order of General Logan, he retained the officer's sword and a fine Whitney rifle, found in the pit, and now has them at home as mementoes of his gallantry. After the fall of Atlanta most of the old officers were mustered out at the expiration of their term of service. Only two of the original officers remained, one of whom, Captain Ira J. Bloomfield, company K, was made Colonel of the regiment.

About the same time, the Fourth Division, Fifteenth Army Corps, was broken up, and the regiment was transferred to the First Division of the same corps, with which it remained until the close of the war. The regiment did some hard marching; following Hood upward Chattanooga, and off into Northern Alabama; thence returned to Atlanta; were paid and re-clothed, preparatory to "marching through Georgia."

The Twenty-sixth was engaged in the action of Forts Milledgeville, siege of Savannah and capture of Fort McAlister. A short time after the fall of Savannah, the regiment was ordered to Beaufort, South Carolina, and remained on duty there and at Port Royal Ferry, until the commencement of the northward march through the Carolinas. Were among the first regiments into Columbia, and were hotly engaged in the battle of Bentonville. Here the regiment was ordered to carry the bridge, across Mill creek, which was strongly guarded by the enemy. The regiment charged, and carried it, but lost a number of good men. Sergeant Smith, of Company K, color-bearer, was charging, at the head of the column, across the bridge, and was shot, the colors falling into the stream. The enemy rushed forward to secure them, but Lieutenant Webster, with Company E, charged, drove them back, and saved the colors. Colonel Bloomfield had his horse shot under him, and narrowly escaped himself. Remained at Goldsboro, North Carolina, a few days; and April 10, began the march against Raleigh. Left Raleigh, May 1, for Washington, via Richmond. Participated in the grand review at Washington. Transported by rail to Parkersburg, Virginia; thence by boat to Louisville, Kentucky, where it remained in camp until July 20, 1865, when it was mustered out of service and started for Springfield, Illinois, for final payment and discharge. July 28, the regiment was paid off and disbanded.

The regiment had marched during its four years of service, six thousand nine hundred and thirty-one miles; fought twenty-eight hard battles, besides innumerable skirmishes. They were permitted by the orders of the commanding Generals to place upon their banner, "New Madrid," "Island No. 10," "Farmington," "Siege of Corinth," "Iuka," "Corinth, 3d and 4th October, 1862," "Holly Springs," "Vicksburg," "Jackson, Miss.," "Mission Ridge," "Resacca," "Kenesaw," "Ezra Church," "Atlanta," "Jonesboro," "Griswoldville," "McAlister," "Savannah," "Columbia," "Bentonville."

HISTORY OF TWENTY-NINTH INFANTRY.

The Twenty-ninth Illinois Volunteers was mustered into the United States service at Camp Butler, Illinois, August 19, 1861, by Captain T. G. Pitcher, U. S. A., and was commanded by Colonel James S. Reardon, and was assigned to the brigade of Brigadier General John A. McClernand.

Early in September it was ordered to Cairo. In October, formed a part of an expedition under the command of Colonel R. J. Oglesby, to Bloom, Missouri. In January, 1862, regiment was assigned to the brigade of Colonel R. J. Oglesby, (Eighth, Eighteenth, Twenty-ninth, Thirtieth and Thirty-first Illinois), and division Brigadier General McClernand. This command was the first to enter Fort Henry after its evacuation.

In the battle of Fort Donelson, the brigade formed the extreme right of the line of investment, meeting the enemy first and fighting them longer than any other portion of the army. Regiment lost one hundred men killed, of which thirty were killed on the field.

March 1, 1862, regiment was assigned to Colonel L. F. Ross' Brigade, composed of the Seventeenth, Twenty-ninth, Forty-third and Forty-ninth Illinois Volunteers, and proceeded to Savannah, Tennessee. Twentieth of March, proceeded to Pittsburg Landing. April 1st, Captain E. M. Ferrill was promoted to Lieutenant Colonel vice Dunlap, resigned. The regiment bore a most honorable part in the battle of Shiloh, April 6 and 7, 1862. With an effective strength of four hundred men, it lost one hundred killed and wounded.

April 15, 1862, Major M. Brayman was promoted Colonel vice Reardon, resigned. Regiment was constantly engaged during the siege of Corinth, May, 1862. June 6, was assigned to brigade of Colonel C. C. Marsh, composed of the Eleventh, Twenty-ninth, Thirtieth and Thirty-first Illinois, and during the month made frequent incursions into West Tennessee. October 1, sent to reinforce General Rosencrans at Corinth. Arriving too late for the battle, formed to advance of the advance of pursuit to Ripley, Mississippi, and returned to Jackson.

September, 25, Lieutenant Colonel C. M. Ferrill, promoted Colonel vice M. Brayman, promoted Brigadier General.

Adjutant Loren Kent, promoted Lieutenant Colonel.

December 1, regiment proceeded to rear of General Grant's army, at Cold Water, Mississippi, and shortly afterwards went into camp at Holly Springs. On 18th Lieutenant Colonel Kent, with two companies (D and K.) went to Jackson, Tennessee, to protect that place.

December 20, Colonel R. C. Murphy, of the Eighth Wisconsin Volunteers, surrendered Holly Springs to rebel General Van Dorn, in a most cowardly and disgraceful manner. Eight companies of the regiment were paroled and sent to Benton Barracks. The camp and garrison equipment and books and records of the Twentyninth were destroyed.

The eight paroled companies were kept at Benton Barracks until July, 1863, when they were exchanged and returned to duty. The two remaining companies were assigned to the Western Navy in February, 1863, where they served with distinction during the siege of Vicksburg, losing one officer and several men in running the batteries at Vicksburg and Grand Gulf.

October 16, 1863, Lieutenant Colonel Kent was relieved, at his own request, as Provost Marshal General of the Army of the Tennessee, and assumed command of his regiment, which was assigned to General Logan's Division of the Seventeenth Army Corps.

October 19, the One Hundred and Thirty-first Illinois volunteers was consolidated with the Twentyninth, and Lieutenant Colonel Kent promoted Colonel, vice Colonel Ferrell, resigned.

December 1, 1863, moved to Natchez, and remained on garrison duty. In January, 1864, the regiment re-enlisted, and was mustered as veterans; and July 19, received veterans' furloughs from Springfield, Illinois.

Moved from Springfield, August 22, 1864, and arrived at Natchez the last of the month, and remained until October, then moved to the mouth of White river, having been assigned to Third brigade reserve corps, Military Division of West Mississippi. A short time afterward was ordered to Memphis, and thence to Paducah, arriving October 20, 1864, for protection of Kentucky from enemy's cavalry, which appeared on the border. November 26, embarked for Memphis, camping in that city November 29. December 21, marched with expedition into the interior of Tennessee.

Hard marching, cold weather, and bad roads. Returned December 31. January 1, 1865, embarked for New Orleans. Camped above the city at Kenner on the 5th.

February 11, assigned to Third Brigade, First Division, Thirteenth Army Corps, Colonel Kent commanding brigade, and Lieutenant Colonel J. A. Callicott commanding regiment. Embarked for Mobile. Landed at Dauphin Island on 15th February. March 17, embarked for Fort Morgan, and landing, bivouacked on the beach. During eight succeeding days, were toiling over almost impassable roads to Spanish Fort, arriving on the 26th. Took an active part in the siege. Moved to Fort Blakely April 2, and was engaged in the whole siege, supporting the charge made by our Second brigade on the 9th, which resulted in the capture of the entire rebel army. Regiment lost during the campaign twenty-six men killed and wounded.

April 10, marched for Mobile. Arrived on the 12th, and remained in camp. June 26, embarked on steamship Scott for Texas. Arrived off Galveston July 1. The sea being quite rough, two or three days were required to disembark. Soon after were ordered to Millican, Texas, on Texas Central Railroad; arriving on the 9th.

July 26, Regimental Headquarters moved to Hempstead; two companies remaining at Millican, two at Brenham, and one at Beaumont.

The regiment being in Provisional Division Department of Texas, Major General F. Steele commanding, the regiment reported to Major General J. A. Mower, commanding Eastern District of Texas, until November 6, 1865, when it was mustered out of the United States service. B. W. Ladd, Ninety-eighth Ohio and A. C. M.

Placed en route for the State, November 8, and arrived 26th, receiving final pay and discharge November 28, 1865.

MEMORANDA OF SEVENTY-THIRD REGIMENT.

The regiment was organized at Camp Butler, Illinois, in August, 1862, and immediately became part of General Buell's army. Fought nobly at Perryville; finished under General Thomas at Nashville. The Seventy-third Illinois Volunteer Infantry was in every battle fought by the Army of the Cumberland from October, 1862, until the rout of General Hood's army, at Nashville, and the winding up of the whole matter.

The dead of this regiment are found at Perryville, Murfreesboro, Chickamauga, Mission Ridge, away in East Tennessee, and then in the succession of battles from Chattanooga to the fall of Atlanta. When Sherman pushed down south, the Seventy-third remained with General Thomas. It formed a part of Opendyke's brigade at Franklin, which saved the day and gave him his star, and lost its last man killed in driving Hood's army from Nashville. It has more than once been complimented by its generals. It lost heavily in Murfreesboro, Chickamauga, Mission Ridge and Franklin. It had two Majors and two Adjutants killed and nearly every officer of the regiment wounded at some one time—several of them many times. It left the State one of the largest and returned one of the smallest regiments.

Its officers and men, and especially the men, have never been surpassed for bravery, endurance and devotion to the country. Probably two-thirds of the organization wasted away, either by disease, death or battles during the three years' service.

The One Hundred and Fourteenth Regiment, Illinois Volunteer Infantry, was organized in the months of July and August, and mustered into the United States' service at Camp Butler, Illinois, September 18, 1862.

Companies A and D were from Cass county, Companies B, C, E, G, H and I from Sangamon county, Companies F and K from Menard county. The regiment left Camp Butler for Memphis, Tennessee, November 8, 1862, arriving November 16th, and remained there on picket duty until November 26th. It then started on the Tallahatchie campaign, being attached to the First Brigade of Brigadier General Luman's Division. Arrived at College Hill, Mississippi, December 4th, where it remained until December 23d. Then left for Jackson, Tennessee, which was threatened by the rebel General Forrest, where it arrived after two weeks' very hard marching, on January 8, 1863, and remained, doing picket duty, until February 9th. It then returned to Memphis, doing guard duty on the Memphis & Charleston railroad.

On March 17, the regiment left Memphis on transports, bound down the river. Ordered to Young's Point, Louisiana, where it arrived April 2, and was assigned to the First Brigade, First Division, Fifteenth Army Corps, commanded by Major General W. T. Sherman, and ordered into camp at Duckport, Louisiana.

On the 2d of May, the regiment left for Vicksburg, and on May 14, was engaged in the battle of Jackson, Mississippi. Loss, five men killed and wounded.

Arrived in the rear of Vicksburg May 18, and participated in the siege; loss, twenty men killed and wounded. On the surrender of Vicksburg, the regiment was ordered to move against the rebel General Joe Johnston, who retreated to Jackson, Mississippi, during the siege of which place the loss of the regiment in killed and wounded was seven men. When Johnston evacuated Vicksburg, they followed him as far as Brandon, and then returned to Camp Sherman, near Vicksburg; and remained there doing picket duty until September 3. While in camp there, Colonel Judy resigned, and was succeeded in command by Lieutenant Colonel King.

The regiment was then ordered to Oak Ridge, Mississippi, and while doing picket duty there, had several skirmishes with guerrillas. Lieutenant McClure, Company A, was killed and two men captured while on duty. While there the regiment participated in two scouts.

About the 20th of November, left on transports for Memphis, and on the 26th of November, went on provost duty there.

February 5, 1864, regiment left on a scout, and engaged the enemy at Wyatt, Mississippi; enabling the cavalry under General W. S. Smith to cross the Tallahatchie river above, at New Albany. Then returned to Memphis, and went again on provost duty.

April 20, went on another scout, under General Sturgis. After a couple of weeks' hard marching returned to Memphis, and was put on picket duty.

June 1, went out again under General Sturgis, and engaged the enemy under Generals Forrest

*Mr. Mallory returned his commission, and Lee, at Guntown, Mississippi. The action commenced early in the afternoon between the enemy and the advance cavalry.

The infantry was immediately hurried forward, at more than double quick, for about three miles, and the day being one of excessive heat, numbers fell from the ranks from fatigue and sunstroke.

Almost exhausted, the troops were pushed into the fight, and, after a severe engagement of five or six hours, the lines were everywhere repulsed, and commenced falling back. The One Hundred and Fourteenth remained as rear guard, assisting in holding the enemy in check during the whole of the first night's retreat.

The regiment lost out of three hundred and ninety-five men, two hundred and five in killed, wounded and missing.

Assistant Surgeon A. S. French was here killed, while nobly performing the duties of his position. Among the wounded were Adjutant Henry L. Vanhoff, Captain J. M. Johnson of Company A, and Lieutenant T. S. Berry of Company D; Lieutenants E. P. Strickland and J. D. Zergler of company D, captured.

The regiment again fell back to Memphis, and after two weeks' of picket duty, left again under General A. J. Smith, for Tupelo, Mississippi.

On July 13, the brigade to which the regiment was attached was surprised by the enemy, near Harrisville, Mississippi, and, after a sharp engagement, the rebels were repulsed and driven back, the One Hundred and Fourteenth receiving the thanks of the brigade commander, on the field, for the gallant and effective charge made by it. On the next morning the fight was renewed, the rebels being repulsed in repeated charges made during the day and succeeding night. The next day—the object of the expedition having been accomplished—the troops started back to Memphis, and, on going into camp in the evening, were attacked by the rebels, under General Forrest.

The regiment participated in the charge by which the enemy was driven from the field. Captain Berry, of Company D, who was commanding the regiment, and Lieutenant Chadsey, commanding Company H, were quite severely wounded.

The regiment lost in these engagements, in killed and wounded, forty men. Returning to Memphis, the regiment remained there until August, when it went out under General A. J. Smith on another expedition into Mississippi, Major J. M. McLean commanding (Lieutenant Colonel King being sick), and upon its return to Memphis was sent, under General Joseph Mower, to report to General Steel at Duvall's Bluff, Arkansas.

Went into camp at Brownsville, Arkansas, leaving there under General Price; marched to Cape Girardeau, Missouri, in seventeen days, on ten days' rations, arriving October 6th. It then embarked on transports for Jefferson City, Missouri, and disembarking, under command of Major McLean (having left Lieutenant Colonel King sick at St. Louis), was transported by rail to Otterville. Then continued the pursuit by long and tedious marches to Kansas City, at which point was ordered to St. Louis, arriving there November 15th. The regiment was then ordered to Nashville, Tennessee, and was engaged in the battles of the 15th and 16th of December, making several charges during the engagements. The One Hundred and Fourteenth was attached to McMillan's Brigade, McArthur's Division of General A. J. Smith's Corps, which brigade was specially complimented in General Thomas' report to the war department, for charging and capturing the salient point of the enemy's line.

In making this charge a rebel battery was captured, which Captain John M. Johnson with a few men of the regiment, and some involuntary assistance compelled from some captured rebels, immediately brought to bear upon the retreating ranks of the enemy, aiding materially in their disorder and capture.

The loss of the regiment was fifteen men in killed and wounded—Captain J. M. Johnson, of Company A, commanding regiment, being slightly wounded. The regiment was engaged in the pursuit of Hood's forces as far as Pulaski, Tennessee.

It then went by transports from Clifton, Tennessee, to Eastport, Mississippi, and was detached at that place as pontooneers of Sixteenth Army Corps. Left Eastport on transports February 9, 1865, for New Orleans, Louisiana, arriving there February 22.

On March 23, embarked on steamer, at Lake Ponchartrain, for Spanish Fort, Alabama, and was engaged during the siege of Spanish Fort.

Lieutenant Colonel King having resigned, and Major McLean having died, Captain S. N. Shoup, of Company E, here received a commission as Lieutenant Colonel, and Captain J. M. Johnson, of Company A, as Major.

On the night of the 13th of April the regiment was to attack Forts Tracy and Huger, situated in Mobile Bay. The movement was made in pontoon boats, and on arriving at the forts, they were found to have been just evacuated.

A. T. D. Buckman

After the surrender of Mobile, the regiment marched to Montgomery, Ala.; arriving April 24, and bridging the Alabama river with pontoons, and remained on duty at the bridge, when it was ordered to Vicksburg, Mississippi, for muster-out. The regiment was mustered out of the United States service August 3, 1865.

Arrived at Camp Butler, Illinois, August 7, and received final payment and discharge August 15, 1865.

The Third Regiment of Cavalry was organized at Camp Butler, Illinois, by Colonel E. A. Carr, in August, 1861.

The regiment moved to St. Louis, Missouri, September 25th. October 1st, moved up the Missouri river to Jefferson City, and from thence marched to Warsaw, arriving October 11th.

On the 23d, marched toward Springfield, Missouri, in Colonel Carr's Brigade, Brigadier General Asboth's Division. On November 2d, General Hunter took command of the Army. On November 13th, the First and Second Battalions moved with the army on Rolla, Missouri. The Third Battalion, Major Ruggles commanding, remained with Siegel's Division, and was the last to leave Springfield.

Arriving at Rolla, November 19th, the regiment remained until December 29th, when it moved in the advance of General Curtis' Army for the Southwest. On February 11th, the regiment in Carr's Division moved to Marshfield, and on the 13th to near Springfield, where cavalry fought the first engagement and won the first victory of Curtis' campaign.

On February 14, 1862, occupied Springfield, Missouri. On the 15th, came up with Price's retreating army, at Crane creek, capturing some prisoners. On 18th, at Sugar creek, Arkansas, the Third Battalion participated in a cavalry charge, routing the enemy. On the 20th, the Second Battalion marched to Cross Hollows, and on March 5th fell back to Pea Ridge. On the 6th, the First and Third Battalions marched with Colonel Vandever's Brigade from Huntsville, forty-eight miles.

On the 7th, the First and Third Battalions in Dodge's Brigade, and the Second in Vandever's were engaged all day, losing ten killed and forty wounded.

March 19th, moved to Keetsville. Lieutenant Colonel McCrillis and Major Hubbard arrived and went on duty. April 10th, arrived at Forsyth, and on 9th moved to West Plains, and May 1st started for Batesville, arriving on 3d.

On May 14, 1862, moved to Little Red river. On 25th, while crossing White river, Captain McLelland and five men were drowned. On June 4, the regiment fell back to Fairview.

On the 7th, Captain Sparks, with sixty-six men, was surrounded by three hundred of the enemy's cavalry, and cut his way out, losing four wounded and four prisoners.

Returned to Batesville on the 11th. June 11, marched to Jacksonport. July 5, moved, with the army, for Helena, where it arrived on the 15th, and went into camp. During the stay at this point, detachments of the regiment were sent on scouts and expeditions to different places, including Captain Kirkbridge's raid to St. Francis river, and five companies with General Hovey's raid to Grenada, Mississippi.

December 23, 1862, six companies, B, C, D, H, I and L, Captain Kirkbridge commanding, embarked for Vicksburg, under Major General W. T. Sherman.

Companies E and G were on duty with Gen. Carr, at St. Louis. Companies A, K, F and M, Captain Carnahan commanding, reported to Brigadier General Steele, at the mouth of the Yazoo river.

At Chickasaw Bayou, the regiment was detailed as pickets and escorts for commanding generals, and did good service in the disastrous attack on Vicksburg. Companies A, K, L and M, being the last to embark after battle.

In the Spring of 1863, Colonel McCrillis, with a battalion, moved to Memphis, leaving Company L, as escort to Major General McClelland and Captain Carnahan, with Companies A, G, K and E, with Brigadier General P. J. Osterhaus and the Thirteenth Corps. This battalion took part in the battles of Port Gibson, Champion Hills, Black River Bridge, and the siege of Vicksburg.

August 16, 1863, reporting to Major General N. P. Banks, was assigned to Brigadier General Lee's Cavalry Division, and took part in the Western Louisiana campaign, and at Vermilionville, Opelousas and Carrion Crow Bayou.

In December, 1864, Major O'Connor took command of the battalion, and it moved to Port Hudson, and thence to Memphis, Tennessee, rejoining the regiment. The regiment had meantime participated in the battles of Tupelo, Okolona and Guntown, Mississippi.

During the month of July, a large portion of the regiment re-enlisted as veterans. The non-veterans under Major O'Connor were stationed as garrison at Germantown, Tennessee. In July, 1864, a portion of the regiment, Captain Carnahan commanding, went on a scout through western Kentucky. August 24, the non-veterans having been mustered out, the veterans were consolidated into a battalion of six companies, and Captain Carnahan promoted to Lieutenant Colonel.

On September 27, they left Memphis and crossed the Tennessee at Clifton, and confronted Hood's army. Fell back skirmishing, and took part in the battles of Lawrenceburg, Spring Hill, Campbellville, and Franklin.

On December 15, in the First Brigade, Fifth Division, Brigadier General Hatch commanding, was on the right of the army when it turned the enemy's left, and was first in the enemy's works.

In January, 1865, the enemy having been driven across the Tennessee, the cavalry under General Wilson camped at Gravelly Springs, Alabama, and in February moved to Eastport.

In May, moved to St. Louis, Missouri, and thence to St. Paul, Minnesota, reporting to Major General Curtis.

On July 4, started on an Indian expedition over the plains of Minnesota and Dakota—north to the British lines, and south and west to Devil's Lake and Fort Bartholet—and returned to Fort Snelling, October 1. Arrived at Springfield, Illinois, October 13, 1865, and was mustered out of service.

The promotions from Sangamon county were as follows: Lafayette McCrillis, Lieutenant Colonel to Colonel; Jesse W. Bice, Sergeant to First Lieutenant, Captain and Major; Joshua Tuthill, Second to First Lieutenant; Harrison L. Bruce, Sergeant to Second and to First Lieutenant; James W. Kincaid, Sergeant to Second Lieutenant.

This battery was organized at Camp Butler, Illinois, by Captain Thomas F. Vaughn, and was known as the "Springfield Light Artillery." It was mustered in August 21, 1862.

November 1, moved to Columbus, Kentucky, and on the 8th, to Bolivar, Tennessee. December 18, moved to Jackson with the command of Brigadier General M. Brayman. Was engaged in several expeditions from Jackson during the winter. On June 6, 1863, left Bolivar, and was stationed on the Memphis & Charleston railroad—one section at Moscow, Lieutenant Thomas commanding; one at Germantown, Lieutenant Stillings commanding, and one at Collierville, Lieutenant Colby commanding.

On June 20th, the battery was united, and assigned to Second Brigade, First Division, Sixteenth Army Corps, Colonel James M. True commanding brigade, and started for Little Rock, Arkansas, and participated in its capture September 10, 1863.

One section of the battery, Lieutenant Colby commanding, was ordered to Lewisburg, where it remained until March 16, 1864. The battery was then assigned to the Second Brigade, First Division, Seventh Army Corps.

It then moved with General Steele's expedition to Camden, Arkansas, participating in the several skirmishes of the campaign, and the battles of Prairie D'Arm and at Jenkin's Ferry, when the battery, being with the rear guard, at midnight, repelled a cavalry charge with grape and canister.

Returned to Little Rock May 3, 1864, and remained until ordered to Springfield, Illinois. Was mustered out June 30, 1865.

TRANSFER OF THE BATTLE FLAGS.

When the boys came marching home they brought with them their war-worn battle flags, and deposited them in the State Arsenal. When the new State House was built, a room was prepared as a memorial hall, in which were to be deposited the flags and such trophies that were captured or collected during the war.

A grand re-union of the boys in blue was made the occasion for the transfer of the flags and trophies. Grand preparations were made and a programme of ceremonies was arranged, and Thursday, May 23, 1878, was appointed the day in which the transfer would be made. Thousands of boys in blue and citizens were upon the street at an early hour. The Illinois National Guards and the Veterans were formed in line. Shortly after noon the column moved, headed by the Marshal-in-Chief, Major General John A. McClelland, and his aides. Then came the Second Brigade I. N. G., as escort, with Brigadier General Reece and his staff; the brigade being composed of the Fifth Regiment, Colonel J. H. Barkley, commanding, and companies above noted of other regiments, and a section of Captain Mack's Battery, another section being engaged firing a National salute.

The Second Division, General John McConnell, Marshal, was composed of representatives of the First to the Seventeenth Cavalry, and presented a fine appearance. Besides the division commander and staff, there were sixty-four cavalymen in line.

The Third Division (artillery) was commanded by General Thomas S. Mather, who, with his aides and command, marched in line. They were representatives of the First and Second Regiments, Vaughn's, Henshaw's, the Mercantile, and the Board of Trade Batteries and the Artillery Brigade. Following came the surviving members of Governor Yates' War Administration and the orators of the day, in carriages. After the Fifth Regiment band, came the First and largest division, commanded by Major General John M. Palmer, with General Richard Rowett and other prominent military officers as aides.

J. G. Love

The Infantry division included numerous representatives from every Illinois regiment, except the One Hundred and Third. The men marched with the old time military "swing." In the line, and noticeable, was a one-legged veteran, John T. Sergeant of the Thirty-second, whose other leg was left on the battle field at Shiloh. He, with a cripple in the Artillery Division, attracted more than ordinary attention on the line of march. The infantry, exclusive of division and staff officers, numbered seven hundred and seventy-four men, and there were also in line thirty-two veterans of the Twenty-ninth United States Infantry, colored.

Colonel Dudley Wickersham commanded the next division, which was composed of eighteen veterans of the Mexican war, twenty-seven of the Black Hawk and Winnebago wars, and twenty-seven veterans of other States, among the number a Massachusetts officer, who had served on General Benjamin F. Butler's staff.

The column moved according to the order of march previously announced. Along the line there was waving of handkerchiefs from the windows of private residences, and every demonstration of pleasure in the presence of the veterans. In passing Ex-Mayor Jayne's residence, where a handsome portrait of Governor Yates was conspicuously displayed and decorated, there were cheers all along the line. The procession then moved south and halted at the State Arsenal, where the old battle flags were delivered to the veterans, and many of them receiving the colors, were those who had borne them amid the carnage of battle.

While the flags were being delivered, the bands played the Star Spangled Banner and other national airs, and there was much enthusiasm, which a heavy rain shower that suddenly set in did not dampen. From the Arsenal, the procession moved south on Fifth street, and turning to Eighth, the old Lincoln home was passed, amid cheers all along the line. Turning west again, the column passed through the Executive Mansion grounds, Governor Callom and his staff reviewing the same from the steps. The procession then moved direct to the State House. The Artillery Division had received a recruit by the way, in the person of Master Tingley Wood, Jr., who wore a small, but regulation, heavy artillery uniform.

Upon arrival at the Capitol, when the Governor and staff, with General A. C. Ducat and staff, reviewed the troops, from the east corridor steps, the veterans formed en masse, "bunching colors," in front of the principal entrance, and were surrounded by the Illinois National Guard. The colors being massed, Chief Marshal McClelland made his report to the Governor, in the following eloquent remarks:

"GOVERNOR:—As Marshal of the day, I have the honor to report to your Excellency that, agreeable to arrangement, I have brought the treasured flags and trophies, lately lodged in the public arsenal, to this place. It remains for the Adjutant General of the State, formally and officially, to present them to your Excellency, for such order for their final disposition as your Excellency may be pleased to make. This said, I may be permitted to add that, in the part assigned to me on this occasion, I have had the hearty co-operation of a body of the veterans of the several wars, and of a portion of the organized militia, who attend the veterans as an honorary escort. Honor to both! While the militia, by their soldierly bearing, attest the signal zeal applied by your Excellency to foster the martial spirit of Illinoisans, the veterans, on their part, afford an expressive memorial of duty, victoriously performed in the times that tried men's souls. It is true, some of them are maimed of an arm, or a leg, or an eye; that some of them are wrinkled by age and the wear and tear of long and arduous campaigns, yet they are here once more, to lift their loving and moistened eyes upon the tattered ensigns which they undauntedly upheld amid the fire and thunder of siege and battle. Alas! many of their former comrades are absent. Where are they? Silence answers: they are dead! Let us pause to dwell for a moment upon the memories of at least a few of these. Foremost of this revered list is Abraham Lincoln, variously the poor and friendless boy, the genial companion, the able lawyer and dialectician, the wary statesman, the patriotic President, the honored Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States. Jackson, "the military," one of his predecessors, had aforetime suppressed the seed of disunion, taking the specious form of nullification, by the threat of defiance; but, in later and more disorderly times, something more was required to cut off this second growth. Lincoln, the man of peace and gentleness, was equal, nay, superior to the emergency. With one hand he scattered the swarming assailants of the Union; with the other, he raised up an enslaved race to freedom and equality before the law. Thus, at the same time performing a double act of salvation, national and individual, unsurpassed in the annals of man. His sentiments were in accord with his deeds. He taught the doctrine of the broadest democracy: that ours was 'a government of the people, by the people, for the people.'

"He exemplified the broadest precepts of humanity, 'Charity for all; malice toward none.' His tragic martyrdom struck the Nation dumb, while it completed the pathos of his life and character. Illustrious man! his name will ring through the coming ages as one of the noblest of liberators and benefactors.

"Another of the worthy dead is Richard Yates, a remarkable man. To portray his character is a difficult, if not an impossible task. It was a mosaic; its shades set out its brighter hues in striking and lustrous relief. He was a man to be judged by his own standard. He was chivalrous and honorable; impulsive and generous; ardent and imaginative, ambitious and patriotic. Viewing everything from an elevation, he clothed it with the classic beauty of his own ideals. His eloquence was as the harp in-laid with gems, and strung with strands of gold to the softest or wildest melody. At times it swayed the Senate; at times it stirred or stilled the wondering multitude. Executive vigor and determination won for him the title of the great War Governor of Illinois. His virtues noticed, his infirmities are not denied. He had his faults, but they were the excess and reaction of an excitable and impressionable nature; of a preternatural exultation and perturbation of mind and sense, born of a stormy period of conflicting ideas, sentiments and opinions. It was of him like the great bard of Avon sung, 'A rarer spirit never did steer humanity; but you Gods, you will give us faults to make us mortals.'

"Wallace, Ransom, Raith, Mudd, Schwartz and a host of others are also dead. Braver and truer men never lived. Not a few of us here have seen them kindled with the intoxicating transport of the conflict; have seen them mount the deadly breach, deliver and resist the head-long onset and conquer, when all was upon the hazard. No more shall we receive and return soldierly congratulations. No more shall we hear them, with laughing jest, recount their desperate encounters and hairbreadth escapes. No more shall we see them, until we have passed that bourne from which no traveler returns. Our tears bedew their graves, which are strewn with the garlands of our afflictions. The triumph of their country shall be indistinct yet eloquent memorials to future generations. War over, let the bitterness which engendered it pass away forever. Peace returned, let all our paths be now the paths of peace. Let all our councils, North and South, East and West, everywhere through our broad land, which extends from ocean to ocean, be the counsels of accord, fraternity and unity."

Adjutant General Hilliard followed briefly in formal presentation of the flags, and the Governor responded with the following address, being frequently interrupted by applause:

"General and Soldiers of Illinois and of the Union: It gives me great pleasure to address you for a few minutes on this interesting occasion. I have not words to express to you the feelings of my heart as I stand before you. As you have said you are here in response to orders and invitations, bringing with you those price-less battle flags, which you have carried before on many a bloody battle field, and clung to in victory and defeat.

"I recognize among you men who, as soldiers, served the country in the early history of our State, in the Black Hawk war, clearing the way in this garden region of the West for the civilization which followed, and which we now enjoy. The colors you carried there have decayed and gone. I see before me soldiers who were in the Mexican war, who volunteered to defend our National honor. Your flags and banners, too, are gone. The numbers of patriotic men who served the country in the wars with the Indians and with Mexico, are comparatively few. Your ranks are thinned out in the march of time, and in a few more years your patriotic record alone will be left to tell the story of your devotion to your country. It will not be long before the men who fought by the side of Hardin, Harris, Baker, Bissell, and Shields on the field of Buena Vista, all of whom were as brave and patriotic men as ever stepped to the music of the Union, and all but the last of whom have long since rendered their account to the great Ruler of men and nations, and the last of whom is now a living example of courage, energy, and patriotism, will pass away, and history will take their places, to tell the generations to come what they did in response to their country's call. I see before me not a few, but thousands of citizen soldiers, who were in the last great war—men who fought for the integrity of the Union against a causeless and wicked rebellion. You come here to-day, carrying with you your old flags and banners. Your presence as old soldiers speaks louder and stronger to the people of the State and Nation than words. Volumes would not contain all your presence implies. About thirteen years ago you were returning home after years of struggle with the enemy. The ranks of your companies and regiments were depleted. You came back to your State, whose honor and glory you so nobly sustained, tired, worn out, and sick, yet with buoyant hearts, because you were coming home to your families and friends with victory inscribed on your banners and the integrity of our grand old Union established. You had these old flags with you then. As now, they were tattered and torn—blood-stained—some of them nearly shot away. Many of them had been presented to you by your wives, sisters, and friends when you started to the war. You brought them back, and as one regiment after another came home and was mustered out, you placed those colors in the old arsenal in charge of Adjutant-General Haynie, a gallant soldier, now gone to his long home, where they have remained until to-day.

"The Constitution and laws of our State require that the military records, banners and relics of the State shall be preserved as an enduring memorial of the patriotism and valor of Illinois. In obedience to these provisions, and for the safe-keeping of the flags, the time has come for transferring them to a safer place. You now place them where they will remain and be cared for, and safely guarded, aye, for generations to come.

"They, and you who carried them in the time of National peril, represent the life, the integrity of the Nation. The history of our State chronicles three struggles in which Illinois men took part: The war with the Indians, in 1812; the Mexican war, in 1846-7; and the great civil war, in 1861-5, besides the Mormon and Winnebago wars. Nations, as a rule, do not become established on right principles and great, without struggles in which the power of the sword is invoked. Our Government has not been an exception to the rule. Its progress and development has met with resistance. Civilization never makes progress without opposition. Its victories are all won, and the condition of the world improved only by the brave men pressing forward in support of right principles, and by hard fighting at every step. Such men are benefactors of the race. When Government is assailed it must be defended, or fall; and the men who take their lives in their hands, and go forth to defend their country and flag, and, as in the late great war, defend liberty and the Union and raise the civilization of the people to a higher plane, are truly benefactors of the race, and entitled to the eternal gratitude of their fellows. You represent every struggle in which the country has been engaged since Illinois became a State. You have successfully defended the Nation's life and honor. I look upon these old battle flags as you carry them the last time. They represent the glory and nationality of our country. The American flag is dear to every patriotic heart in the land, but those flags and banners are dearer to you who carried and followed them on the march and field, than to anyone else.

"That flag is respected everywhere, on land and sea. It represents power; it represents Union and Liberty, and it represents 'a government of, by and for the people.' While you are engaged in the pleasant duty of transferring the flags, banners and relics, you are doubtless remembered of the time when you enlisted for the war; you are reminded of the old rallying song:

'We will rally 'round the flag, boys,
We will rally once again.
Shouting the battle cry of Freedom.'

And that other song:

'We are coming Father Abraham,
Three hundred thousand strong.'

"You are reminded of the battles in which you fought; of the gallant comrades who fell by your side; of the wonderful escapes you made; of the terrible sufferings you endured in hospital and prison, and of the victories you won. You will think over the long list of battles, among which are, Belmont, Donelson, Pittsburg Landing, Vicksburg, Arkansas Post, Pea Ridge, Perryville, Nashville, Chickamauga, Mission Ridge, Lookout Mountain, Corinth, Atlanta, and the Grand March to the Sea, and the hundreds of terrible struggles, East and South, which I cannot stop to enumerate.

"As you hold those banners you are reminded of the two hundred and fifty thousand other brave Illinoisans who went out with you, and of the long death-roll of gallant boys who never returned. As you stand here you think of the gallant and eloquent War Governor, Richard Yates, the soldiers' friend, and the members of his administration, Dubois, Butler, Hatch and Bateman, two of whom, with him, have passed away; you do not forget that other great and good man, the dearest son of our noble State, a martyr to the cause of Liberty and Union, who was your Commander-in-Chief, Abraham Lincoln, whose ashes rest beneath a monument near by, reared by patriotic people. I am reminded of those beautiful words uttered by him, which cannot fail to touch the heart of every man, 'The mystic chords of memory stretching from every battle-field and patriot grave to every living heart and hearthstone all over this broad land, will yet swell the chorus of the Union when again touched, as surely they will be, by the better angels of our nature.' What poetry, sweetness and music in these lines.

"But I must not prolong my remarks. Upon the close of these proceedings, the curtain drops, and the last act is ended of the great drama in which you have taken so noble a part. May your services and sacrifices never be needed again to preserve the integrity of our Nation. A portion of the Illinois National Guard, more than half of whom are old soldiers and served with you, have done themselves and you the honor of coming here to serve as your escort, while you are performing this last service to your old flags and banners. They are in the service of the State and ready at a moment's notice, over six thousand strong, to do duty as soldiers, either for the State or Nation, if their services shall be required to maintain the public peace. Now, soldiers, I will detain you no longer. I welcome you, one and all, to the Capital of our State, and the Adjutant General, by your aid, will place the colors and trophies you bear in the apartments designed for them, where they will be diligently cared for and guarded, I trust, so long as they shall endure."

After the speech of Governor Cullom, General Palmer was called for, but not immediately responding, General C. E. Lippincott was called, and was received with much favor. He said:

"The voice of these flags is eloquent beyond any need or any power of human words. We will do well simply to pause, in the first still hour that shall come to us, and listen to the solemn teaching of these battle worn flags. They are not merely ashen staves upon which flaunt heavy silks, adorned with stripes and bearing golden stars which catch the eye when they are unfurled to the breeze of Heaven, and by their beauty waken the beholder's admiration. Beautiful as is the flag of our country among all the banners of the Nations of earth, its chief excellence is in the noble history of which it is the result, and the lofty ideas and principles of which it is the symbol. Its history may be said to have its beginning on that day when force was first challenged by right, and to represent the long struggle of the people against those who for ages had set themselves against 'the strong upward tendencies of the Godlike soul of man."

"It was the beautiful flower of freedom which burst in beauty upon the world's sight when, after so many years of slavery, the sublime words of the Declaration of Independence rang out from the American Congress upon the world: 'We hold these truths to be self-evident, that man was created equal and endowed by the Creator with certain inalienable rights, among which are life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness.'"

"Coming into existence, as it appears, without a known designer, it made its way by sheer force of its beauty and appropriateness, to the hearts of our struggling fathers—preferred everywhere to all emblems suggested by influence, and devised by the trained taste of many eminent persons. It was baptized in the blood by Washington, and adopted, almost in the present form, by the Congress of the Colonies. It came, at last, when the revolution was over, when the weakly confederation of separate States had given away to the cohesive Government of the United States, it became one Nation's flag as soon as our Nation was born. Co-equal with our Government in its history, it has been, and is, let us pray and believe it ever will be, the fit and perfect emblem of all the holy ideas which are woven into our Nation's structure, and make the enduring rock on which it is founded. Such, friends and comrades, is my idea of the American flag. Such my notion of its sacred history and of its holy symbolic character. But we are especially here to-day to look on these flags, to bear them to their resting place, and to take into our hearts the especial lessons which they teach.

"Oh! but it does seem to me that words are idle and worse than weak. How, in the presence of these memorials of the constancy of Illinois in the times which tried the temper of States and of men, can anyone talk as it deserves of that recent history? So recent is it, that to the men and women of my age, and even those much younger, it is still a part of our present life, and the pulses of our hearts beat in quick response to every mention and memory of the great drama; not as something of the past, but as if its crowded incidents were now about us and before us and with and of us, making the life that we live, the emotions which we feel, in the very present and actual now.

"Again comes to us the thrill of horror as the wires bear us word that the flag is fired upon. Again comes to us the resolve that the holy symbol shall not be disgraced, nor the principles whose triumph it means he lost to our country or to mankind. Again we are in the midst of the enthusiasm and high devotion of an aroused people. Again we feel how patriotism elevates and ennobles individuals; how it sanctifies the hearthstone, making it the very altar of God; how it gives to beauty a lovelier glow, to love an added sweetness, and to manhood the consecration of a purer, a nobler, and a stronger aim. Again we hear the tread of the mustering thousands, and are in sympathy with the nobility of that time of unselfishness and high devotion. Again we realize the trials of the tedious camp and the weary march. Again our hearts beat high and fast with the fierce fever and exalting joy of battle. Again we melt in sorrow at the sound of the muffled drum, and shed bitter tears at the gaps in our battle lines, and learn a new and deeper love of country as we realize how much rich and manly blood its redemption has cost. Yes! Let the commonwealth keep these torn and sacred rags with tender care. They are sacred. Around their ashen staves have been clasped brave hands of the noble sons of Illinois, who thought their life blood none too precious to be spilt in their defense; and as the storm of battle surged along the line of those who fought to save the Nation's life, the iron hail fell thickest, and noble blood was shed freely under the immediate shadow of these flags. Noble men, with hearts treasuring the deepest love of home, and the tenderest thoughts of the maiden to whom their deep faith was pledged, and beating with perfect consciousness of the ability to win their way to the high place of honor among men, have grasped these flags and carried them with firm step, and flashing eye, and exalting joy into the proud triumph of a certain death. Yes, keep them with proudest care, for they are not emblems of the freedom, the power, the saved unity of our Nation; but of a heroism loftier and purer than ever before, since history began, was embodied in an army, and triumphed in the achievements of battle.

"Let any one who, since the war, has been led away by the seductions of selfish ambition to desert his comrades and talk nonsense—be that deserter private or president—say what he will; we know, and the world knows, and all the future shall know, that there was a difference in the inspiration and the heroism which widely distinguished those who fought under these flags, and those like them from other States, and that other and brave army which fought under a hostile flag to destroy what these banners soared over a thousand battle-fields to maintain and preserve.

"No one can yield readier praise and honor than I can, and do, to the bravery and high personal gallantry of those whose mistaken cause went down before these flags. But their lost cause was a wrong cause, and the world while it remembers and admires forever the brave devotion of those who fought for it, will yet remember that their blood was vainly shed to establish a Government whose corner stone should have been slavery, and that their cause was trampled into the red mire of battle for, those who fought to preserve and maintain the life of the Republic, whose only life is freedom. These flags are the emblem of no hate, no animosity, no feeling of sectional or individual superiority. The language which they hold, the lesson which they teach, with all the force of all their associations, is the lesson of brotherly love for all who dwell under the flag of our Nation.

"These flags, about whom we can almost fancy still cluster the spirits and cling the affections of those who died under them, speak in one voice to the hearts of men all over our broad land exhorting all, of every State, to sink every smaller and more ignoble feeling in one of confidence and respect for each other, as comrades of the army of the present and the future, whose tie is that of a common patriotism, and whose devotion is to a saved, a restored, and forever united Nation."

Governor Palmer then responded to repeated calls in a few extempore remarks, as follows:

"The Governor, very sensibly, deprecated any further prolonging of the ceremonies in speech-making, as the boys were already impatient for dinner. He remarked, that as he had observed the flags taken from their late depository and borne through the streets to Memorial Hall, which the people of the State had prepared for these mementoes, he had felt that the occasion was one so grand as to be beyond the reach of oratory. A more sublime triumph could not be desired than would be won by him who could, in fitting language, describe the emotions the appearance of these flags awakened in every mind and every patriotic heart. These banners were mementoes of the greatest and most dreadful struggle this Nation ever had, or ever could pass through. Seventeen years had passed away since he, and many of those who now confronted him, had sworn to uphold these banners and these things they symbolized. They had gone out, and in battle upheld them. Many of them had been by "cragged hands to valor given,' and had floated bravely over ensanguined fields. To-day would see them consigned to their final resting place to be no more disturbed. The ceremony is emblematic of those that finally would finish the career, in this life, of all who took part in the tremendous drama of which this was the closing scene."

The following poem, by Lieutenant S. F. Flint, of Galesburg, of the 7th, was read:

THE MUSTER OF THE FLAG.

"O, comrades, such a day as this,
Of solemn and exultant tears,
For what we meet, and what we miss,
Comes not again in all the years.

"Go bring them out, their tattered strands,
They shall their own brave story tell,
Unroll them all with reverent hands,
The old flags that we knew so well.

"Aye, lift them up! A few fair stars,
Flash from their faded field of blue,
Gleaming amid the rents of scars,
When the wild leaden storm tore through.

"They catch the breeze! They hail the sky,
Stained-shorn-out with a look as proud
As where of old they streamed on high
Like rainbows o'er the battle cloud.

"There spoke the guns! Do I not dream?
Comrades, fall in and forward all!
Did I not hear their eagles scream
An answer to that fearful call?

"Nay, that is past, thank God! No more
We wait for that deep echoing boom
To mark dauntless eagle's soar—
Close up the ranks—and march to doom!

"Then let their war-worn glories float
And fondle with the breeze of spring;
And let the glad procession shout—
Drums roll and crash and cymbals ring.

"Sound, bugles, sound the rallying call,
And wake again the thundering gun.
So few! so few? Where are they all?
Fall in, you men of sixty-one!

"From Georgia's bare and gullied steeps,
To Carolina's wilds of sand;
From Mississippi's forests deep,
To Patomac's storied strand.

"On the green hills of Cumberland,
By the lone streams of Tennessee,
They rise a grim and shadowy band—
Their silent, sad salute I see.

"'On duty,' speaks that silent sign,
Until the last great reveille,
And this stern message down the line
Breaths from that mighty grave to-day.

"So bear them on and guard them well
In yonder proud Memorial Hall;
The flag—the cause for which we fell—
Swear, brothers, it shall never fall.

"Stand up, despite the shattered limb,
Here is a creed we all believe:
Dash off the tears of eyes that swim,
Aye, reck not of one empty sleeve.

"No traitor hand its glory mars,
While yet a man is still alive
Who bore the banner of the stars
From sixty-one to sixty-five."

The Veterans then entered the State House basement from the north entrance, and the flags were deposited in Memorial Hall, in the racks prepared for them. Dinner followed, and the Veterans and National Guards surrounding the immense tables were served with a bountiful repast of substantial food, by the ladies, who were heartily cheered for efficiency in dispensing the supplies of the commissary department. An idea of the extent of this grand camp-fire lunch may be gained when it is stated that the troops were furnished with eighteen barrels of coffee. Upwards of three thousand one hundred were served.

The dinner over, the Veterans and the Guardsmen were dismissed, and visited the State House throughout, and other points of interest about the city, thus occupying the time until the evening festivities. Through the corridors in the State House, the Fifth Regiment Band playing in the rotunda, the Veterans and ladies promenaded, and at a late hour dancing was indulged in quite extensively.

Thus ended the re-union and transfer of battle flags. That these, nor similar flags, will have again to be unfurled in a like cause, is the sincere prayer of every loyal heart.

CHAPTER XIX.

OLD SETTLERS' SOCIETY.

A society for the preservation of historical events of a Nation, State, county or town, is a commendable affair. The lessons of the past teach us the duties pertaining to the future. The fires of patriotism, the love of country or of home is strengthened by a narration of such important events as tend to stir the blood or quicken to life those divine affections in man. Many a youth has chosen the life of a soldier from reading accounts of the great battles and glorious deeds of an Alexander, a Hannibal, a Napoleon, a Wellington, or our own brave and noble Washington. The lists of statesmen have been augmented by the example of a Pitt, a Webster, a Clay, or Calhoun. Patriotism and love of country have been awakened by reading the sublime utterances of Patrick Henry, John Adams, Thomas Jefferson, Abraham Lincoln, and Stephen A. Douglas. The love of home, love of parents and kindred have been strengthened by oft-told tales of the aged father or mother, especially of that pioneer father and mother who toiled early and late, hard and long, in order to give their descendants the priceless boon of a home of plenty and of peace, of refinement and love for God and humanity.

In the spring of 1859, Pascal P. Enos, a well-beloved pioneer, who now sleeps the "sleep of the just," and who is gratefully remembered by thousands in Sangamon county, circulated the following call:

OLD SETTLERS' MEETING.—The undersigned, desirous of preserving the early history of the city of Springfield and of Sangamon county, now known in a great degree to a few pioneers, would suggest a meeting at the Court House, on the first day of June, of all the settlers who became residents of the county previous to "the winter of the deep snow" (1830-31), for the purpose of organizing a permanent society in furtherance of this object.

Pascal P. Enos,
A. G. Bergen,
Elijah Iles,
N. W. Matheny.

Pursuant to the call, a meeting was held June 1st, and adjourned to the 15th, at which time the society was fully organized and the following constitution was adopted:

ARTICLE 1. This Society shall be called the "Old Settlers' Society of Sangamon County," and shall have for its object the collection and preservation of the early history of Sangamon county and the city of Springfield.

ARTICLE 2. The officers of this Society shall consist of a President, two Vice Presidents, Corresponding Secretary, Recording Secretary and Treasurer, who shall hold their offices until their successors are elected.

It shall be the duty of the President to call all meetings of the Society and preside at the same, and in his absence this shall be performed by one of the Vice Presidents.

It shall be the duty of the Recording Secretary to keep a record of the Society's proceedings, and preserve all manuscripts, papers and books belonging to the society, and to keep a book in which all qualified persons desirous of becoming members may enroll their names.

It shall be the duty of the Corresponding Secretary to attend to the correspondence of the Society and to preserve the same.

ARTICLE 3. All persons residents of Sangamon county previous to "the winter of the deep snow," viz: 1830-31, are qualified for membership in this Society, and after the first day of January, 1860, applicants for membership must show a residence of twenty-five years previous to the time of application. The roll of the Society shall constitute the only evidence of membership.

ARTICLE 4. The election of officers shall be annually on the first Monday in June, and shall be decided by a majority of members voting, and in the same manner at any meeting of the Society. Notice at a former meeting having been given, this constitution may be altered, amended or abolished, and a code of by-laws may, in the same manner and at any meeting, be adopted, at the discretion of the Society.

Until the first Monday in June, the offices of this Society shall be filled as follows:

Thomas Moffett, President.
Elijah Iles and A. G. Herndon, Vice Presidents.
Pascal P. Enos, Recording Secretary.
N. W. Matheny, Corresponding Secretary.
E. B. Hawley, Treasurer.

ARTICLE 5. ———, 181—, the day on which the first cabin was erected in Sangamon county, shall be known in the proceedings of this Society as "Old Settlers' Day," and shall be annually celebrated.

It will be observed there is a blank left in the last article. A committee was appointed to inquire on what day the first cabin was erected, which committee afterwards reported, and it was decided that October 20, of each year, should be celebrated as "Old Settlers' Day," in honor of the first cabin in the county having been raised by Robert Pulliam, October 20, 1816.

The committee having decided, a call was issued for the

FIRST ANNUAL CELEBRATION.

The locality selected for the occasion of the celebration was very properly the spot upon which the first house in the limits of the county was erected, being on Sugar creek, about twelve miles south of Springfield, and four miles south-east from Chatham, on section twenty-one, township fourteen, north of range five west. The exact date on which the cabin was commenced or raised, is not known, but the statement was made by Martin Pulliam, a son of Robert Pulliam, that it was in October, 1816. It was put up by Mr. Pulliam for the purpose of sheltering himself and four hired men while herding cattle during the following winter. In the winter of 1817-18, the Indians burned out the range, and Mr. Pulliam did not bring his family to the place until May 26, 1818. Meanwhile another cabin had been put up a quarter of a mile distant, by Mr. Shellhouse, and there he temporarily lodged his family.

The spot pointed out on which the Pulliam cabin stood, is in an immense grove of ash, oak and sugar trees, a number of which have since fallen and their trunks cumber the ground. The cabin was about sixteen feet square, and fronted east, with the chimney on the south side. The ground slopes off towards the north-east and draining into Sugar creek, which is but a short distance from it. No trace in 1859 was remaining of the house, except a small mound, showing where the chimney stood, and a little hollow showing where there was a cellar. Several trees, ten or twelve inches thick, are growing on the spot. To the south was pointed out where an apple nursery was planted by Mr. Pulliam in the spring of 1817, and the trunk of an old burr oak of immense size, which still lays there, was said to have been used as a portion of the fence which inclosed the patch. The Pulliam cabin was long and familiarly known as the "Sugar House," from the fact that sugar was made in it in subsequent years.

The weather on the occasion of this first celebration was gloriously fine the day being a sample of the glorious "Indian summer" days, and the number of persons brought together was probably not less than fifteen hundred, among whom were many of the pioneers of Sangamon county.

The exercises of the day were commenced by a procession formed at the edge of the timber and headed by a band of music engaged for the occasion. Making a circuit through the timber, the procession marched to the identical spot where the first cabin had been erected. Two wagons had been placed over the spot, in which the officers of the society, the orator of the day, and invited guests, had arranged themselves. Judge Moffett then called the meeting to order, and the festival was opened by prayer by Rev. Mr. Prentiss, Presiding Elder of the Springfield Methodist Episcopal Circuit. The invocation of the reverend gentleman was singularly beautiful and appropriate to the occasion, and in the solemn forest which surrounded, seemed to touch a chord in the breast of all who were present. The band then started up "Three Cheers for the Red, White, and Blue," after which James H. Matheny, the orator of the day, was introduced. As well for its appropriateness and eloquence, as for its being a part of the proceedings of the day, the address is here given. Said Mr. Matheny:

"Ladies and Gentlemen:—We meet to-day for a singular purpose. We, the remnant spared by time from an almost forgotten past, meet to revive fading reminiscences of other days—meet to re-kindle recollections almost extinct. We come with varied emotions. Some of you, almost at the foot of life's hill, look back and upward at the path you have trod, while others, who have just reached life's summit, gaze down into the valley of tears with many a hope and fear. You, gray-headed fathers, you have done your work; you have done it well; and now, as the sunset of life is closing around you, you are given the rare boon of enjoying the fruits of your own labor. You can see the land won by your good right arm from its wilderness state, and from a savage foe, pass to the hands of your children, and your children's children, literally, 'a land flowing with milk and honey'—a land over which hovers the white-robed angels of Religion and Peace—a land fairer and brighter and more glorious than any other land beneath the blue arch of Heaven. You have done your work well, and when the time of rest shall come, you will sink to the dreamless repose with the calm consciousness of duty done.

"In this hour, let memory assert her strongest sway—tear aside the thin veil that shrouds in gloom the misty past—call up before you the long-forgotten scenes of years ago—live over once again the toils, the struggles, the hopes and fears of other days. Let this day be a day sacred to the memory of the olden time. In that olden time, there are, no doubt, scenes of sadness, as well as of joy. Perhaps you remember standing by the bedside of a loved and cherished, but dying, wife—one who, in the days of her youth and beauty, when you proposed to her to seek a home in a new, wild land, took your hand in hers and spoke to you in words like these: 'Whither thou goest, I will go, and where thou lodgest, I will lodge; thy people shall be my people, and thy God my God; where thou diest, will I die, and there will I be buried—the Lord do so to me and more also, if aught but death part me and thee.' Or, perhaps, some brave boy, stricken down in the pride of his strength; or some gentle daughter, fading away in her glorious beauty; or some little prattling babe, folding its weary eyes in the 'dreamless sleep.' If so—if there are memories like these, and the unbidden tear wells up to the eye, let it come, and to-day one and all shed a tear or two to the memory of the 'loved and lost.'

"It is not my purpose to deal in historical facts connected with the early settlement of this county. These are now being gathered by other hands, and will, in due time, be given to the world. To one event I am permitted to allude, and that one is the fact that we this day commemorate the building of the first log cabin in the county of Sangamon.

"Forty-two years ago the stillness of the unbroken forest was startled by the clangor of an axe in a strong man's hands. That day he had rested from a weary journey, but as he stood and gazed upon the beauty of the strange wild scene about him, there arose a longing in his heart to linger there. With that class of men to whom he belonged, to decide was to act. Soon his weary team was loosened from their heavy load, and as we have said, the clangor of his axe rung out, wild and clear, and some brave old tree that had stood the storms of a hundred years, crashed headlong to the earth. Wearying of his toil for that day, the camp-fire was kindled, and the rude evening meal prepared and partaken of, and he laid himself down to sleep. We do not know whether in that stilly hour, when all alone with nature and nature's God, he formally kneeled down upon the green earth and offered up a prayer for protection through the lonely hours of that first night in the strange land to which he had come, but we feel that there must at least have been in his heart a calm and unshaken trust that the guardian care of a kind Providence was around about him, to shield and protect him from every harm. This was a singularly marked characteristic of the early pioneers of the West. They had 'faith in God'—an unswerving trust in His Providence. The stern faith of our fathers, and the calm, gentle trust of our mothers, in an over-ruling Providence, presents a broad contrast to the hesitating belief of their children. I have always thought that the most beautiful of all life's mysteries, is that calm and unshaken trustfulness in a kind Providence, that cheers and sustains in the darkest hour; that brings a ray of sunshine, hidden though it be to the outer world, to the saddest and loneliest of hearts—an abiding faith that a kind Father is ever guarding, with a sleepless watchfulness, the welfare of his wandering children. How desolate would earth be without this beautiful faith in the Providence of God.

"Wonderful are the changes that forty years have made since that lone man halted his weary team on that autumn evening. The wilderness that then lay before him in its unbroken solitude, now blooms and blossoms as the rose; the red Indian has gone from his favorite hunting ground, far toward the setting sun; the buffalo, in his untamed wildness, is roaming over other lands, and the frightened elk has wandered away from his accustomed haunts. All has changed! Could that old man now come from his silent grave, with what a wondering awe would he gaze upon the scene that now meets our vision. Let us call him from his lonely bed, let us arouse him from his dreamless sleep. In imagination I can see him coming—in fancy's ear I hear his solemn tread. Slowly he comes, with uncertain tread, as though seeking for the old familiar pathway; now he stands by my side; now he is gazing upon the forms before him. Ah, see! With a mournful shake of the head he turns away. The old familiar faces, where are they? Alas! too many have gone away, and gone forever, and strange forms now fill their places; and now, with wearied, disappointed look he goes back to his dreamless bed. Sleep on, old man, sleep quietly. There are many here who still remember thee, and it may be that on some other day, these strangers whom you pioneered to this goodly land, will gather about your humble grave, and erect some monument telling to coming generations where you are sleeping the 'dreamless sleep.'

"A wondrous change, indeed, has come since that autumn day. What was then a wild and unbroken wilderness, is now the smiling home of thousands, blest with all that makes life joyous and bright. Cities have sprung into existence since that day; churches upon every hand point their spires heavenward; the whitened school house is to be seen in well nigh every grove; the busy hum of traffic and trade burdens the very air; and the sweet laugh of merry-hearted children floats like music upon every breeze. Ah, yes! a change indeed, a change glorious beyond all conception. It is well for the world's development that man is a creature of change; that he is never satisfied with the present, but is always struggling for better things in the coming future. It is this restless principle in man's nature that is ever prompting him to seek in new scenes happiness that older places seem to deny him. So strong is the principle in some men that everything else in life bends to it. The ties of home, kindred and friends are readily torn asunder; the familiar places of childhood are abandoned forever; the comforts and luxuries of life are scornfully trodden under foot, and alone, or perhaps only accompanied by wife and child, they strike out into untrodden paths in the still further West, to battle until life's close with the rough realities of a fresher and newer existence. And what is it, where man is? What matter the circumstances surrounding him? Happiness is not a creature of time, circumstance or place; man can be happy in any spot upon which shines God's bright sun, and in every land can he find a home.

"A somewhat varied life, checkered with much of sunshine, and some little of shade, has fully taught me this one truth, that 'tis home where the heart is—'tis home, and only home where the loved ones dwell. It is a matter of small moment what our outward surroundings are—whether in the untrodden wild, or in the city full, whether the rude log cabin or the costly palace shelter us from the beating storm; whether we are arrayed in 'purple and fine linen,' or clothed in the humble garb of poverty; all these matter but little if the heart is within us; if the loved ones surround us, it is home wherever we are. What is all life worth, unbrightened by home's glad sunshine? How poor an exchange does he make, who barter the calm contentment of a peaceful home for the honors, the distinctions and riches of earth? How worse than dross are all these, when after years of weary toil we gain them. How the tired heart pauses on its weary way, and with many a sad regret, feels that it is bartering the true joys of life for 'dead sea apples,' that turn to ashes and bitterness on the lips.

"It will be the fulfillment of a beautiful hope, if the hour shall ever come, when every man and woman in all our broad land, shall own some spot, no matter how small, hallowed by the name of home. It would be a time of wondrous beauty; all earth would put on a happy smile; songs of gentle melody would roll on from hill-top and valley, gathering force and power, until at last they would swell into one perpetual anthem of gladness and joy, for it is a truth that well-nigh all that is glorious in life emanates from a love of home. Man with unflinching heart and unwearied arm is toiling ever to decorate and embellish the chosen spot, and woman, with her gentle voice and beautiful smile, is there to cherish and sustain in every weary hour.

"This earth is full of music; glad songs are continually welling up from happy hearts, but the best of them all, the one that nestles closer and fondlier around every heart, is the gentle strain of 'Home, Sweet Home.'

"Nor has the physical earth alone changed. Man, in his social, moral and civil aspect, has felt the influence of thirty years, and yielded to an irresistible tide of an onward progress. How changed in a social point of view. Then a broad humanity, like golden sunshine, rested upon whole communities. The kindly sympathies of the human bosom held full sway. If it was not an age of mind it at least was an age of heart. If misfortunes came sudden, swift and sure, warm hearts and strong hands came unasked to sympathize and assist. Then the latch string always hung on the outside of the batten door; now it is not only pulled in, but the panel door is bolted on the inside. If a neighbor's house then took fire and burned up, they came for miles around and built him another; now the unfortunate victim, whose house is consumed, is simply turned over to the tender mercies of the insurance agent.

"Men sickened and died then and whole communities came with solemn tread and followed them to the rude, unfenced graveyard, and although the dead was placed in a rough, unplanned oaken coffin, yet weeping friends, with their own hands, bore the loved form and laid it inside its last resting place, and with uncovered heads stood around until friendly hands had heaped up the little mound above where the loved one was laid. Now men die and a rose-wood coffin, lined with costliest silks and satin, receive their remains; they are borne to the fashionable burying ground in a hearse all decked with waving plumes; a half dozen or so of the costliest carriages in the community carry a few acquaintances to the graveyard; they are lowered to their narrow bed, and at the first rumble of a clod upon the coffin lid, the living all hurry away, and, without thought of the one just gone, plunge into the busy whirl of life.

"In those days there were such things as boys, not merely boys in size, but in character and thought. Pure specimens of unadulterated nature in her roughest and most uncouth form. We have no such things now as boys—they have been entirely superseded by a new genius denominated young gentlemen. The real boy is a lost race—as totally extinct as the mysterious animals of the past, about which geologists tell us. I would give a good deal to once again see a real bona fide boy, such as lived in Springfield thirty years ago, when I was one of that now extinct species—but they are all gone. I never expect to see one again; yet I love to think of them. I love to call up reminiscences of my boyish days. I love to think of the unsophisticated trustfulness of our natures, of our abiding faith, that everything in life was earnest, true and beautiful.

"One little circumstance comes to memory that will perhaps better illustrate the unsophisticated nature of the boys of thirty years ago, than any words that I can employ. The rumor one day went abroad through our boyish community that a stranger boy had come to town with his father, who had just moved from the East, but what was startling and totally incomprehensible to us was, according to the same rumor, he absolutely wore broadcloth clothes; this was asking a little too much, more than we could believe. Our loftiest ambition, our wildest dream had never gone beyond a wool hat and a mixed jeans coat. It is true that we had heard of broadcloth; we knew there was such a thing; we knew that preachers, doctors, and lawyers sometimes, but only upon rare occasions, wore it; but to be told that a boy, no bigger than ourselves, wore broadcloth, it was entirely too much. The news spread rapidly from boy to boy; the excitement ran higher and higher; night after night we met to talk over the wonderful news, and finally we resolutely resolved that if such a wonderful thing was true, we must see and know it for ourselves. This was on Saturday night. We had been told that the stranger boy would go to meeting Sunday with his broadcloth coat on; we knew the route he would take; and a committee of three was appointed to hide in a corner of the fence, near which he would pass, and see if the wonderful story could be true, and then report to us. The balance of us were to wait in an old mill until the truth should be known. The three went forth upon their mission; we waited in silence for their return. Shortly they came; we saw at once by their solemn, awe-struck countenances that the truth had been told us, and one by one we left the old mill and passed to our homes, perfectly satisfied that a superior being was in our midst. This was thirty years ago, but all of us, since that day, have fully learned the true estimate to place upon broadcloth, tinsel and show.

"What a change thirty years has made in the worship of God. Come go with me, and let us visit one of the old-time meetings. It is a beautiful sunshiny day, and as we go up—

We strike into the pathway all worn in the sod,
By the people who went up to the worship of God."

"It is a rude, rough looking building; yet let us enter. Step lightly, for there are no carpets to deaden the sound of our feet. Up the rough aisle, towards the pulpit we make our way; upon every side they are moving and inviting us to a seat. Now let us sit down—the rough old bench is rather rude, and don't you lean back, for you may fall into somebody's lap. Now look around at the congregation; scan well their faces and tell me what they came here for. You answer promptly and at once: 'They came here to worship God.' See the humble preacher rise from his seat, hear him line out the grand old hymn:

"God moves in a mysterious way
His wonders to perform,
He plants His foot upon the sea,
And rides upon the storm."

"With one accord they rise to their feet and pour forth the untaught melody of grateful hearts. The song is ended, and 'Let us pray' falls solemnly upon every ear, as they kneel before their God, and when the preacher's earnest lips pronounce the 'amen,' it is echoed back from every heart. And now listen to the simple story of a Redeemer's love, told with a kindling fervor that warms and electrifies every soul. Now the benediction is given, and they bend their way homeward, happier and better men and women.

"Now let us visit one of modern fashionable churches. We ascend marble steps; wide, folding doors open to give entrance; we are treading down the carpeted aisle; not a soul moves upon their cushioned seats to bid us welcome; not a pew door opens to bid us enter. At the extreme back end of the church we noticed some uncushioned seats unoccupied; let us go back and take a seat there; we retrace our steps. It is true we can't hear much way back here, but then we can see. Now look around upon this congregation; scan well their faces and tell me for what purpose they came. You answer promptly and at once, 'To see and be seen.' Now look at that pulpit, all dressed in crimson and purple; its occupant casts one glance over the congregation, to see if they are all looking at him! With what a studied grace he rises to his feet; how gracefully he pulls that cambric handkerchief from his pocket and wipes the imaginary perspiration from his brow; how pompously he unclasps that golden bound hymn book and reads—

"Vain, delusive world, adieu, with all of creature good,

Only Jesus I pursue, who bought me with His blood,
All thy pleasures I forego—I trample on thy wealth and pride,

Only Jesus will I know, and Jesus crucified."

"And the choir takes up the song, and, with faultless execution, renders the music to perfection. Now the minister again rises with the same studied grace, and daintily opens the gorgeously embossed Bible, and turns it over, leaf by leaf, until the sought for passage is found. He then runs his eye over the gorgeous decorations of his church, all painted and frescoed until even the innocent walls are made to deceive you; and then turn over his gay and worldly audience, and then in tones that really sounds serious, reads—

"Vanity of vanities, all is vanity."

"And then proceeds to deliver a learned discourse on the sinfulness of earthly vanity; warns his hearers to guard against, as deadly sins, 'the lusts of the eye and the pride of life.'

"The ambition of the fashionable minister of our day seems to prompt them to be brilliant and witty, rather than good. The simple truths to be taught are lost in metaphysical fogs. The humble narrative of the child in the manger can be told only in the jargon of the schools, adorned with all the graces of oratory. The beautiful prayer of our Saviour is simple and unmeaning, in their estimation, unless embellished with rhetorical flourishes. Their own prayers are nothing more nor less than abre-viated orations. You may listen to one of their sermons from the text to its close, and, although they kindle up your fancy, draw largely upon your imagination, appeal logically to your judgment, yet so far as any effect upon your heart is concerned, it will not have any. You may say what you please about it, deny it as much as you may, yet nevertheless it is true, that under the influence of modern progress, religion itself is losing all its old vitality, and is fast becoming a matter of tinsel, parade and show. It will take but little more of the religious progress of the present day until you will hear these gay worshipers in their magnificent temples dancing scornfully that their Saviour ever slept in a manger.

"Now let us for a little while contemplate mankind in a civil point of view. What a sad change thirty years has made in the politics and politicians of our land. Perhaps in this point of view the change has been more marked and the contrast more painful than in any other aspect in which that change or that contrast can be viewed. At that age there was an unsophisticated notion prevailing that offices were created for the benefit of the people, rather than for the benefit of the office-holder. They had another quaint and curious idea, and that was, that 'honesty was the best policy' even in politics, as well as it was in morals. There is another curious fact illustrated in their life, that they were so foolishly patriotic that they positively loved their country better than they loved themselves. There is another thing, perhaps more wonderful still, and that is that the people of that day really thought that an integrity of character and an honesty of purpose were necessary characteristics in a political leader. We of course laugh at such crude and unsophisticated notions as these. Such political veranday is really refreshing in this age of intellectual progress. All such ideas as these we have long since buried in the tomb of old fogyism. But seriously, the only thing perhaps at which an American citizen should blush or be ashamed of, in this our day, is the party politics of the age, and their embodiment, the very patriotic politician, and it is very difficult to decide whether one should laugh or cry over their recklessness and folly.

"I am disposed to look upon the great mass of the party politics of the present day, classified by whatever name you choose, as a great pool of festering iniquity, and I hesitate not to say that if left to politicians alone, this glorious confederacy would soon be shivered to a thousand fragments. The only thing necessary to perfect in its corruption the seething cauldron of the witches in Macbeth, would be to throw in a specimen or two of politicians, taken from each of the great parties of the country. It would then be ready for the most horrid conjurations.

"I thank God, however, that those who traffic and trade in politics have but little to do with the prosperity of the country; that it is an increasing, swelling tide that rolls on with or without them. Yet these creature politicians have their uses; they are an exhaustless source of amusement to the great thinking mass of the land. And they are useful in another respect; they are living monuments, warning us how frail a thing poor human nature is. Go to Washington City, and hear them rant and mouth their fiery denunciations. They seem to think that they are the people; that they are not only the source of power, but the power itself; they seem to forget that they are but the creatures of a day; they cease to remember that they are but bubbles blown into shape and dimension by the popular breath. One party proposes a measure, the other for that reason only opposes it, and in their mad fury, they threaten that if that measure does or does not become a law, that they will dissolve the Union! Let them dare try it, and they will find that the people, their masters, will have something to say about it.

"Politics at the present day has got to be a species of trade, and it is so recognized and classified by all. We speak of a good farmer, a skillful mechanic, a successful lawyer, and a shrewd politician. When you go to erect a dwelling house or procure the building of machinery, you naturally select the most skillful mechanic of your acquaintance. So when party leaders have any new move to make, or any office to fill, they of course select their shrewdest politician; not him who is the purest patriot; the truest man; not him who will best manage the affairs of the country, but him who will give to his party what his whole country has a right to claim—his every energy. Now it is well that all this matter be perfectly understood. Every body knows, so far as the great prosperity of the country is concerned, that politics, in its party sense, means just nothing at all, and every body equally well knows that the patriotism of party is nothing but the patriotism of self. Hence from all this, nothing really injurious can ever result to the welfare of the country. The merchant and the politician alike, unmolested, go into the market; the merchant traffics and exchanges his goods and wares for produce and money, and the politician barter and sells his principles for office and place. It is alike expected of both and recognized only in the light of a business transaction.

"If you will permit me to illustrate by a figure, I will compare this Republic to a brave oak tree towering in majestic beauty above some green and flowery plain, wooing to its gentle shade all way-worn and storm-tossed wanderers. Beneath its 'boundless contiguity of shade,' millions of earth's wearied ones are reposing in calm dignity—joyous, happy and free. Occasionally the winds come, and even the storms shout through the topmost branches of that brave tree, and these branches may lash each other in wild confusion. Yet at the base it stands unmoved, and those that are reposing beneath are scarcely conscious of the storm above. It would be amusing, yet profitable, to spend a little season in analyzing the peculiarities presented to our gaze in and about the tree. Let us for a moment or two turn aside and gaze upon the scene.

"How proudly and how grandly that brave tree rears itself aloft. No dead or withered twig mars its green and vigorous beauty, and on its topmost bough the Eagle—Liberty's own bird—makes its eyrie. Beneath its broad and genial shade, see those teeming millions of nature's noblemen, illustrating and developing the glories of God's own work. Acknowledging no master save the Eternal One, they stand up unawed and front the eternal stars—trampling in the dust the hoary falsehood that kings rule by divine right. Chaining mind to the car of labor they have become gods, and the wild elements cower in submissive subservency to their will. At the farmer's magic touch the green-robed earth pours forth her million treasures. From the brain of the mechanic the almost thinking machine leaps, like Minerva, from the hand of Jove, full armed to do battle as man's servant in life's contest. These are they that repose at the base of that glorious tree, calm in the consciousness of their own power, and these are they who will guard it from every harm and guard it forever.

"But now cast your eye to the higher branches and amuse yourselves with the antics of the political monkeys who have scrambled to the top. See them leap from limb to limb, and you may bet your life that the limb to which they leap is the one where the acorns grow. See how fierce and savage they get; how they snap and snarl at one another; how they tug and toil and sweat to push and pull each other off the limbs where the acorns are, and I think the fact is now pretty fully demonstrated that the only beauty that they see in our grand old oak is that it bears acorns. For, take the most fierce and savage of them all, and feed him well on them, and in a wonderfully short period all his ferocity will vanish away, and he will 'coo you gently as a sucking dove.'

"Politics, in its truer and better sense, is unquestionably the highest earthly duty of man, and more especially is this true in this land of ours, where the people are the whole source from which emanates political power. It is not only their privilege but their earnest duty to grapple with and thoroughly master every new thought or principle enunciated or proclaimed in the world of politics. He who does less than this falls short of discharging his whole duty as a member of a free community. When I say that we should all be politicians, I desire no one to understand me as meaning that we should sink ourselves into the miserable blind partisan—the mere follower in the party camp—the mere worshipper of the god of party—but I mean that more noble thing, thinking and acting for ourselves like men who are really free.

"To the people of this country a great trust has been committed—to their keeping the Ark of Human Liberty has been intrusted. Let us watch it with a jealous care; guard it with a sleepless eye; never let the miserable, crawling demagogue, whose only aim is self, lay his unhallowed hands upon it.

"There are those who have thought that when official corruption should, unabashed, rear its miscreated front in the high places of government, and official purity becomes contaminated with the baser passions of the heart, that the inevitable consequence would be the total subversion and destruction of our Republic, and they point to the ruined and decayed governments of the old world to prove the truth of their position. Yet, I apprehend that their conclusions are false, because they are groundless. Between this government and the governments of the old world no analogy can fairly be drawn—their inception is totally different. There, power descends from the throne—here, it ascends from the people. It is true that when the source of power in a government becomes corrupt it must fall, and it is equally true that so long as the seat of power in a government remains true to itself it will stand. Hence the conclusion is irresistible that this government will live until the people themselves become abased and corrupt—and that can never be. At least it can never be until religion and intelligence, the guardian angels of a free people, leave our shores forever. And it cannot be that they will ever depart. It cannot be that ignorance and infidelity will ever descend upon this bright land and brood over it with their gloomy wings. If religious altars are ever thrown down and the light of intelligence extinguished, then it may be that those bright guardians of freedom's temple will prepare to wing their everlasting flight; and sad, strangely, wildly sad, will be that hour. 'Piles of clouds whose darkness will be palpable,' even in the midnight, will brood upon the saddened earth. 'Let us go hence,' will be their song of sorrow. 'Let us go hence,' will swell out in mournful cadence upon the starless air. 'Let us go hence,' will be reverberated by the sad echoes of the mountains, and all earth shall darken in the rayless truth of despotism.

"Yet, therefore, thoughts like these—for us no such gloomy fate awaits our coming. Our country is the final earthly home of truth and liberty. Here they make their last great stand; here they are preparing themselves for their great mission, the regeneration of the earth; here they are arming themselves for their last great battle; here they are forging the thunderbolts that are to shatter to fragments the bulwarks of tyranny.

"Although I have said and spoken as I believed when I said it, that politics and political leaders, in the main, have become corrupt, yet it is a pleasure to have the privilege of truthfully saying that there are some exceptions to this general rule. You will find them in the various political parties of the day. Differing though they do upon matters of lesser import, yet agreeing in the one great desire for the prosperity and glory of our common country. These amid the general corruption, stand like the Abdal of old, amid the faithless, faithful still—stand like lighthouses amid the general gloom, and serve as beacon lights by which Freedom guides her bark through the gathering storm. And it is for us to gather around such men wherever found, and by whatever party name they may be called, and to do to them as was done to the Prophet of old, hold up their hands while they prophecy against the enemies of our country, and so long as we do this we shall triumph over every foe.

"It is a matter of no great import what are the slightest changes in the written parchment laws of a country, free and enlightened like ours. It is still less a matter what party man guides and controls its political destiny; for after all, the great unwritten common laws of truth, religion and freedom that find their home in the American heart, gives shape and direction to our onward march, and will guide us, even in freedom's glorious pathway.

"God has stamped in every enlightened soul these great truths—to be happy you must be free, and to be free you must be virtuous. By the light of these great truths let us ever walk, and the accumulating glories of our after history shall gleam in unclouded splendor, brightened by the smiles of an approving God, and we shall become to the political what the sun is to the physical world, a light, a joy, and a gladness. We shall become the pillar of cloud by day, and the pillar of fire by night, pioneering the nations of earth through the wilderness of despotism to freedom's promised land."

At the conclusion of Mr. Matheny's address Erastus Wright was called out and gave the origin of the name "Suckers," as applied to the people of this State. When Mr. Wright concluded Judge Moffett gave an account of the origin and aims of the society.

At half past twelve o'clock dinner was announced, and the procession was again formed and marched to the tables which were most bountifully spread with substantial food and relishes, furnished by the people of the neighborhood. The dinner was eaten with much relish, and it was an interesting sight to notice the genial and pleasant conversation of the pioneers. The topic discussed was "old times," and each pioneer had some anecdote, or incident, or scrap of history to tell.

As soon as the wants of the inner man had been supplied, the meeting again organized and Martin G. Pulliam, a son of the first settler, was called out. He stated his father's first place was Henry county, Virginia. He emigrated to Kentucky, and from that to this State, to what is now Madison county, but which was then St. Clair, whence he came in 1816 to the "Sangamo" country. His father had six children—Nancy, who married John Bronnell, of Macoupin county; Martin G. Pulliam, of Sangamon; Mary, wife of Mr. Ferris, who removed to Iowa; Margaret, who married S. Peters; and George Washington Pulliam, the youngest, who was born in the shell-house cabin, which formerly stood only a few hundred yards distant.

Mr. Pulliam said he was fifty-two years old on the 17th of September; that he had seven sons and five daughters, and eleven grand children; that he had not an unsound tooth in his head; that he had never smoked a pipe or a cigar, or used a quid of tobacco in his life; and for many years had not tasted a drop of intoxicating liquors. He said he was born about five miles from Alton, on the old Edwardsville road; he could just remember that when a boy, the Indians came down and murdered many of the whites of the settlement, among others the family of Abel Moore. The men were shot in the field while they were plowing. They then went to the house and tomahawked the women, who were boiling soap, and the children were put in soap kettles and boiled up. This happened only one mile from his father's house.

E. D. Taylor, of Chicago, though a former citizen of Sangamon, Munson Carter, Dr. Shields, Elder Prentice, and P. P. Enos made remarks, and the crowd was then adjourned.

RE-ORGANIZATION OF THE SOCIETY.

The year following the first annual celebration of the society was that of 1860. The political excitement at that time being so high, it was deemed best to postpone the annual meeting. The war following, in 1861, continuing over four years, it was impossible to gather men and women together for seasons of rejoicing while fathers, husbands and brothers were upon the tented field, hourly exposed to dangers incident to a time of war. Even after the close of the war, it required time for the minds of men to assume their regular channels. In 1868, the following call was issued and signed by the names accompanying it:

"For the purpose of renewing old associations and reviving recollections of the distant past, the undersigned propose and suggest that on the twentieth day of August next, the old settlers and pioneers of the county meet at Clear Lake. The reunion will be a happy one—the place selected, one of the most desirable in the county. All persons will bring refreshments with them. The selection of the grounds and other arrangements will be attended to by the 'old settlers' residing in the neighborhood of Clear Lake.

The meeting was accordingly held, and of the re-organized society may properly be termed the

FIRST ANNUAL MEETING.

The beautiful park on the east side of Clear Lake was the place selected for the occasion, and by 10 o'clock a large crowd had assembled, including old and young.

After music by the Washington Silver Cornet Band, Strother Jones, of Dawson, called the meeting to order, and a prayer was offered by Rev. Mr. Stafford. At the close of the prayer, Munson Carter, of Rochester, was introduced, and proceeded to make an interesting address, in the course of which he related many incidents of his early life and first appearance in Sangamon county. He said that twenty-eight years ago the 20th of August, he opened a school one and a half miles from Clear Lake, and those who saw the place from 1840 to 1843, little expected to see a gathering like the one now on the shores of Clear Lake. He referred to Sangamon county as being the first in the State in all that constitutes agricultural wealth. Cook county exceeds it in commercial wealth, but in nothing else. He was proud to say that he lived in Sangamon county. He remembered with pleasure the first days he spent in this locality. He was a Yankee, and did not deny his colors. He was then a young pedagogue; but the first days he spent in Clear Lake were the bread and butter days of his life. Then the people had great hearts, and liberal hospitality prevailed, and the people were glad to entertain strangers without price. In this connection, he referred to the early times, when farmers cut their wheat with a sickle, and the neighbors aided each other in the work. Those were good days, and remembered with pleasure by those now present.

David England was next introduced. He stated that in the spring of 1819, his father settled on what was then called Higgins' creek, now Cantrall's creek. He was born in 1811, in Kentucky, and went with his father to Ohio, and from that State came to Sangamon county. He remembered passing through the locality now called Springfield, where there were then a few Indian wigwams. There is a tie, he said, between the old settlers, fresh and strong to-day. He referred to the time when his father, Stephen England, would call a few of the settlers together and preach to them the word of God, and as he warmed up with his subject, he would pull off his coat. Frequently there would be Indians present at these meetings. He also referred to the conduct of the settlers towards emigrants. They were supplied with corn and wheat, as their necessities required, without money and without price. If a family were sick with the ague, they were cared for. But things are changed with the increase of population. He spoke of the time when men who lived within six or ten miles were considered neighbors. Then they had wild honey and an abundance of fresh fish for the taking. Then no man was charged for entertainment—all was free. In this connection, he referred to the great contrast between the present and past with respect to churches and schools. He closed with wishing that the children of the settlers and their children's children might live to enjoy the advantages which came from increased intelligence of the people in religion and all the arts of civilization.

George Anderson, of Springfield, and Samuel Williams, of Rochester, made appropriate remarks, and the meeting adjourned for dinner, a proceeding that few generally objected to.

After dinner, Preston Breckenridge was called out, and commenced with referring to the time he came from Kentucky, and in this connection told many anecdotes illustrating the state of society at that time. When he came to Illinois, Sangamon county was about forty-nine miles square, and in 1834 he did not think there were as many people in Sangamon county as there were people on the grounds to-day. People had then to get seasoned to fever and ague, for everybody had it, and when he inquired how long it required for a person to get seasoned, he was informed nine years, but in his case it required fifteen years. He said that in 1835 there was rainy weather for nearly forty days. There were about forty-two deaths between Buckheart Grove and the South Fork between October, 1834, and October, 1835. Then we had no ready-made coffins, and when he first saw an advertisement of ready-made coffins he thought the man wanted everybody to die. They had to hunt then for planks for coffins. He had known two persons to be buried in one grave. The people should be thankful that they had passed from the times of 1834-5-6.

At this stage of the proceedings a beautiful bouquet was presented to Irwin Pulliam, the oldest settler present.

James H. Matheny was the next speaker. He began by saying that he did not know when he came to the county, but his first recollection was that he was here. His father came to Springfield in 1821, and the change since that time had been great and wondrous. From a wild waste, beauty had sprung into existence. He had been in various sections of the country, and in all his wanderings he had found no place like Sangamon county. If he did not know to the contrary, he should think the Garden of Eden had been located here, and he wondered that a man could be seduced from it by an apple. He said that the first child born in Springfield was that day being borne to her long home—Mrs. Lyman Trumbull, the daughter of Dr. Gershom Jayne. We were all passing away, and soon those that know us would know us no more.

The meeting was in every respect a success. Strother G. Jones was elected President.

SECOND ANNUAL MEETING.

The second regular annual meeting was held at Clear Lake, August 20, 1869. The meeting was called to order by S. G. Jones, President, and an appropriate prayer was offered by Rev. Mr. Holton, of Springfield.

Rev. J. G. Bergen, of Springfield, was introduced, and said he loved to see both old friends and young ones, for he loved them all. He recounted scenes of his early life, and pointed to changes which time had wrought in the fair, bright and beautiful Sucker State. In his youth it required a year and a half to circumscribe the world, and now seventy days suffice to accomplish that object. A mighty God controlled all things, and in His hands the prosperity and glory of the land were unchangeably fixed.

Rev. C. B. Stafford then spoke. He had known this country as a howling wilderness, and in his boyhood nothing but the whoop of the Indians and howl of wolves were heard. Now see the change which had taken place in forty-eight years. When he first came to this country he rocked his child in a sugar trough. They were compelled to plow corn at night, for the prairie flies nearly tortured their horses to death during the day. It took three persons then to plant a row of corn—now we farm on a different scale. We should love God for his good work.

David England was introduced. He remarked that in the spring of 1820 his father built a church—the first in the county. Provisions then had to be hauled one hundred miles. Where the State House now stands, deer were as plenty as in the far west to-day, and they were here killed every day. His father married Philo Beers to Miss Stillman, and he believed it was the first marriage in the county. It was a wonderful event when it happened.

At the conclusion of Mr. England's remarks dinner was announced, and the meeting adjourned for that purpose.

After dinner, Rev. J. W. Taylor, of Illiopolis, Preston Breckenridge and James H. Matheny made some excellent remarks.

The following named officers were elected: Preston Breckenridge, President; Samuel Preston, S. G. Jones, Vice Presidents; John F. King, Secretary.

THIRD ANNUAL MEETING.

The annual meeting for 1870 was held on the 31st day of August, at Clear Lake. A much larger attendance of old people were present than at any former meeting. The day was warm and pleasant, making the shade of the grove delightful.

At about 10 o'clock the meeting was called to order by S. G. Jones, and Rev. Francis Springer was introduced. After imploring Divine guidance upon the meeting, Mr. Springer proceeded to address the audience. His remarks took a wide range with reference to the progress of the country.

At the conclusion of Mr. Springer's address, General Anderson was introduced and made a speech in which he reviewed the organization of the county, and related several anecdotes illustrating early times in Sangamon county. He stated that he came to this county in 1829 and had $30 in money when he came. He borrowed money to pay for the first eighty acres, for which he paid fifty per cent. interest. In the course of his remarks, he gave an account of how he labored in the field while his wife worked in the house manufacturing cloth to clothe the children. He had raised twelve children, and had been able to give each one a home and had enough for himself.

Elisha Price, of Menard, next made a few remarks, when David England was introduced, and made a characteristic speech. He was followed in turn by Samuel A. Grubb, of Springfield; Samuel Williams, of Rochester; Thomas Bond, of Taylorville; Joab Wilkinson, of Macon county, and Job Fletcher. The following is the address of Mr. Williams:

INCIDENTS AND ITEMS OF FRONTIER LIFE, BY SAMUEL WILLIAMS.

"I was born in Windsor county, State of Vermont, on the 24th day of April, A. D. 1800. When I was about four years of age, my father, with his family, emigrated to Essex county, in the State of New York. But few improvements had been made among the forests and there were still some deer in the woods, and I remember that, after a long chase, my father and several of the neighbors killed a large moose.

"During the summer of 1806 I attended school three months. I was present on the day of the great eclipse of the sun, when stars were seen.

"In the summer of 1807 my father removed again, to Tioga county, Pennsylvania; where the improvements were small and some considerable distance apart.

"After remaining in this place some over one year, my parents, with their four children, started for the West.

"Marvelous stories were told by persons from their recent travels in the new State of Ohio. Such wheat, rye, oats and corn had never before been seen as grew on Sciota and Miami river bottoms. They said that they grew so high and thick that if a hen were thrown into the field of grain, there would be no possible chance for it ever to get out by its own exertions, and the corn grew so large and high that when the women went for roasting ears they had to take an axe and cut down the stalks before they could obtain a supply. One morning, my father returned from the lower part of town, and said to his family, 'I have sold the wagon and horses, and engaged our passage on a boat to Ohio, and by night we had embarked, with two other families. After numerous delays, we disembarked, five miles above Cincinnati. We lived three years on the Little Miami river, two or three miles above the mouth of the river. Here, in 1810 and 1811, between spells of the ague, I went to school, three months more, at a distance of three miles.

"In 1812, my father removed to Butler county, near Oxford. The timber was tall, large, and of very thick growth, and my younger brother and myself were engaged in chopping and clearing most of the time for several years.

"One spring, I remember taking part in eighteen log-rollings. It was the custom to select two captains, and they to choose their men; then the ground was carefully divided into two parts. Three or four gallons of whisky were furnished by the proprietors of the premises, as was said, to make the men better able to endure the toil of the day.

"There was generally considerable ambition as to who was to get done first. When all was completed, the proprietor was generally called on to furnish a bucket of egg-nog, as a sequel to the occasion.

"There were no temperance societies then; but, seeing the evil resulting from the prevailing custom of dram drinking, I determined never to indulge in the useless and pernicious habit. The sneers and taunting remarks that I had to endure on these and other public occasions, as being the only one who would neither taste the raw liquor or any of its combinations, may not be imagined. But, though strictly temperate for more than half a century, I think my health will compare very favorably with anyone who has used it for any length of time. During the year 1814, I attended school three or four months more. At the end of the term, I could read readily and spell better than some of my mates who had more favorable opportunities.

"I could not write very much, and had only proceeded as far as simple reduction in arithmetic; but resolved to improve my stock of knowledge. During the winter I usually labored at chopping; at night I would take home a load of hickory bark, for a light; and after my brothers had retired I would frequently spend three or four hours at my studies, four or five hours of sleep being as much as I required out of the twenty-four.

"I also improved other spare minutes at my studies or in trying my skill on mechanical principles, such as cross-bars, wind-mills, etc., etc.

"My stock of tools consisted of a Barlow knife and a gimlet. On June 29, 1817, I confessed my faith in Christ, and was baptized into His church.

"In 1819, my father emigrated to Indiana, where he settled near the head of a stream called the 'Little Flat Rock.' There were no persons, except one family, living within six miles of us.

"In the spring of 1821, my father purchased one hundred and sixty acres of land, situated in the north part of the bounty tract, between the Illinois and Mississippi rivers. Having made the purchase, he commenced making preparations to move to it, as early in the fall as possible.

"During the intervening time, an old acquaintance of my father, in Ohio, living on Blue river, named Elias Thompson, concluded to accompany us to the State of Illinois. Some time early in September, Orange Babbitt, a brother-in-law of Mr. Thompson, on his way with his family from New York to Illinois, called on Mr. Thompson and insisted that he should make immediate preparations, and with his family, accompany him to Illinois, which, after some meditation, he concluded to do. My father was not ready; he had several head of cattle, besides his two ox-teams, and Mr. Thompson had several head of cattle and some hogs which he wished to take along. After consultation, it was determined that the stock should be put together, and that I should accompany Mr. Thompson and Mr. Babbitt and assist in driving the stock, while the range by the way was still good. My father and the rest of the family to follow as soon as possible.

"So, being ready, we started with one ox-team and Mr. Babbitt's fatigued two-horse team, he had driven from New York; so we could make but moderate progress. After some days' travel we reached the White river, and saw as we passed down its bottoms that quite a number of persons had settled here at different points. They had suffered much from ague, and some had left their houses vacant and returned to their old homes. After leaving White river the next we arrived at was Terre Haute, then known as Fort Harrison. We had to lay by here for repairs to our wagons and recruit the teams, for it rained more or less for seventeen days, making the roads very bad.

"When ready we started again, crossed the Wabash river, and after traveling a few miles through timber, we came to the edge of the prairie just at sunset, on a beautiful October evening. I thought it one of the most beautiful sights I ever saw.

"The next morning we commenced crossing the prairie. For a road we had only the track made by a party who had preceded us perhaps not more than four or five weeks, and after several days' travel, we arrived at a grove on a high eminence in the prairie. The growth was almost exclusively lynn, and many of the trees had been peeled by the Indians; I have since been informed that this was a camping place during the war of 1812.

"The next evening we arrived at a beautiful grove on the principal branch of the Okaw. We arrived among almost suffocating clouds of smoke, which arose from the immense amount of burning grass, set on fire for hunting purposes, by a large party of Indians, most of whom encamped in the grove not far from our wagons. They were very civil.

"The next evening a little after dark we arrived at the North fork of the Sangamon river.

"After perhaps about three days' drive we came to the head of some timber on a considerable stream of water, approaching the North fork from the south, perhaps nearly opposite Decatur.

"Next night we camped at the head of the timber on Mosquito creek. One blustery day's travel more brought us to the beautiful grove of large timber near the head of the Buck-heart creek. After a late start in the morning, on account of rain, when we had traveled five miles or more the way the track led us, about sun-set the hogs held up their heads and all started to the south on a running gait for a mile or more. I endeavored in vain to stop them, when in the dusk of the evening, to my great surprise, I came to a fence, around a field of Illinois corn. It was situated near Campbell's point, in Christian county. The teams soon came up. Mr. Titus Gragg, who lived there, received us very kindly, and we slept in a house that night, the first one we had seen since we left the Wabash river.

"From Mr. Gragg's we crossed the south fork of the Sangamon river and Clear creek, and tarried over night with Mr. Jacob Gragg, who then lived about a half a mile south-east of where Breckenridge's mill now stands.

"Next day we passed on to Mr. Henry Funderburk's, on Horse creek.

"After careful inquiry, we could learn nothing of a road leading to the military bounty lands, or even to the Illinois river, and the range having been killed by hard frosts, we concluded to spend the winter somewhere in the neighborhood.

"Mr. Thompson stopped at Gideon Hawley's, on the west side of the south fork of the Sangamon river.

"Mr. Babbitt made an arrangement with the widow Knotts, living on the west side of Sugar creek, to gather her fine field of corn for her for one-fourth of the crop, she to find him house room for his family. I accepted Mr. Babbitt's proposal to winter with him, and to assist him in gathering the corn. My part was sufficient to winter the seventeen head of cattle which I had driven from Indiana.

"Mr. Draper and family wintered in a small log cabin near Mr. Funderburk's. Under the puncheon floor a former occupant had dug a large hole, as a repository for potatoes. In this Mr. Draper, being short of bedding, put a quantity of prairie hay, and at night he would raise up the end of one of the broad hewn puncheons and put his children down, where, among the hay, they would sleep soundly till morning. Thus it was that a Boston merchant's family spent their first winter in Illinois. I think Mr. Draper went to Morgan county, where, as I heard a year or two after, he filled the office of sheriff with much ability, and I have never been able to hear from or see him or his family since.

"On our way to Mrs. Knott's residence, Mr. Babbitt obtained a supply of cornmeal at a band horse mill, owned by Mr. Joseph Drennan; the meal cost twenty-five cents per bushel.

"Having arrived at winter quarters, Mr. Babbitt and I commenced gathering corn. On unfavorable days for gathering corn, we made rails for a Mr. Pulliam. Such rails as pleased him (large ones) we made for thirty-seven and a half cents a hundred, in trade, and found ourselves.

"After the corn was gathered, I called in one evening at Mr. Pulliam's, where, for the first time, I had the pleasure of being introduced to Mr. Charles Wright (a brother of Mr. Erastus Wright, of Springfield, Ill.), who was soon to commence teaching school near the band-mill spoken of before. In course of my conversation with him, I told him that for years I had regretted my inability to attend school, as my inclination to become a good scholar was very great, and it was now seven years since I had been able to go even a single day. I found Mr. Wright a very affable man. He invited me to attend his school whenever I could, if for only a few days at a time; he would consider it a pleasure to render me all the assistance he could.

"I attended twenty-one days, and found him to be an excellent teacher. I improved very much in my reading, writing and spelling during my twenty-one days. While attending school, I would take my arithmetic and slate home with me and cover it with examples, which I would carry to Mr. Wright for his examination, after which I was ready for another day's hard labor.

"From the commencement of the single rule of three to that of square root, I did every example by rule, with but little assistance. With this start, I was able, by the assistance of the rules in my arithmetic, to pass through exchange, the cube root, and other succeeding rules without assistance.

"In January, my parents and a family named Deardoff and George Brunk arrived. They encountered a severe storm, and with much difficulty escaped losing their way on the smooth burnt prairie, on the day of their arrival at the large grove above the Okaw timber.

"In the spring of 1822, my father rented a part of a farm in Fork Prairie, of Field Jarvis. (He measured six feet and eleven inches in height.) The premises now belong to Robert Bell (the south part of his farm).

"During the summer, my brother Joseph broke thirty-six acres of prairie for Mr. Jarvis, for $1.50 per acre, in trade.

"There were many swarms of bees here in the timber in 1822, not having been hunted out so early in this part of the State as the north part. Early this spring, my father and I concluded on a bee hunting excursion. Being ready, we put into a covered wagon two large new vessels, as a repository for honey, two or three buckets, some cooking utensils, provisions, corn for the oxen, axes, a tent cloth, some dressed buckskin, and thread to repair torn pants, two or three books, etc. About the 10th of March, we started east. The first night, we encamped in the Buck Hart grove, the second night on Mosquito creek, opposite to the two mounds in the prairie. The next day being too cold for bees to fly, we passed on to the creek before spoken of, entering into the north fork from the south. Here we pitched our tent, and remained three or four weeks, not more than one or two days, or parts of days, in a week being warm enough for bees to fly.

"My father usually kept camp, assisted in cutting trees, etc., but I did the hunting.

"In the timber on this stream, I found thirty or thirty-three bee trees.

"Here, on one very favorable day, I found ten, the greatest number I ever found on one day, the common average on good days being from two to seven.

"We returned home with about forty-five gallons of honey, and fifty or sixty pounds of beeswax.

"Soon after our arrival at home I went to town to sell the wax, in company with two or three other persons. This was my first visit to Springfield. The south fork of the Sangamon was high. Here, for the first time, I saw Mr. Edward Clark and his brother Philip. They with several hands, were busy preparing timbers for their mill. They sent over a man and their canoe to assist us in crossing. We had to swim our horses over by the side of the canoe, one at a time. When all was over we proceeded on to town. Mr. Elijah Iles was the only merchant here then; he kept his store in a log house, some distance northwest of what afterwards became the public square. I found him at leisure, he was quite social, and we soon made a trade, he giving me twenty-five cents per pound, chiefly in goods. There was not more than a dozen houses in town, if that many. In the fall, my father and I went out again to hunt bees; camping the first nights at the same localities as in the spring. We proceeded on slowly, hunting up the North Fork timber till we came to the place where we struck it when moving. The bees were not plenty on this stream; we found about forty bee-trees this time. My father was unwell here for several days, which detained us longer than we had anticipated.

"There was much rainy weather at this time. During the first afternoon of our encampment here, a Pennsylvania Dutchman arrived at our camp on horseback, in a drenching rain. He was on his way to the Military Tract, to examine a piece of land. He passed the night with us, and seemed quite intelligent on general matters, but was much discouraged.

"Looking down the bluff at the North Fork he enquired its name. On being told, he seemed much dejected, and exclaimed, in his Dutch accent: "If that is the Sangamon river, of which I heard so much, I was badly deceived." He was on the point of turning back for home when, from the number of his land, my father thought it might be valuable, and persuaded him to go and see it.

"He went on and found it a valuable tract in the Ross settlement, about twelve or fifteen miles from the mouth of Spoon river.

"He returned the day before we were intending to return home. He was in good spirits, now that his one hundred and sixty acres were valuable, and he intended to make his final home there. He was very thankful to my father for his advice, and in the morning, after breakfast, we bade each other a friendly adieu, he starting for his home and we for ours.

"During all our travels of these two excursions we saw no white man save the Dutchman. On the fourth day of March, 1823, my father and I started east for another bee-hunt. The third day being warm, I found three trees on Mosquito creek, near its head. From this point we struck off to the right of the North Fork and found seventy trees on the first branches of the Okaw, or Kaskaskia, river. We cut forty and left three others to stand till fall. In August my father died, and in the fall one of my brothers accompanied me to cut the bee-trees left standing in the spring. In the spring and fall of 1824, I went in the employ of Mr. Thompson to hunt bees.

"I think at the end of the season we came out even, finding one hundred and fifty trees each. If Major Iles has his old merchantile books they will show that Mr. Thompson and I dealt with him on a liberal scale in bees-wax. In all our hunting this year for miles up and down the different branches of the Okaw, we found no place where a white man had either settled or commenced an improvement. We admired much of the beautiful prairie situated on the east and south sides of the North Fork, and some situated on the Okaw; but we entertained no idea that one hundredth part of what we saw would sell for Congress prices during a common life time.

"So much in reference to bee-hunting, and the uninhabited country of Central Illinois, seen between the spring of 1822, and fall of 1824.

"Late in the fall of 1822, my father and I started on foot for the military bounty land to examine the land, and ascertain the situation of the one hundred and sixty acre-tract, purchased while in Indiana. We passed north from Springfield, crossed the Sangamon river at the ferry, near where the bridge was afterwards built. Then we soon turned to the left and crossed Salt creek near its mouth.

"Not far from this we saw the ashes, yet fresh, where a Mr. Hawley had encamped on his way to convey a widow woman to some place, but in attempting to ascertain the depth of the ford, was drowned. Though I had never seen the man, my sympathy went out to his bereaved family when they heard the sad news. We went on till near the Illinois river, where we saw a man, but he could tell us little about the country. He thought there might be one or two settlers on the south side of the Spoon river, eight or ten miles above its mouth, he was not certain. We had with us some provisions, a gun, a hatchet, and a pocket compass.

"When we arrived at the Illinois river we got some Indians to take us over in a canoe. The land we wished to see lay in township twelve north, range two west, the southwest quarter of section thirteen. We traveled west from the river for some distance, and after a long search in the timber found a surveyor's corner. I knew how the sections were numbered, beginning at the northeast corner of each township. On examination, I found we were about sixty miles south of the land.

"Mr. Babbit's land lay in town, five or six north, range two east. We got to it, finding it a rather broken, hickory and oak land. It appeared poor to us and so we reported it to him, but perhaps it is valuable now. Our provisions run short, and finding no game, we turned down Spoon river but could find no houses. We tried to cross over to the Ross settlement, but the river was very high, running swiftly over the bottoms, and we could not cross, so we concluded to return; and re-crossed the Illinois river where we did before. We had now traveled sixty or seventy miles, over the military lands. Part of our route was over rough, broken timbered land, and part over rolling prairies. We did not see one white man or a house, west of the river. From this point we returned home by the same road that we came.

"Sometime in September, 1825, I started alone to see the military lands. I rode part of the way this time, and besides other necessary things took a hatchet with me, to cut off the new growth which now partly covered the surveyor's marks. I crossed the Illinois and Spoon rivers, near the mouth of the latter, and passed the night at a house, perhaps twelve miles distant on my way.

"In the night my horse escaped and could not be found in the morning. So with my hatchet and some provisions, I started on foot to prosecute my purpose. I found the way rather rough for some distance in the vicinity of the Spoon river and some of its tributaries, but as I passed further, I found beautiful, rich rolling prairies, extending far to the north, intersected occasionally with points of timber. After miles of travel I arrived at a small stream of water surrounded by beautiful timber, and running a northwest, course for several miles.

"After searching sometime in the timber I found a surveyor's line, traced it on west, to a corner stone, and found I was six miles east of the southeast corner of the land which I wished to see. I had to guess as nearly as I could where the land lay. I passed on until I supposed I had reached the center of the tract. The stream I supposed to be a branch of Henderson river, passed through the land; it was here about twelve or thirteen inches deep, with a swift current. It was now growing dark, my tinder had become damp and with only my knife and flint I could not start a fire, and being unable to do better, I laid down by the side of a big fallen tree with a light blanket over me, in a rain storm till morning. When I arose, so far as I could ascertain, there was no settlement or road leading in the direction of this land higher than thirty-five or forty miles; hence, the idea of attempting to settle on it under existing circumstances, while good land was plenty in Sangamon county, seemed to me to be unadvisable.

"On my return, having walked a hundred miles or more, and camped out every night, I was glad to obtain my horse again. The man at whose house I staid over had found it soon after I left. After two or three days travel I reached home not caring much for the one hundred and sixty acres, except that it had been the primary means of inducing us to leave the back country for the beautiful State of Illinois. These events all occurred before the close of the fall season in 1825.

"Among the numerous privations endured by some of the earliest settlers of Sangamon county, none was felt more sensibly than the lack of schools. In different localities one or two families might be found having few or many children. The parents felt anxious to see their intellectual faculties cultivated; but what were they to do? three or five children were too few to constitute a school. In connection with this, if in some neighborhoods a small school could be made up, where was a competent teacher to be found to instruct them? But this state of things could not long last in Sangamon county. Emigrants were coming in from both the Southern and Eastern States, and children in sufficient numbers to make up schools would not long be lacking.

"In the summer of 1824, Daniel Parkinson and one or two others insisted that I should teach their children. I was aware that my limited education and experience rendered me inadequate to perform so great a task, and I expressed my feelings freely to Mr. Parkinson. In reply he said that the few children in the neighborhood greatly needed instruction; that the most of them had never been to school, and that to teach them to read and spell was all that was necessary in the present instance. After some hesitation I consented to teach for a few days—not for any limited time.

"With a little band of ten or twelve dutiful children I labored for the space of three months. The children made good progress in their studies, and at the end of the school I had the pleasure to know that my employers were well satisfied.

"Mr. Parkinson, Mr. Warwick, and one or two others were patrons of the school. Also Francis Cooper, who afterwards married George Dickson, attended.

"I placed but little confidence in the predictions of some that in process of time the inexperienced teacher would become a good school-master.

"About this time Mr. Parkinson loaned me Lindley Murray's Grammar to peruse; it was the first grammar I think that I ever held in my hands.

"I soon saw that it would afford me much useful knowledge, so purchased it for my own private use, not supposing at the time I would ever teach again.

"Late in November, 1823, Mr. Thomas Black, who lived on Sugar creek, sent word that he wanted to see me. I went and found him in his cornfield, with his boys, busily engaged gathering corn. He was glad to see me, and said he had heard of my teaching in the 'forks' (of the Sangamon river), and had sent for me. He went on to state that there were several children in the neighborhood who ought to be at school, but not persons enough who would send to make up a school by subscription. Under these circumstances, he had concluded to hire some one to teach three months for the benefit of his own children and others that could be induced to attend. He proposed if I would teach to give me $12 in trade per month and board me, I to teach all children that should attend for a term of three months. I told Mr. Black that my opportunities for obtaining an education had been very unfavorable, so much so that I knew I was not well prepared to teach school. He thought as none of the children were far advanced, and the most of them would have to commence with the a, b, c's, I would be fully competent to teach the school. After some hesitation I accepted the offer.

"About the 1st of December, 1823, I commenced. I cannot now recollect the names of the persons who sent to this school, but will name those who are remembered: Thomas Black, James Patton, William Woods, Herman Husbands, Widows Paine and Stout, Mr. Crow and Noah Mason. Besides these, Ezekiel Drennan (son of old William Drennan) attended most of the winter and Charles D. Nuckolls several days; most of the scholars called him Dab Nuckolls. Such orderly and studious scholars as attended this school are a credit to any community. I now considered my position as a very responsible one, and I, not to betray such confidence as had been reposed in me, therefore improved my spare hours in studying my grammar, dictionary and other available helps, that I might improve myself and be the better able to teach my pupils.

In December, 1824, I commenced a school on Horse creek. The employers' names were, as far as I can remember: Joseph Dickson, Henry Funderburk, Mr. Neely, two of the Fergusons, Mordecai Hamilton, Elias Thompson and James Snodgrass, Jr. Besides these, some other persons sent occasionally.

"In the summer of 1825 I taught in the Southwick settlement. The employers were Mr. Southwick, Dexter Pease, William Seeley, Zackariah Peter, Mr. Stout, Widow Paine, Mr. Fwist, and a Mr. Harty. I still remember with pleasure many agreeable hours spent with my employers around their social firesides.

"In December, 1825, my brother Elias and I concluded to go to Edwardsville to see a man who had advertised some land to sell in the Military Tract. We hoped to be able to obtain some on terms within our reach, and if we did not succeed in this, we would search for employment for which we could obtain our pay in money; there being no chance to obtain money in Sangamon. With some provisions in an old knapsack, and between two and three dollars in money, and not a garment except those in use, we started on a clear but cold December day for Edwardsville. We reached Macoupin point late in the afternoon, but thought we could make the nearest point on the St. Louis (twelve miles distant) road before dark, but got on the wrong road and had to travel about eight or ten miles farther, when we came to a Mr. Stewarts, seven miles from Hillsboro; we enquired how far we were from Macoupin Point, and he said twenty-one miles. The reason I mention this is to show how far it was in 1825 from Macoupin Point to the first house on the Hillsboro road. As we proceeded toward Edwardsville the houses became rather more frequent. On inquiry we found that the man we had come to see was not at home, and as we could get nothing to do, we proceeded on toward St. Louis; the weather being very cold. We tarried over night at a house in the Great American Bottom, but could hear of no demand for labor in this neighborhood, so started the next morning for St. Louis. When we arrived at Wiggins' ferry, opposite St. Louis, we found we would have to wait, as the boat could not cross on account of running ice in the river. We here met Governor Edwards, who was very talkative and jolly. The Governor came to us and asked us where we were going, and where we were from? When I had told him what had induced us to leave our home in Sangamon, he said as it was now winter, and as there are many blacks in St. Louis, I think the chances for employment there must be unfavorable; but times are good down Missouri, at the lead mines, on Sandy creek, thirty-five or forty miles below St. Louis, and I think you can do better there, as labor is in demand. We told him that we were used to hard labor, but that we had heard that there were many rough characters at the mines, so felt a degree of hesitancy about going to that place.

"The Governor replied: 'I am aware that what you say is true, but I think you can do well at the mines; industrious men who are quiet, will find friends, and be respected there, and he added: I am acquainted with Mr. Glasgow and Bryant, proprietors at the Sandy Mines, and if you will conclude to go down I will write a line or two to them, and state your case to them.'

"After some consultation with Ellis, we concluded to go to the mines. To think that so intelligent a man as Governor Edwards should manifest so warm an interest in behalf of two youthful strangers, was very encouraging to us.

"After taking leave of the Governor we started for the lead mines. About night of the second day we arrived at the ferry opposite the Herculaneum. The ice was still running in the river, in the morning. After some delay we crossed and reached the mines, eight miles distant, in good time. We staid there fifteen months, cutting cord wood and working in the lead mines. We then went to Galena, where we staid two years and nine months, making in all about four years we were in the mines."

FOURTH ANNUAL MEETING.

Cherry grove, or Irwin's grove was selected as the place for the fourth annual meeting of the Old Settlers of Sangamon county. Cherry grove is a beautiful and romantic spot, containing forty acres of most magnificent timber, perfectly cleared from undergrowth and brush, and presenting a deep, unbroken shade, with a carpet under your feet of the deepest green. The speakers' stand was beautifully decorated with wreaths, evergreens and blooming flowers, over which floated that grand old banner, the stars and stripes. A large number of dignified looking old settlers, attired in their best, and appearing as young as the youngest settlers in the crowd, graced the platform. Among others were William Drennan, Wilson Dodds, Elijah Hies, S. G. Nesbitt, Samuel Cloyd, Samuel Grubb, John B. Weber, J. C. Bone, Henry Converse, Isaac and E. B. Hawley, Jacob Ball, R. Coley, George Miller, Job Fletcher, Robert Wilburn, James Parkinson, D. Wadsworth, James W. Patton, Squire Campbell, E. Barnes, George Weaver, P. Wyman, James Scott, Uriah Mann, D. H. Shennan, Joel Johnson, J. R. Coleman, John Brownell, Davis Meredith, John DeCamp and William Sutton, together with Mother Archer, seventy-eight years of age, and who has lived in the county since 1821, making her the oldest lady settler.

After prayer by Daniel Wadsworth, the President, Preston Breckenridge, called the meeting to order and expressed his gratification at meeting so many old friends. Samuel Williams was then introduced and made a few remarks, after which John M. Palmer was introduced and proceeded to deliver one of his happiest and most effective speeches. He said it was a true, sincere pleasure to be present at this meeting. He saw gentlemen before him who had known this county when it contained less than three hundred people; when Springfield existed only in name. We can hardly comprehend the past and its difference from the present. Young ladies can hardly comprehend that the women of other days could be beautiful, wearing only their own hair, and yet those women were as lovely as those of to-day. Thank God, this idea will last for a life-time. We see not the change in the faces of those we love, but love them more and more as time goes steadily on. He knows a wealthy citizen of Sangamon who came here on foot, with only a horse, axe and gun. That was the stuff of the old settlers. We love and honor the memory and associations of men of the past, for they are worthy our love and respect. At one time in his life he thought the driver of a six-horse team occupied the highest position in the world. He had been strongly democratic in his opinions in regard to the rights of the people, among which were cutting timber where they wished, and taking up hogs running at large. The people in early days considered this legitimate, and he must confess at this time he thought so to. He remembered how sparring was performed forty years ago, and had taken a part in it himself. The best plan was to take a sweet young lady behind you on horseback, and this method was thought style. If you had no horse, you must do your sparring in some other style, for it had to be done. He wore a liney coat down to his knees, and his father a dress coat, brass buttons, and a bell-crowned hat. He granted the superiority of the educational advantages of to-day, yet education could not make purer, sterner, better men than the men of the past. Now the noblest of all colleges, the common school, is open to all, and God bless the efforts of our young men to make themselves great and good. His reading book was called "Citizen of the World," and each scholar read such works as he could get. He remembered the singing schools, when the girls sang "fine hand," and squealed high up. The men who are passing are worthy the imitation of the present generation, and it was his fervent prayer that they would follow the bright example set them by their fathers, who had gone before. The Governor concluded with a brilliant and touching tribute to the old settlers, and was greeted at its close with three hearty cheers.

A letter of regret was read from John A. McClernand, and short speeches were made by James H. Matheny and John T. Stuart. The following resolution was then adopted:

"Resolved, That whereas his Excellency, the Governor, an eminent statesman and profound lawyer, in his address this morning, clearly showed that two of the old settlers of this county, to-wit: Weber and Hawley, were not entitled to vote, in consequence of their being unnaturalized citizens, not having had the ague or chills and fever during their residence of forty-nine or fifty years; that it respectfully requests that his Excellency, the Governor, and all good citizens, unite in using their influence in effecting the passage of an act of the next legislature of the State, whereby the said parties may be properly entitled to the rights of franchise."

Preston Breckenridge was re-elected President; Noah Mason, Vice President, and Thomas Parks, Secretary.

FIFTH ANNUAL MEETING.

The thirtieth day of August, 1872, was the day set apart for the fifth annual meeting of the Old Settlers' Society. On that day the pioneers again met together.

As a change in the usual programme, the society proceeded at once to the election of officers for the ensuing year. Job Fletcher was elected President, with seventy Vice Presidents, and Noah W. Matheny, Secretary. After dinner, General John A. McClernand was introduced and spoke about three-fourths of an hour in a chaste and eloquent style. The next speech was by Rev. William J. Rutledge. He said that thirty-three years before he had run a saw-mill on Spring creek and sawed stringers used in laying the track of the first railroad ever built in the State of Illinois. The latter part of his speech was exceedingly humorous and closed amid a roar of laughter. Major Elijah Iles then took the stand and in a conversational way related many interesting incidents of his experience among the early settlers. He was followed by Revs. J. D. Randall, of Edwardsville, and William S. Prentice and F. H. Wines, of Springfield. George R. Weber made the closing speech, and the meeting adjourned.

SIXTH ANNUAL MEETING.

This meeting was held at Irwin's grove, near Pleasant Plains, August 29, 1873. Job Fletcher called the meeting to order, and John Slater, of Pleasant Plains, delivered an address of welcome. John M. Palmer was the first speaker. He said:

"Fifty years may be easily spoken—it is easy to pronounce the words—yet the term includes the lifetime of the majority of men and women of the country, and speaks the entire history of the State. If I inquire what was the condition of the country fifty years ago, Major Iles, or other ladies and gentlemen here, could tell; yet if I were to tell the young people here of the comforts and conveniences of those early times, they wouldn't believe it.

"You have now more comforts, but no more happiness, than had we; you have a great many things to be thankful for, and so had we; and you have things to make you uncomfortable that we didn't have. Look over the young ladies' toggery of to-day—the flounces, the ruffles, and—I don't know what you call them. Thirty or forty years ago, we didn't have them, and didn't even know what they were. Now a young gentleman and lady about getting married, or, rather, just married, require a house with six rooms, while we had no trouble, forty or fifty years ago, getting along with but one room, and to have two rooms and a kitchen was considered extravagant. Then we had only an axe, a saw, and an augur with which to build a house; then these tools composed a full carpenter's kit; and we sometimes had only the axe and saw.

"Now, I will just make two heads to my speech, and will speak to the young first; they will be the old settlers hereafter. The number behind you, young people, is becoming more numerous, and the number before you less. By and by, you will go into an audience, and find yourself among the oldest. It was so in my case. I used to find myself in an audience when I was among the youngest; then again I would find myself younger than a few present; but now it is frequently occurring, in a chance meeting, that I am the oldest in the party. I said a little while ago that the young here wouldn't believe, if told what the country was forty or fifty years ago, and the reason is plain. A boy here cannot realize a country without railroads, for since his childhood he has seen the railroad. Young people can't realize the fact that forty or fifty years ago men traveled by 'taking a point,' for there were no roads, and by thus sighting a direction, made their way. I have, myself, within forty years, sighted a point, and, as it were; struck out on a 'bee line,' meeting plenty of deer on the prairie; but there are no deer now.

No, the young people cannot realize this. I came into Madison county forty-two years ago. It was not common to be sued then; it was considered disreputable, and a suit was called a 'patch upon the back.' To have a mortgage upon your farm was whispered around as a calamity. The habits of life then were frugal and simple, and the people were simple and plain, and perhaps as corrupt as now. I was talking to a gentleman, the other day, who was speaking of the corruption now, and its lack in the past; but, as I said to him, there was nothing to steal but a horse. A horse then was the most valuable property, and if a man stole a horse, he was apt to hear of it again; then the means of catching a thief were more simple and direct than now. Horse theft was a capital offense, and killing a man a—serious offense."

Referring to domestic experiences of forty years ago, the Governor said:

"The houses of that day were not like those of the present. I recollect of but one brick house between Madison and Sangamon—it was near where Waverly now stands. [Water was here handed the speaker in a gourd, and drinking it, he remarked it smacked of old times.] In those days when a young couple married, the neighbors turned out to make boards for the house, and puncheon floors were put down. Still the couples were happy; as happy as couples are now. Now when a young couple marry, the carpenters come, and the upholsterers, and prepare the house, and thousands of dollars are spent in fixing it, and often with regret that there was no more money to spend.

"I recollect attending a wedding party when I was quite a young man. There was no band, but instead, the real old-fashioned orthodox fiddle. After dancing all night, my feet were quite sore in the morning, but I had enjoyed myself. The reason my feet were sore was because I danced in my bare feet; but my partner did the same. There was a story told about finding toe nails upon the floor (it was a puncheon floor)—but I didn't believe the story.

"You young ladies and gentlemen have ideas about social pleasures that we knew nothing about. You have carriages; and coming here to-day I noticed one young lady and gentleman riding on horseback, but they had two horses. We didn't do that way, one horse only being used, and the girl was taken up behind. I well recollect the pleasantest ride I ever had in my life. I had the finest horse, but as the saying was, it was a 'borred one.' I took the girl to church, seven miles, and she rode behind me. I felt ticklish and bashful and so was she, and she could hardly take hold of me at first to hold on, but she got used to it, as, nearing the church, she found others mounted the same way. There was always a strife as to who had the prettiest girl and the best horse, but I always thought I was ahead in that respect. Now we couldn't ride double, as the lady is even larger than myself, and I am no pigmy; and we couldn't get a horse to carry us. But now let a gentleman ask a young lady to ride, and she will say, 'Where is the buggy?' I didn't know what a buggy was then; I knew about a 'Dearbon' and a 'gig.' The first gig I ever saw Judge Smith, of Madison, owned. I was proud when I got a gig afterwards. I got it when at court in Montgomery county, and was so proud that I got my wife a new dress that cost $4.50, and there was seven yards in it."

Referring to the arduous duties of the pioneer wives, to whom he paid a glorious tribute, the Governor related an anecdote of a woman returning to Tennessee, who declared that "Illinois was a good place for men and horses, but the devil on women and oxen."

Addressing the early settlers, the Governor said:

"We had indeed our troubles and trials, and the abandoned graves of early settlers are a part of our early history; for we sorrowed then as

now. We, too shall pass away, and fifty years from now these young people will meet here to tell the young people of that day the customs, then doubtless considered outlandish, of this time. Civilization will continue to advance. We can scarce conceive progress of the arts and sciences of the next fifty years, but I do not wish to see it. I do not wish to be trampled upon by the rapidly advancing strides of civilization; and it is a dispensation of Providence that having acted our part, having fulfilled our destiny, having done that work which was set apart for us to do, we can then depart and peacefully pass to the other shore. To the old women let me say: No wives ever so well acted their parts as the wives of the pioneers; and passing away they will not be forgotten. So of the pioneers—not in monuments, but in more lasting memoirs, the works which 'live after them,' will their memories be cherished by their descendants for whom they have worked."

Upon the conclusion of Governor Palmer's address, and music by the band, Captain Fletcher, the president of the society, with humorous allusion to the food of other days—venison, corn bread and onions, and that about noon was the old settlers' dinner hour, declared the celebration adjourned for dinner.

Among the old settlers present at this meeting were Mrs. Peter Cartwright, Mrs. Richard Latham, Mrs. James Parkinson, Elijah Iles, John Williams, M. K. Anderson, Job Fletcher, Martin Heuber, S. M. Wilson, Edwin Perkins, Joel Johnson, George R. Weber, the Mathenys, and others.

After dinner D. L. Phillips was introduced, and said:

"If I live a month or two longer I shall have lived in the State fifty years, and my memory goes back to the time of the cotton gins. I remember the removal of the seat of government from Vandalia to Springfield; and I recollect, too, the grumbling of the people when it was said that the capital had been removed way up in the Indian country.

"I remember the picking of flax and of cotton, and the meeting at night for that purpose. The wearing apparel of that period, to which allusion has been made, I do not forget. There were no schools then. Governor Palmer has spoken of the young men of the present day, felicitously situated with reference to educational facilities, and as they are; but the youth of those days struggled hard for an education. It was not an illiterate age, nor an age of ignorance or lack of mental culture. I have no reputation to lose in saying that I never went to school three months in my life.

"Governor Palmer referred to the felicitous situation of the young men of the present day in other respects. Do they recollect the hardships of the past? I have seen young men and women who had walked bare-footed to the church door putting on and lacing their shoes previous to entrance.

"The tribute paid to the wives of pioneers, by Governor Palmer, thrilled me. His eulogy of the hard-working women of that day I most heartily endorse, because in these days there is a tendency on the part of the people to degrade the working women, to characterize the attendance to domestic duties as domestic servitude."

Referring to the moral and religious influences of that day, the speaker eloquently paid tribute to it:

"They were religious in the primitive and orthodox manner. Why, had it been announced that the great man, the pioneer preacher, whose honored remains, I understand, lie in your vicinity, would preach upon a certain occasion, not a house, not a barn, scarcely any building would contain the people who would flock to hear him expound the gospel. How different now in this materialistic age! Who cares who preaches next Sunday in Springfield? How few! Is the fame of your preacher so limited? Then you heard nothing of the protoplasmic theories of this materialistic age. 'Twas religion pure and simple then. To the moral ideas of that time, thus inculcated, is due the prosperity of Illinois, and I bear testimony to that fact.

"The early settlers in these manifold trials grappled with the Indians; grappled with diseases and overcome them. They spent honored and glorious lives, and who does not honor those who have placed this State fourth in the Union, with more acreage under cultivation than any other State, and given it better settlers than the State ever before had. For all this you are indebted to the old settlers at this re-union to-day.

"May the departure of the old settlers be a peaceful one, and may we gather at the river and be permitted to enter the shining gates upon the other side."

Russel Godfrey, of Menard county; John Thompson, of Cass county; R. W. Diller, of Springfield; Isaac Cogdell, of Menard county; M. K. Anderson and George R. Weber, each made remarks.

S. M. Wilson, of Pleasant Plains, was elected President; James Parkinson, of Curran, Vice President; Noah W. Matheny, of Springfield, Secretary.

SEVENTH ANNUAL MEETING.

The seventh annual meeting of the society was held September 10, 1874. Crow's mill, a most romantic spot, situated about eight miles southeast of Springfield, was the place selected. The day was excessively warm, but still all seemed to enjoy themselves well. In a dense and beautiful grove the stand was erected. Upon the stand were seated many of the oldest and best known citizens of the county, among whom were R. W. Diller, George Gregory, A. B. Irwin, Craig White, S. G. Jones, Davis Meredith, Joseph Meredith, William Burtle, J. W. Keyes, Dr. Shields, S. G. Nesbitt, Philomen Stout, M. Wilmot, Preston Breckenridge, D. Funderburk, Job Fletcher and Jacob N. Fullenwider.

The first speaker introduced was the genial and popular old settler, James H. Matheny. The Judge was in his happiest vein, and appeared fully to enter into the spirit of the occasion. His speech was one of his best and happiest efforts, replete with wit, poetry and sentiment, overflowing with genuine and pure eloquence. It sparkled, it flashed and dashed full of happy conceits and beautiful thoughts. He recalled the days of the early settlement of the county; paid an eloquent and deserving tribute to the old settler; spoke of his privations and trials, and gave him all due and proper credit for his exertions, his efforts and his toils.

John M. Palmer, Andrew Simpson, William M. Springer, Joseph Meredith and Mr. Slater were called out, and responded with appropriate remarks.

William Burtle was elected President for the ensuing year; A. B. Irwin and Davis Meredith, Vice Presidents; N. W. Matheny, Secretary.

EIGHTH ANNUAL MEETING.

Cantrall's Grove, in the north part of the county, was the place selected for the eighth annual meeting, and Menard county old settlers had been invited to meet with the old settlers of Sangamon. The meeting was late in being called to order. Rev. Mr. Vawter, of Cantrall, delivered the address of welcome and offered prayer.

Governor Palmer was the first speaker. After a general introductory the Governor made some home thrusts in opposition to the fulsome flattery often indulged in on old settlers' days. He quoted and expanded upon a remark of Judge Gillespie that they might talk now-a-days about "women's rights," but it took the old settlers to do justice to the question; for a striking characteristic of the old settler was an indisposition to meddle in the affairs of women, who, in these days, were quite secure in all their prerogatives. Who ever knew an old settler to do his wife's milking, or to lend her any help whatever about the house?

Isaac Cogdell, of Menard county, was the next speaker, and was followed by D. L. Phillips. The last speaker paid a glowing tribute to the old settler, and also to the civilization of the nineteenth century. "For this sturdy civilization," said the speaker, "we are indebted to the old settler more than we know. But the life of an old settler was at best but a hard one; deprived of the advantages of free schools and condemned to labor. Governor Palmer, in his speech, had ascribed happiness to the old settlers; but they could not be so happy as now under more favorable circumstances, and in fact they did not expect it. The very preaching of that day was of trials and troubles, and the necessity for submission. A gloomy, sombre view of life was taken, and the teachings of that day was to expect no ease or comfort here, but to look for it beyond." The speaker compared the lack of advantages for farming as late even as the period of 1840, with the facilities now offered for the production of crops; and his account of going to mill, in his boyhood, astride of a bag of corn, to wait all day and all night for his grist, was well told.

Elder John England, of Ogle county, in response to a call, said that he would indulge in a few off-hand remarks. This gathering, said he, was one of old settlers. His father had come here in 1818, and, had he time, he would like to recount incidents connected with his playing with Indian boys—for fear of Indians was not then one of the trials and tribulations of pioneer times. The old settlers met now to show what it cost to lay the foundation of such a civilization as the present. They often went to church bare-footed, and like Governor Palmer, he was proud of his first pair of boots, which, by the way had been made for him by Wyatt Cantrall, now here on the platform. Hospitality distinguished the early settler, as well as liberality of religious sentiment. A traveling preacher was gladly entertained, his denomination not asked, and he was received by all as a brother.

James C. Conkling next mounted the stand and delivered a short, but excellent address.

Alexander B. Irwin was elected President, and E. C. Matheny, Secretary.

NINTH ANNUAL MEETING.

The ninth annual re-union of old settlers was held at the Fair Ground, near Springfield, August 31, 1876, and attracted an audience numbering thousands. Among the old settlers occupying places in and about the stand were R. A. Hazlett, W. T. Boyer, Albion Knotts, George McDaniels, S. T. Cantrall, J. W. Jones, H. D. Lyon, Moses Laswell, Horace Hickox, J. R. Sanders, W. A. Whiteside, Mrs. J. R. Sanders, George B. Merryman, Mrs. George B. Merryman, James M. Reed, John Sims, M. K. Anderson, J. H. Fullenwider, S. Wood, E. R. Perkins, John M. Matthew, W. H. Herndon, J. H. Matheny, John North, S. E. Wilcoxson, Goodrich Lightfoot, Samuel Miller, E. F. McConnell, George R. Weber, W. H. Marsh, C. S. Cantrall, A. R. Robinson, H. Alkire, Mrs. Elizabeth Sollers, John Capps, William Shumate, Joseph Shepherd, R. D. Brown, John Busher, William S. Burch, Preston Breckenridge, Mrs. N. J. Le Claire, D. P. Robinson, Russell Godby, James Good, J. D. McMurray, James Parkinson, J. M. Cartmell, J. H. Ellis, Samuel Fredge, M. A. Cartwright, A. J. Kane, John De Camp, William A. Grant, Isaac Berry, John Williams, J. L. Shinkle and others.

The meeting was called to order by M. K. Anderson, who introduced James H. Matheny, who made one of his old-fashioned speeches. Alfred Orendorff was next introduced. He referred in glowing terms to the progress being made in the development of the country, and the part the pioneers had taken in the work. "Illinois," said he, "the State they had reclaimed from Indian barbarism to civilization has a grand history, and especially so Central Illinois. The State's career of prosperity now ranked it third in the Union. But look at her men; look at her brilliant coterie of intellect which thirty years ago moved amid these scenes—Baker, the orator and soldier; the gallant Shields; our own Judge Logan, still with us, the illustrious lawyer of that time; Stephen A. Douglas, the statesman and patriot, whose last act was to sacrifice partisanship in the interest of patriotism; and then Lincoln, a name synonymous through the world's greatness, with honor and fidelity and goodness; a name reflecting the world's honor upon this section of country. With such a history Sangamon county should be proud and go on in its career of prosperity."

William H. Herndon, the next speaker, had never, save last year, attended the Old Settlers' re-union. He came now prepared to speak in his own way. On behalf of the President of the Society he extended a hearty welcome to all present. "Look into the history of Sangamon county. Geographically, it is about the centre of Illinois, and nearly the centre of the United States. Here is fertility of soil greater than elsewhere, and people the equal of any. But this was not always so. The advantages now enjoyed, our prosperous condition, was largely due to the pioneers who coming here grappled with the trials incident to a pioneer's life. It took men and women of nerve to battle with life in the wilderness, and the result of that battling was seen here to-day in our prosperity and the happy presence of the old settlers and their descendants. It was well. The like of such pioneers we should never see again, unless in the far west." The speaker illustrated the trials of pioneer life by an incident in his childhood's days, when, his father being absent, his mother, by almost superhuman exertions, saved her family from an attack of an Indian war band. Alluding to the mode of life in early days, he said crime was almost unknown; social life was characterized by the largest hospitality to strangers. Now selfishness ruled—"every man for himself." Early religious effort was fervent; men and women were unmistakably pious; there was true worship. Now we mainly worship form and fashion rather than the Deity. He paid a high compliment to the missionary zeal of Peter Cartwright, one of whose sons occupied a place on the platform. There were now great changes; but having faith in an illimitable Supreme Being, he hoped the changes might be improvement, opening to a grander sphere. Specifically alluding to these changes, Mr. Herndon said:—"Now let us look at some of these changes, wonderful changes that have taken place since the county of Sangamon was organized. First, let us look at this question commercially, and to do so we will take the substance of a merchant's advertisement in the Sangamon Journal of 1836:

NEW STORE.

"The undersigned will keep constantly on hand a splendid assortment of dry goods, hardware, cutlery, groceries, drugs, medicines, books, boots and shoes, harness and saddles, queensware, glassware, nails, iron chains, etc., etc., which will be sold cheap for cash or country produce, such as beeswax, dry hides, feathers, butter, bacon, pork, etc., etc."

"Now what a change. Dry goods, groceries, hardware, etc., are sold in separate stores. The old kind of stores are split up into specialties, where only one thing is sold, such as drugs, boots and shoes. Instead of being merchants of all things they are merchants of but one. Thus professions, trades, callings of every sort divide, split and develop into a special, and here lies the cause, so to speak, of the progress of mankind.

"Agriculturally, the sickle gave its place and power to the cradle, and it in time gave its place and power to the reaper. The wooden mould board plow gave place to the iron one, and the common little bar shear gave place to the shovel, and it to the double shovel, and it in turn to the cultivator. The short, old Dutch-English scythe gave place to the blacksnake, and it in turn gave up its place to the mower. In these cases, as in a thousand others, the muscles of man was relieved by the muscles of the horse and the powers generated by mechanics, and so it is and ever will be, and yet we in the West are brawlers of wood and drawers of water, and yet I dare not say 'and so it is and ever will be.' God forbid. The wooden flail gave place to the treading, round-going ox, and he to the threshers. The cotton sheet, in a storm of wind, cleaning the grain, was succeeded by the fanning mill, and all these gave up their place and power to the threshers. The wooden rake has been succeeded by the horse rake. The whip-saw has given up the ghost before the mill-saw; the muscles of man to the forces of nature. Originally in the West the ox did all the work; he hauled everything, worked everywhere, and at all times; he hauled goods from St. Louis at one dollar per hundred, and from Beardstown at forty cents per hundred; he plowed, threshed, hauled, tread the mill; if not obedient was goaded and whipped by their angry masters, and for his great services was fattened, killed and eaten by those whom he had enriched. God, it is said, is merciful to man, but how is it with the poor ox? It was once shortly and pungently said that 'Illinois was hell on oxen and women.' The ox-mill and the horse-mill, as well as the water-mill, that ground out every hour about as much as a good hazle-splitting saw with a litter of pigs could eat, has succumbed—has all been surpassed by the steam mill grinding out its thousand barrels daily. The mode of travel, originally, was by two-horse stage; it was followed by the four-horse stage, with two seats, and it by the nine passenger. Now our mode of travel is by rail on iron tracks, and driven by steam, having many cars, with thousands of seats and carrying thousands of passengers across the continent in a few days. We now live by steam, and die and write our will by electricity. The flax wheel and the large wool and cotton spinning wheels, as well as the hand loom, driven by the hand and foot of woman, have all in their place given way to the power loom, etc., driven by steam. You know the little wheel, the larger one and the hand loom, how they all used to whirl, whiz, sing and slam and crash, and you know the loom house where it used to stand, and know how it looked, and saw your old mothers sitting there toiling away night and day shoving the shuttle. Do you? If so, remember the past, and the good, gone up, up to Heaven. The little old log cabin, with deerskin door, clapboard roof, puncheon floor, stick chimneys, daubed with clay and straw, covered with boards taken from the oaks by hands, and held down by weight-poles, have given place to palaces, so to speak. The old log school house, with slab benches, puncheon floors, greased paper for glass, together with the ill-natured school master, with his ferule and whip, thank God, are gone, and in their place we have schools and colleges on every hand. Our court house, costing some $70, has been succeeded by one costing some $200,000. Our State house, costing some $3,000 or $4,000, has been succeeded by one costing as many millions. Originally, we sent letters and messages by horse, now we send them by steam and electricity, as it were, beating in speed, time itself. So we have lived, are living, and will continue to live. The past is nothing, the present is nothing, the great future will be all. Man, the race of man, is but in its infancy—is a mere child, yet rocked in the cradle of Mother Nature. The world is young, time is long, and the race eternal, with unbounded forces. His capacity has no bounds, and his progress no limit. He will master everything but the unmasterable, know everything but the unknowable. He will be free and unfettered in all the walks of life or drench the world in blood. He will be master of himself; he will have no fetters on his limbs, his tongue, nor his brain, nor his business; he will be master of the forms of matter and the forces of nature; he will make these work for him, toil for him, groan and sweat and bleed for him, so to speak, while he climbs towards his anticipated, looked-for heaven."

On the conclusion of Mr. Herndon's address, the meeting adjourned for dinner, after which short speeches, recounting the time of their arrival, reminiscences of their early life here, and amusing anecdotes, were delivered by George R. Weber, Godbey, D. W. Clark, M. K. Anderson and others.

Alexander B. Irwin was re-elected President; M. K. Anderson, Vice-President; E. C. Matheny, Secretary.

TENTH ANNUAL MEETING.

The tenth re-union was held at Loami, September 4, 1877. The number estimated present on the occasion was from five to seven thousand. The meeting was called to order by William McGinnis, and prayer offered by Rev. J. G. White. James M. Turpin delivered the address of welcome. John T. Stuart was then introduced as the orator of the day. The address of Mr. Stuart will be found on page 194.

At the conclusion of Mr. Stuart's address, Alexander B. Irwin, of Pleasant Plains, delivered one of his pleasant, off-hand talks. After dinner R. W. Diller read one of Will Carlton's poems, "Betsy and I are out," in a style that would have done credit to a professional elocutionist.

Preston Breckenridge, an ex-President of the society, and John Carroll Power, the historian, were introduced together. Mr. Breckenridge said: "Mr. Power, I have the pleasure of presenting you, on behalf of myself and other friends of yours among the early settlers, with a copy of Webster's Unabridged Dictionary, as a slight token of your herculean labor of writing and publishing your History of the Early Settlers of Sangamon County." Then, turning to the audience, he continued by expressing the opinion that it had no equal in any county in the State, and perhaps not in the United States, and that in fifty years from now it would be consulted with even greater interest than at the present time.

Mr. Power responded by saying that he was placed in a position requiring him to make an Old Settler's speech, a thing that he never expected to do in his life, that he could not do the subject justice, but that he would treasure the work as a reminder of two of the most pleasant years of his life—the two years spent in visiting from house to house among the early settlers, while gathering material for the history. "Ordinarily," said he, "I would recommend every family in the United States to supply themselves, first, with the Bible and then with a copy of this dictionary; but for Sangamon county a good library would be a copy each of the Bible, Dictionary, and the History of the Early Settlers of this county."

Characteristic speeches were then made by Reverends J. G. White and J. L. Crane. Mrs. Elizabeth Harbure was introduced and some events of her life related by William McGinnis. At ten years of age she was with her parents in Hill's Fort, near what is now Greenville, Bond county, and witnessed the fight that took place there August 27, 1814, when the Indians undertook to capture the fort. She saw Thomas Higgins as near shot and cut to pieces as a man could be and live; she also saw John Journey, John Grates, and Major William Hewitt killed, the latter of whom was in command of the fort. Mrs. Harbour had with her the chain used by her father, Simon Lindley. After the town of Springfield was laid out there was a discrepancy between that town and the former town of Calhoun. Mr. Lindley was called on to re-survey it, which he did, harmonizing all differences. She keeps that chain as an heirloom. Mrs. Harbour also remembers the Indian ranger who died and was buried, September, 1813, at Sulphur Springs cemetery. His name was William Hewitt.

Davis Meredith was elected President, and E. C. Matheny, Secretary for the ensuing year.

ELEVENTH ANNUAL MEETING.

The following account of the Old Settlers' Meeting, on the occasion of the eleventh annual meeting, held at Pleasant Plains, August 22, 1878, is taken from the Sangamo Monitor, and was doubtless written by the editor:

"The day was only a little too hot for comfort, but pleasant when the shade was found, and the cooling breezes fanned the brow and converted the shade of the tall trees of the forest into bowers of comfort. These retreats for the weary ones who sought them to rest their bones or talk over events and stir up memories full of pleasure to both the narrator and listener, were perfect havens of rest to many an old settler on the occasion.

"The grounds had been well selected and but few places present so many natural invitations to partake of its shades and grassy carpet, to enjoy the gentle zephyrs that waft themselves through the magnificent foliage as that of the grove selected by the committee for the purpose of celebrating the nineteenth anniversary of the organization of the Old Settlers' Association of Sangamon county. The stand stood in the south of the amphitheatre, protected from the rays of Old Sol, and decorated with green boughs and emblems of the free. It was so arranged as to accommodate the patriarchal portion of the association, and those who were to take part in the services to add another pleasure to declining days and a new ray of hope to fading lives.

"On the right were seated the choir, selected and trained for the occasion by Professor Griffin, one of the most indefatigable and patient vocal instructors in the county. This choir is made up of not a few who have made reputation for voice and musical talent, in other days and on similar occasions. Its composition is as follows: Miss Fannie Meredith, organist; leading soprano, Miss Ida Crow, Misses Belle Johnson, Ettie Shoup, Lizzie Stout and Mollie Forbes; alto, Misses Delia Herndon and S. J. Lockridge; tenor, Clark Drago, Will Knotts, William Dodds and J. R. Lockridge; basso, C. C. and E. R. Headley, Job Megrady and George Harnett. During the day's performance the choir performed in a most decidedly musical and popular manner the following programme: 'Glory to the New Born King,' 'Love Divine,' 'The Hunters,' 'Pilgrim Fathers,' 'Hold Your Head Up Like a Man,' 'My Boyhood,' and closed the day with 'Merrily Onward We Bound.' Too much cannot be said of the pleasure contributed by these ladies and gentlemen in the exercise of a talent which none who heard their efforts can refuse to accord to each of them.

"On the left sat the 'cause of it all,' the venerable and honorable landmarks of the past to whom the present are indebted for all the glory of a Christianized civilization. As they sat there with uncovered craniums, some of them as hairless as a billiard ball, others with silvered strands flowing as gracefully as the flaxen wavelets from the head of infancy, a new veneration for age seemed to possess the youthful portion of the vast throng as they would speak the names of their grand sires in the most reverential tones of affection and tenderness.

"We saw there the venerable, and we might add handsome, President of the Association, Davis Meredith, Esq., with the honors of forty-nine Illinois winters whitening his locks. Preston Breckenridge, Esq., with forty-four years of labor in the soil of Suckerdorn to entitle him to honor from her sons and daughters; and Joshua Dillon, John Miller, Nathan Carson, Maxwell Campbell, William Batterton, Isaac Wallace, Abner Knotts, John Gaines, James Parkinson, Jacob Epler, Samuel Williams, Robert Cummings, R. W. Diller, the patriarchal Captain Job Fletcher, and the returned pilgrim to other lands, who fifty years since was the ruling spirit of the young and vigorous manhood of Springfield, Major Mobley, and Alexander Irwin, John Harrison, Logan McMurry, B. E. Baker, William M. Butler, John Slater, Mat Cartwright, Thomas and John Garrett, two of as noble representatives from the Isle Erin as ever made a track in a furrow and lived to enjoy the fruit of their honest toil. And there sat John Lightfoot with the flowing beard, the youngest old man in America, and the tall form of William Yates was seen looming above the others, and D. G. Kalb, the well preserved old settler of Round Prairie. These were on the stand as specimen bricks from the 'Kiln of Time' during the times that might well be said to have 'tried men's souls.' These were not all of the 'old folks at home' who had come out to the 'Eating Bee' at the Plains, and as we stroll around the grounds we shall try to introduce some of them to you.

"It is a little remarkable that it should be, and not so much to be wondered at either, that all picnics must be decorated with chin music. But it is deplorably the case that the programme of fifty years since must still be religiously adhered to, if it 'break a trace.' The speaking was not so numerous as it should have been, although some of the very best.

"The Rev. John Slater was never more happy than when welcoming the vast crowd to the hospitality of his fellow citizens of the Plains and the Association. We have such an utter repugnance to the publication of speeches on such occasions that we never allow ourselves to take more than outlines, on the principal that they are made like Tom Lewis' butter used to be made—for present use—and those not there were the losers, while those who heard them are satisfied. Brother Slater's speech was well-timed, sensible and well spoken, just as those who know him would expect him to perform a task of the kind, and we will cover the whole case in a word, when we say it was pleasing to those who heard it and detracted no laurel from the Rev. Johns' brow, earned in days gone by.

"Judge Matheny was an 'Old Settler' in earnest, dealing in reminiscences of the days of punchcon floors and honest people, delivered in the conversational or narrative style. It was full of the most graphic and pleasing incidents of men and the times and held his audience like a vice. We have too much regard for Colonel Matheny to mar the pleasure he gives an audience of any character by attempting to place on paper the peculiar phraseology and the more peculiar Matheny-oratory with which he gives his speeches to his hearers.

"Of him it may be said more truthfully than of any other speaker we now have in remembrance, 'his speeches must be heard to be fully and deservedly appreciated.'

"If success in first forcing the human face into its greatest length by some serious line into which he may choose to lead his listeners; then spreading their mouths like the lease of a poor man from ear to ear, now o'ercasting their face with the most sympathizing cast of countenance and causing the briny messengers of grief to chase each other down the furrowed and fat cheek alike, then banishing gloom as the God of day would the mist of a foggy morn, is effective speaking, then our County Judge and cherished Matheny is your man; but dont ask the Monitor man to waste time and printers' ink in an effort to report him. We will leave that to newspapers whose reporters believe in quantity and not quality.

"Mr. James Stout's recitation was well done, well received, and reflected credit on the good taste of the gentleman, both in the selection and recitation of the poem.

"'Out of the old house into the new,' by the worthy son of a noble sire, Rev. W. H. Milburn, the 'sightless orator of America,' whose face and form begin to show the marks of time—since he first aroused in the souls of his hearers of years ago, a holy love and veneration for the God in whose service he had embarked—was among the many attractive features. He is still the soul of eloquence, the fountain of oratory, who with his mine of finished gems, when unlocked by the key of some soul-inspiring theme, has astonished thousands in his native land, and by our neighbors over the waves which separate the continents, established his repute as one of the most gifted of America's orators.

"As we beheld him in his graceful gestures with his riveted audience hanging on every word uttered, leaning to catch his brilliant gems of thought as they left him clothed in the most attractive style, we scarcely knew which to most admire, the genius of the speaker or the respectful attention of his hearers. His speech furnished food for thought, which we doubt not will be carried to many a home, and, like the bread cast upon the waters, the work of the 'blind man eloquent' will be seen growing in many a homestead when he has filled the measure of his days and gone to gaze upon the scenes of Heaven, of which the beauties he is now deprived of seeing are but the faintest type.

"Rev. Mr. Short, of Jacksonville, we learned, made another speech after the meeting had been announced as closed, and many had gone, but which we also were informed was well received. These comprised the services at the stand, except in one particular. The music of Butler's Band was no small factor in making the attractions at that and other points during the day. The band was out in full force, and never played better to a more admiring crowd. Indeed, the performance at the Old Settlers' pic-nic would have been tame, had it not been for the inspiring notes from the instrumental efforts of this reputable band. Their playing was timely, music appropriate, and in no company of players can be found those more proficient in their calling.

WHAT OF THE DINNER?

"Ah! gentle reader of the Monitor, this account would be incomplete and a failure, most inglorious, did we allow the very thing above all others for which the Old Settlers and the new settlers were bent on doing in style when they started for the grounds on yesterday morning. To get a good view of an Old Settlers' pic-nic, or, in fact, any kind of a pic-nic, you have got to take them at feeding time. Now, to do this, by a hungry reporter, is no small task. It requires a good deal of self-sacrifice, and as newspaper men are supposed by some people to subsist on wind, we thought we would not rob them of the delusion, by being caught in an attempt to fill our yearning vacuum. We took a cold snack from our friend, Tom White, of the Plains, and with Faber in hand and Ed. Bierce to hold copy, we made a dash around to see who was there and what they ate.

"W. G. and Oscar and Aunt Jane Purvines, E. S. Bone, and Tom White were trying to fill Uncle Joe Ledlie, Ed. Bierce, and the hungriest-looking newspaper man on the ground. They were abundantly repayed, however, by the solemn style of the newspaper man's vote of thanks for their success in astonishing Bierce with a square meal, and fattening Uncle Joe until his best friends fail to recognize him. Mr. Sam Valentine and family were hiding chicken on the double quick style, with a board fence to keep them away from Ben Trenary, Billy Parker, A. C. Smith, and their families, consisting of about forty-seven young Rock Creekers, all in good health.

"Then we spied Charlie Watson and his estimable better half, fooling away about sixty-five pounds of wholesome and delicious, in an effort to inflate Ezra White, Garret Elkin, and a squad of 'Pharaoh's lean kine' of folks of the Ed. Bierce stripe of eaters.

"There sat Jack Gardner and his family, engaged in a similar sport. Then we ran head first against 'Hi' Gardner, trying to get rich keeping boarding house with Ben Caldwell, Colonel Mobley, Henry Latham, Will Gardner, of Chatham, and all their families, particularly Henry Latham's. As we left the scene, we pitied Miss Kendel, Miss Gardner, and some young lady friends who were well-nigh worked out in their effort, and Ben Caldwell's little blonde baby crying for more.

"And there sat John Hardin and Billy Barrett foraging on one of Sangamon's cleverest men, Wm. Stitt, who had called to his aid Berryman Hurt, Esq., and still failed, for Hardin was coaxing our old friend Epler, whose white table cloth gleamed with chicken and ham, to give him a drum-stick to chew on. Had it not been for Squire Hamilton, Purvines, Ware, and their families, who protected friend Epler, we guess John would have got enough.

"There sat J. P. Smith, Joe Hayes, Dr. Ather-ton, Dan Staples, of Beardstown, a relic of the Black Hawk times, and Johnny Wolgamot, with their families, looking for all the world as if they had been boarding with Noah in the Ark, and the provisions had given out after twenty days of the storm.

"Here we are in front of Will Converse and Tom Little, and the old gentleman, Henry Converse, with children, grand-children, and great numbers of children, swinging in a hammock, and eating 'yaller-legs,' until they all looked like Methodist preachers, particularly Grandpa Tom.

"How are you? said we, as approaching a nest of crows with more mooves than any county can turn out, and more to eat than would have fed a whole company of clever folks like 'em.

"Then we saw Old Man Yeakle and Squire Waddle trying to outeat Hardy Conant. Captain Bradford was at the same time performing a friendly office in helping a lady friend who had eaten until she got down with the exercise.

"If one desired to see a company of 'old settlers' when they tackled a table, behold the array: Captain L. Smith, George McMurphy, F. B. Smith, S. L. Lindsey, B. O. Pearl and Cash Lynch, assisted by several other good judges of 'wittles well done'—of the female persuasion. Ah! there is my friend H. Fayart, and our friend Shibley and their families, taking the rural snack and washing it down with pure juice of the grape. 'No, I thank you, we have had our dinner or you bet we would,' and we pass on.

"Ed. Elkin and Joe Reavely, Will Mowery and Harm Gatten, and several other fellows just as hungry looking as Ed., are making the grub look as if the table had been struck by a tornado, and no help arrived.

"Then John Harnett, J. H. Classpill, Rev. Wilson and Professor Griffin had been running a boarding house for the tuneless ones who furnished the music. But it was no go. Mrs. Pond and Miss Annie Wilson, and Thomas Wilson, the Grand Marshal, all looked weary in well doing, and the voice of the singer still sang for more.

"Here is Our Own Humphrey, of Farmingdale, with his happy family under a tree, hiding a few things of a delicious flavor to stay nature.

"Pearson Roll, Martin Rites, W. J. Shroyer and several others are trying the same little game on themselves.

"Look what an appetite for the good things Hense Robinson still possesses.

"Who said Judge Matheny was backward or diffident in the presence of a spring chicken when robbed of its clothing?

"But here is the place to get a nice dinner. It is on watermelon, or at least that is all the Monitor man saw them investigating when he took a view of their table, about eleven feet long and covered with melons. Misses Ida Hughes, Frankie London, Helen Sanders, Dora Adams, and her sisters, Miss Caddie Priest, and Messrs. Saunders, Dow Matheny, M. Furlong, Sam Runyan, and Elliott, all taking melon straight.

"We became so tired watching others we give it up before we got around, and concluded to stand and see who were there and what they were at. Old settlers began to crowd around us, who we failed to see on the stand, and many was the grasp of the hand we gave and took as we met our friend Captain R. H. Constant, of Black Hawk fame. There goes Bob Pirkins. Here comes Bill Springer, as happy as a new nominee. Henry Converse shakes with Hardin Ellmore, S. Q. Harrison passes looking as young as he did twenty years since.

"We spied Wm. Lynn, Riley Pirkins, Wm. Houghton and 'Hickory,' his brother, Squire Fink, and Ellis Wilcox with his cane, and Henry Foster, George Harmon, both no older, only more hairless; Isaac Hawley and Billy Burch, from the city; Peter Cox, from Ball; Billy Brown, who must now be considered an O. S., from Berlin; Newt. Purvance, Thomas Watts, and here comes George Trumbo and our friend Hall, from Mechanicsburg. How do you do, Mr. Arnold and M. A. Carter, of the Plains. John Hardin is now an O. S.; and so also is Harness Trumbo and Henry Bugg, 'Brug,' Pirkins and J. B. Pirkins when he can boast of a big grandson.

"Here is Thomas Hussy and John DeCamp and Zim Enos and Doc. Jayne—all ripe Old S.'s. So is Tom Averett and Tom Talbott, and 'Doc' with his family of great big sons and lovely daughter.

"Here is Mrs. Dillon and Mrs. Renshaw and a whole host of old ladies whose venerable appearance bears evidence of having seen this world away back at a period which makes them count their days by the seventy and eighty years.

"There stands Joshua F. Amos, one of the first carpenters that ever struck Springfield; James L. Hill, John Fagan, C. W. VanDeren and Christian Crow, from Cass county; and there is Ed Watts and his family, and our farmer friend, Elliott B. Herndon, Esq., who, with his better half, had viewed the land between Springfield and the plains behind the faithful horse. Here comes John A. Miller, of Rochester, and Ira Winchell, the honest smith, Mr. and Mrs. Bennett, from east of the city, and here is our friend J. M. Turpin, from Loami, and W. F. Foley, B. F. Short and B. F. Cummings, who were both born about the same time and came to the State together.

"And here is a whole batch we struck from Rochester: M. D. McCoy, George Green, Wm. Derry, Wm. Whiteside, J. T. Twist, Wm. Taft, J. S. Highmore, D. T. Ott, J. Alcott, H. Johnson, H. Fairchild, J. Poffenbarger, Dr. Babcock, N. Campbell, S. Williams, C. Humphry, J. Graham, G. Forden, John Johnson, H. Clark, Samuel Johnson, J. Everhart, Joe Miller, George Deyo, N. Deyo.

"Young settlers who demanded some of our attention while passing around: Miss Dora Bennett and the Misses Bevins, Jas. A. Winston, Dr. Correll, Mrs. McElhany, Miss Burchett, Mrs. Sibley, Mrs. Fayart and Mrs. Cross—passing around on a review of the outside world, wherein peanuts, pop-corn, patent blacking, horse swings and rope-walking were the attractions, and in which they were joined by nearly the entire young settlers and all of the old.

"Mrs. S. H. Richardson, the Misses Fink, our old friends of twenty years since, Mr. and Mrs. Edwin Tomlin, and Mrs. Dr. Harrison and her two single daughters and married one, Mrs. Beekman. The very prince of old settlers, Noah Mason, Esq., and Ben. Caldwell and Al. Watts trying to find out which of the babies had the blondest head of hair. Marshal Stevens and our very clever young lady friends, Miss Julia Routh and Julia Frohner, Mrs. Whitcomb, Mrs. Maxwell and the venerable wife of the new President of the society, Mrs. Campbell, Bob Hazlett and Miss Belle Bradford and a thousand others we have not room to name."

Maxwell Campbell was elected President of the society for the ensuing year, and James H. Matheny, Secretary.

TWELFTH ANNUAL MEETING.

The following is the Illinois State Register's account of this meeting:

"The annual reunion of the Sangamon County Old Settlers' Society was held on Wednesday, the 20th ult., in Abell's grove, just north of the pleasant village of Rochester, and it proved to be a grand success in every point of view. The day was fine, although a trifle warm, the attendance was immense, and the exercises were of a more interesting character, if possible, than is usual on such occasions. The committee, assisted by the good people of Rochester, had made ample preparations for the accommodation of the crowd. A stand for the speakers and musicians had been erected, seats sufficient to accommodate a large number of people were in position, and a number of barrels of ice water had been provided. The people from the surrounding country came flocking in at quite an early hour in the forenoon; a large crowd went out on the Ohio & Mississippi road on the nine o'clock train, another on the ten-thirty train, and still another on the one p. m. train. The appearance of the ground did not differ materially from what one is accustomed to see on such occasions. There were acres of horses and vehicles, and 'oceans' of people—old people, middle aged people, young people, men, women and children—rich men and poor men, stylishly dressed women, with the flush of health on the cheek and the sparkle in the eye—women—good old mothers of Israel, with furrowed cheek and aged-dimmed eye. Then there were the usual number of refreshment stands and catch-penny contrivances that have been so often seen and just as often described, and upon which we do not propose to dwell, preferring to talk more particularly of the old people and the exercises in which they were interested.

"On and immediately around the stand were many old men and women, to whom we are indebted for much of the civilization that we now enjoy. Among the number, the Register reporter noticed Mesdames Daniel Barr, John Cassity, John Lock, David Crouch, Melvina Miller, Polly Bashaw, Jane Butler, Eliza Taft, Polly Torrance, Rachel Poffenbarger, Eliza Miller, — Levi, — Cloyd, Julia Johnson, N. Harris, Levisa Richards, — Taylor (Taylorville), — Rape. Messrs. Munsen Carter, D. G. Kalb, Andry Kalb, Rev. S. M. Smith, M. K. Anderson, G. Goodridge, John Lightfoot, Moses Laswell, R. W. Diller, Alexander B. Irwin, N. Harris, Noah Mason, Davis Meredith, Andrew Hollenbeck, I. A. Hawley, Samuel Grubb, George Poffenbarger, John T. Stuart, Preston Breckinridge, J. G. Ransom, E. Sanders, Charles Lamb, James Magreedy, W. R. Ford, James Bell, B. A.

Giger, George Green, L. Ridgeway, S. R. Sanders, Rev. A. Hale, Abner Knotts, Henry Johnson, A. Barber, Daniel Wadsworth, M. G. Wadsworth, Harness Trumbo, Samuel Williams, Dr. Able, Dr. Babcock, J. M. Morse, Moreau Phillips, L. P. Matthews, J. E. McCoy, M. D. McCoy, John Lock, Strother Jones, William Shumate, C. W. Van Deren, Isaac Watts, Uriah Mann, J. Palmer, Henry Converse, John De Camp, Philemon Stout, and last, but not least, the venerable John T. Benham, bending beneath the weight of ninety-one years, and who was doubtless the oldest man on the ground.

"The exercises at the stand commenced at about half-past ten or eleven o'clock. M. D. McCoy called the assemblage to order, and a choir, led by Mr. McCoy, sang, with fine effect, 'All hail the power of Jesus' name.' Then Rev. G. W. Dungan, pastor of the Rochester Methodist Episcopal Church, invoked the blessings of Almighty God upon those present, and upon the occasion, after which the choir sang 'Rock of Ages,' then Dr. E. R. Babcock, of Rochester, delivered a neat address of welcome. Alex. B. Irwin, of Pleasant Plains, one of the vice presidents of the society, then took charge of the meeting, having been requested to do so by President Campbell, who was absent. After a few preliminary remarks, he introduced Hon. Milton Hay as the orator of the day, and that gentlemen proceeded to deliver a highly interesting and instructive address, of which we can present but a brief synopsis.

"The speaker said the printed programme advertising an 'oration' from him, on this occasion, was all wrong. He had promised only to make a short talk. Judge Matheny should be called upon personally to make good the promise set out in the programme, as he was abundantly able to do it. Addressing himself to the occasion, he said: 'The Old Settlers' Society of Sangamon had now become one of the permanent institutions of the county, as it rightfully should be. It might have been the idea of the founders of the society that it was to be kept up only as long as the few pioneers who began our earliest settlements should survive, but we have outgrown that idea. As one generation succeeds another, the elder generation yet upon the stage of life would always constitute and bear the relation of 'old settlers' to the new growth of population. In that sense we should always have old settlers amongst us, and hence we would have the elements and material for an old settlers' society. In the process of time the society, it is true, would lose its characteristic of being composed of the first settlers, but it could still retain its characteristic of being old settlers. The old as well as the poor, we shall always have with us.

"In this comparatively early history of the society, however, we had the advantage of having amongst us as yet, so that we meet them, face to face, a few of the very earliest pioneers; men and women who had stood, as it were, upon Mount Pisgah, and gazed upon the trackless prairies and forests of these regions; men who saw that the land was fair and who were the first to enter upon it and take possession. The experience of these old settlers was an experience that no other generation of settlers could possibly have. At that early day these regions were not considered so inviting as to cause any rush or haste in their settlement. A few located doubtfully and cautiously, and these at considerable intervals of time. It was no part of the expectation of these pioneers that they would realize suddenly great wealth or great success of any kind by being the first upon the ground. But little information had been disseminated as to the character of the country, but there was a general impression that its characteristics were those of a desert.

"There was doubt and question then as to whether a prairie country was inhabitable. The means and modes of access to the country were slow and difficult, and only those were tempted to come who were already frontier men, or who for some exceptional reason preferred the free life of a wilderness to the comforts of the older settled parts of the country. There was at that day no rushing tide of emigration from all parts of the world. There were no speculators, land grant railroad companies, and newspapers engaged in 'whooping up' the country. There were many discomforts and deprivations which the early settler had to undergo; but there were compensations also. The early settler was almost 'monarch of all he surveyed.' He could enjoy the great natural beauty of the primitive scenery of the country, before it was broken and profaned by roads, buildings and fences. He had no disagreeable neighbors to fret or annoy him. With his gun and faithful dog for company, and the wild game all around him, he cared nothing for the society of men. Of course only a class of men who had long habituated themselves to a life on the outer borders of civilization could enjoy such a life in its full perfection.

"In process of time came a class who desired progress in improvements and civilization, and these men began the work. Not content with building for themselves the cabin to live in, they built the early log school houses and churches. They began the work of cultivating the soil for something more than their own personal wants; of opening farms and laying out roads. Then began the location of trading points and towns, and traders and mechanics came in to supply the wants of population. And so, step by step, population and improvement slowly increased. All this, however, had progressed under circumstances in which the primitive condition, habits and usages still largely prevailed. Our trading was mostly a system of barter; an exchange of one article of produce for another; of corn for cattle, or cattle for horses, and of the produce of the farm for labor, manufactures or merchandise. Money as a medium of exchange was scarcely to be had, and hence but little was used. All this belonged to the period anterior to the introduction of railroads. With the facilities afforded by railroads for reaching quickly the great markets, came cash buyers and ready sales. These iron rails not only connected us with the commercial world, but along them came the quickened pulsations of a more commercial life. This quick and ready intercourse with the commercial world, soon affected our old habits and usages, our fashions and modes of doing business. We set about to adapt ourselves to a changed condition of affairs.

"We were somewhat unconscious of the extent of these changes as they occurred, but in the course of a few years, we opened our eyes widely to the fact. Then we began sadly to recall the old days and the old times. Then we began to look around for the remnant of that pioneer band of 'early settlers,' whose experience and memory of a far different condition of things would prove interesting to a generation which knew nothing of that by-gone time, but from tradition. It was then the idea was conceived of bringing those 'old settlers' together once a year, to talk over the old times, and refresh each others' memories with the old time experiences and incidents.

"As before remarked, our changed life and habits was the result of many causes operating through a space of years; yet some of these causes were so powerful and direct in their operation as work material changes in a very short period.

"If the speaker were going to fix a period or dividing line in point of time between the new and the old, so far as this region of the country was concerned, it would be at the introduction of railroads. Undoubtedly to this was attributable the greatest changes in the material condition and usages of this part of the country.

"The effect was marked and direct upon almost every pursuit and calling of life. Old habits and old industries to a great extent disappeared on the appearance of the locomotive. Some were dropped and lost sight of; others greatly changed in the manner of pursuit or performance. Not only our home-made manufactures, but our home-made life and habits in a great measure disappeared. The ox and the Carey plow, the spinning wheel and the loom, disappeared together. We began to build houses of a different style and with different materials. We farmed not only with different implements but in a different mode. Then we began to inquire what the markets were, and what product of the farm we could raise and sell to the best advantage. The farmer enlarged his farm, and no longer contented himself with the land that himself or his boys could cultivate, but he must have hired hands and hired help to cultivate his enlarged possessions.

"Then it was our families discovered their inability to do the housework of the family, and required hired assistance. Customs in religious exercises even underwent a change. The 'forty-minute' sermon began to be preached; men and women no longer divided off on each side of the church; the minister ceased to line off the hymn for the congregation, and the congregation quit singing. 'Choirs' and fiddles made their first appearance in the churches.

"Almost concurrently with the introduction of railroads, it was discovered that the schoolmaster was abroad in the land. Our free common school system had its origin about the same period. Along with the new impetus given to the material condition of the country, and, as it were, hand in hand with it, came the free common school system, to give new development and growth to the mental and intellectual life of the country.

"The old schoolmaster and the old school books were either discarded or put under new regulations, so that a new generation was rapidly growing up that had learned to scout at Webster's spelling book and Daboll's arithmetic.

"Very few of the boys of this generation know anything of that bad boy who was found in the apple tree stealing apples, as told in Webster, and none of them would pay any attention to the excellent 'moral' with which the story concluded.

"But the common school system, enlisting, as it did, in its organization and machinery, a large portion of the adult population, as well as teachers and children, wonderfully increased the mental activity of the country.

"Turning to the characteristics of the early settlers, the speaker said it was a mistake to characterize them as containing all the virtues enjoined in the decalogue. There were good men and bad men amongst them. So far as morals were concerned, they might be described as an average lot of humanity, but they were mostly men of strong and marked traits of character. They had the vices and virtues peculiar to men whose lives had been spent upon the frontiers. Self-reliance, bravery, fortitude and shrewdness of judgment were striking characteristics. With these there was a general kindness of disposition, which the necessities of their situation called into frequent exercise. Notwithstanding all this, however, the inherent meanness and vice of the human character frequently manifested itself. Some were given to brawls and violence; some were malicious, and would vent their malice in slandering a neighbor or injuring his property. The early records of our courts show that much of the litigation of that early period arose from these causes. This was the character of litigation in which our early lawyers won their renown. In case of victory the fee was not great, but the glory was. Still it was true that there were better types of old settlers—men whose lives were blameless, and who furnished no grists to the lawyers or the courts unless in self protection. These were the men who were laying well the foundations of a future orderly and peaceable community; whilst others might be engaged in brawls, these were engaged in founding the church and the school house. In any reflections cast upon any portion of the early settlers, it must be understood that this did not include the women of that day. There is great concurrence in all the testimony we have of that period that the patient, untiring devotion of the women of that day, to all the duties of their situation, was without exception; and that the failings and shortcomings of many a trifling husband were more than supplied by a patient and industrious wife and mother.

"The speaker discussed the useful as well as pleasurable purposes that the Old Settlers' Society could accomplish, and argued that the society should perpetuate itself and become permanent.

"However this might be, he hoped that so long as any of those entitled to be considered genuine 'early settlers' were living, these annual meetings should be held, and be the occasion for the meeting and commingling of all those men and women, yet upon the stage, whose bravery, fortitude, patience and industry, and whose trials, hardships and virtues, had laid firmly the foundations of society here. Let those who have come after, meet with them on these occasions, and let this latter generation see with their own eyes these early pioneers, and hear with their own ears the experiences of these men and women, to the end that the memory of those early days might be handed down to posterity."

"At the conclusion of Mr. Hay's address, which was listened to with the closest attention by a large proportion of the assembly, Acting President Irwin announced that a recess would be taken for dinner, and then the contents of sundry huge baskets and boxes were dragged to light, a number of tables were improvised, and these were filled with almost everything that good Sangamon county farmers' wives could prepare with which to tempt the human appetite. At one of these, that prepared by the family of Uncle Pres. Breckinridge, of Cotton Hill, the Register representative and his 'better half' were fortunate enough to be entertained. It was a right royal feast and no mistake—chickens, sliced ham, choice bread and butter, jellies, preserves, pickles, everything, in fact, that could be desired, and while the ladies were preparing the feast the jovial, whole-souled Uncle Pres. was scouring the grounds in search of hungry people to feed. Nobody declined an invitation from such a source, of course, and his spread was speedily surrounded. His daughter, Mrs. Lucy D. Hunter, and his daughters-in-law, Mesdames Lillie and Hugh Breckenridge, assisted by other members of the family, gracefully dispensed the hospitalities, and succeeded admirably in their very evident determination to make their guests feel 'at home.' Uncle Pres. presided with his usual urbanity, and all satisfied the cravings of their appetites to the fullest extent. There were at the table Mrs. Louisa Stokes, Mrs. Bashaw, Mrs. Sophia Thomas, Miss Elizabeth Evert, two daughters of Mr. Samuel Johnson, Mr. Will Berry, Mr. Ben Waters, Mr. I. Stokes, Mr. William Stoneberger, Mr. Samuel Williams, Mr. S. P. Mathews, Mr. William D. Hunter, Dr. Abel Roland Thomas, Alex. Breckinridge, Harder Breckinridge, Cleophus Breckinridge, Masters Arthur Abel, Taylorville, Burtie Breckinridge, Ida and Inez Breckinridge, and other grandchildren too numerous to mention. There were many other fine spreads by hospitable people. Mesdames Neal and St. Clair, of Rochester, had a fine table, and entertained largely in splendid style."

THIRTEENTH ANNUAL RE-UNION.*

"The place selected for this year's meeting was the grove back of the residence of Mr. Daniel Jones, in Cotton Hill township, five miles southeast of Crow's Mill. Mr. Jones and his family had done all that was possible to provide for the comfort and convenience of those attending, and they are deserving of the highest praise for the generous hospitality extended to all comers. But it was impossible to render the place selected a satisfactory one, in such a dry season and upon such a hot day. It must be admitted that the old settlers are relieved of many annoyances by holding their re-unions at some distance away from town and from a railroad, so that no one ought to grumble at the inconvenience necessitated in reaching the location chosen. Of course, all the roads were terribly dusty, but a refreshing breeze afforded compensation for all annoyances. Upon the roads leading to and through the grounds, however, the dust was much worse than upon any of the roads outside, and, the grove being situated down in a hollow, the heat was insufferable. Owing to the unusual drouth, the water supply was cut off, and the management were only able, by making great exertions, to supply the throng of suffering humanity with an occasional drink of water. As a result, everybody was decidedly uncomfortable throughout the day, and felt much more as if they had become for the time being veritable pioneers than as if they were enjoying a social holiday. But it must not be imagined from what has been said that the affair was not a success, for it certainly was a decided success, despite all these drawbacks and others that could be mentioned. The attendance was very large, but there was no opportunity of fairly estimating the number present. The woods were literally full of horses and vehicles of every description, and this made it very evident that a very large number of persons were present. But at no time was the crowd about the speaking stand particularly large, the visitors being scattered all over the grounds, wherever shady nooks could be found, enjoying themselves socially. As usual, the affair partook largely of a social character, although the programme at the stand was carried out successfully and very satisfactorily. But the real attraction of the gathering, to most of the attendants, was the opportunities it afforded of renewing old acquaintances, and of rehearsing again and again with them the oft-told, but ever interesting, stories of trials encountered and difficulties overcome by the sturdy pioneers of Sangamon county. Hot as it was in the shady grove, the veterans could remember almost innumerable occasions when they suffered much more, and the frequent mention of the ever-memorable 'deep snow' seemed to occasionally impart a rather refreshing frigidity to the atmosphere.

"Springfield was not as well represented as usual, though quite a good delegation was present. The gathering was largely composed of the farmers of the county, who were accompanied by their families, to whom the occasion afforded a well-earned and well-deserved day of recreation. "The public exercises took place at the stand constructed for the purpose, which had been placed in a good position in a shady grove. This temporary structure was occupied by the band, the singers and several of the older persons present. At the back was displayed a banner bearing the words, 'Welcome Old Settlers.' Evergreens were wreathed above and about the stand, and the whole was surmounted by a large flag. This platform was surrounded during the exercises by an intensely interested gathering, conspicuous among whom were a number of the oldest settlers in the county.

"The exercises of the day began with music by the band, after which Mr. John B. Weber of Pawnee, delivered the reception address, appropriately welcoming the members of the society, their families and friends, and members present. 'Brookfield' was well rendered by the choir, and prayer was offered by Rev. Josiah Porter.

"The exercises were conducted under the efficient management of the President of the society, Mr. R. W. Diller, of this city, who next delivered the President's address. A synopsis would fail to do justice to this address, which was given in happy, conversational style, and was replete with entertaining reminiscences and sensible suggestions.

"After singing by the choir, Mr. John Harrison, of Pleasant Plains, made a brief address. Mr. Harrison has lived upon the same farm for fifty-seven years, and knows all about the trials and experiences of Sangamon county's early pioneers. The county was almost a wilderness when he first arrived, and six months before that time those residing in his neighborhood were obliged to go eighty miles to mill. He related several interesting stories about the mills of those early days, and told how the pioneers were obliged to carry scythes, with which to cut grass for temporary bridges across the numerous sloughs that were not bridged. Mr. Harrison concluded by extolling the advantages now possessed by Illinois and especially by Sangamon county, saying that he was unable to see why any farmer should desire to go West after gold, because the products of the farms of this country were much more valuable than all the gold and silver in all the hills of the Rocky Mountains, and were easier to get at.

"Judge H. M. Vandever, of Christian county, then gave the audience one of the most unique specimens of oratory, if such it can be called, which the writer has ever listened to. He speaks forcibly, though with considerable effort, and seemed determined to convince his hearers that he was an ardent admirer of the 'good old times,' and customs of the past. In fact, he seemed to be rather indignant because people lived more comfortably in these days than did the early pioneers. The object of his remarks, so far as they could be understood, seemed to be to impress his hearers with the thought that the early pioneers went forth animated by a determination to conquer all the earth, fearing neither man, flesh or the devil; and that their descendants ought to be inspired by the same feelings. They heard too much of the great achievements of great men which were not possible to ordinary people, and thought too little of the practical benefits to be derived from the early experiences of their own ancestors. The Judge's address seemed to please the audience.

"The election of officers being next in order, was disposed of by re-electing the present efficient President and Secretary, Mr. Diller and Judge Matheny, on motion of Mr. Weber. After more music, 'the best of all,' the dinner hour, was announced, and soon all were engaged in supplying the wants of the inner man. None were allowed to go hungry, and those who had not provided themselves with baskets were hospitably and bountifully cared for by the generous farmers, whose picnic dinners are always remembered with pleasant recollections by those who partake of them. At two o'clock a larger audience than before assembled to listen to Hon. Jas. C. Robinson, of this city.

"After the usual musical introductory, Mr. Robinson made a rather brief address, which proved very entertaining, being interspersed with characteristic anecdotes. He reviewed the great changes that had taken place since the day when the early pioneers settled in the county, and eulogized the moral character, integrity and industry of the early settlers, in whose footsteps the rising generation could follow with profit.

"Mr. Robinson's remarks closed the regular programme, but the audience were not ready to disperse, and willingly listened to brief recitals of their early experiences by Mr. Van Deren, of Chatham, and Mr. Baker, of Christian county. The choir was then called upon for several songs, which were enjoyed more than any other feature of the programme, and President Diller was at last reluctantly compelled to declare the exercises of the day ended.

"Many of those in attendance immediately made a break for their homes, while others remained to indulge in social converse with neighbors and friends, preferring to drive home after sundown, by which time the grove was deserted, and the hundreds who had participated in the reunion had separated, to await the coming of the next reunion."

FOURTEENTH ANNUAL MEETING.

A two days' session was decided upon for the meeting, and Wednesday and Thursday, August 24th and 25th, the time, and Salisbury the place, for the Fourteenth Annual Reunion.

The accommodations in the way of tents for those who wished to sleep upon the grounds the first night, were ample. The tents, which were of the regular army make, water-proof, were erected on the outskirts of the grounds, and all were occupied with as jolly and happy a class of people as has been seen in many a year. It was no camp-meeting crowd, if we may judge by the music, sentiment of songs, and the local speeches heard from the occupants up to the small hours of the morning. Everything was orderly during the night, but simply a little jolly. "Uncle Joe" seemed to be popular upon the grounds, judging from the loud calls made for him during the night.

The speaker's stand was erected in a small depression and slope, with plenty of shade, the seats being after the usual style on such occasions—planks laid upon logs. The stand was prettily ornamented with colored paper in lace patterns, and in front bore the inscription: "Welcome to the Old Settlers," surrounded with a very neat design. The young ladies of Salisbury probably had a hand in the decoration of the stand. Several large and beautiful bouquets graced the table in front of the stand.

At about eight o'clock Wednesday evening, the first exercises of the Old Settlers' Meeting for 1881, were held by the few who were present. The audience numbered about one hundred and fifty or two hundred. The exercises were somewhat informal, as they were intended to be, and consisted of some fine singing by a company of young ladies and gentlemen from Pleasant Plains, under the leadership of Professor W. B. Griffin, all doing credit to themselves and their teacher. Several amusing stories were told by Rev. Mr. Clark, Squire Parkinson and R. W. Diller, of Springfield, all illustrating some incident in their early life and the customs and habits of the people of the country some forty or fifty years ago. Those who know the speakers can appreciate somewhat the amusement afforded the crowd on the occasion. The meeting adjourned by singing the Doxology, "Praise God," etc.

Mr. Diller announced a prayer meeting for the morning, at seven o'clock, after which the audience dispersed to their respective tents, but probably not to sleep until towards morning.

On the morning of the second day the overcast sky and the mutterings of the distant thunder and flashes of lightning, gave indications of rain at an early hour, but none came as expected. At 9 o'clock the sun showed itself through the clouds. At an early hour the people began to arrive. The old settlers were, of course, important personages; you could tell one as far as you could see him, by his dignified bearing and apparent good feeling which lighted up his countenance. Their comely wives shared in the general good feeling which prevailed, and without them the interest would vanish. Most of the early settlers came to the gathering in their carriages, drawn by a pair of over-fed horses, a striking contrast to the mode of traveling sixty years ago, when the conveyance was on horseback, with saddle and pillion. They have a right to be proud of their success in life, which they suffered so much to attain.

The meeting was called to order by John H. Harrison, and Elder Stevens made a prayer appropriate for the occasion. Singing was furnished by a choir led by Professor Griffin.

Mr. John B. Miller made the address of welcome, but would not, he said, make a speech. He asked the question, "Why have we come here—why leave our homes and gather under this shade? We have come to meet each other—to see and be seen. But we should have this in moderation. This is an Old Settlers' meeting, of Sangamon county." He spoke of the astonishment of an Englishman who should meet us here for the first time; we should have to explain the matter to him. In this connection he referred to the changes that had occurred in the last two hundred years. The red man had changed; the canoe had given place to the steamboat. And this change had changed the whole world, in an important sense. Who has made this change? It had been caused by the old settlers; but they will soon pass away. We have some of them here to-day, and give them a cordial welcome, and will give them that reverence which we should do under the circumstances. We say again, we give you all a cordial welcome to Salisburg."

RESPONSE.

Mr. R. W. Diller made the response in behalf of the old settlers. He thanked the gentleman for the kind words of welcome. He was not an old settler, but he had drifted into it; he had been here only thirty-two years, but Mr. Harrison, who is here, had been here sixty-two years. He here referred in an interesting manner to the improvements—railroads, sewing machines, and all kinds of machinery. All these changes had been made in about thirty years, and perhaps in thirty years from this we may be going to Philadelphia in a balloon. We cannot tell what may come. He then referred to the last night's meeting. He then said that of the twenty-five vice-presidents of the society, all are alive—not one has been taken, and most of them are here, for which he was most thankful. After some remarks about how the meeting happened to be changed, etc., he spoke in complimentary terms of the forthcoming History of Sangamon County, and advised all the people to have one of them when published. He closed with wishing that all might have a good time, and bid all good-bye.

The response was followed by a song by the choir.

Mr. Harrison then came forward and said he was an old settler. His father moved to Kentucky, and he came here on the 4th of November, 1822, and had lived at the same spot since that time. He lived in a log house of one room, 18 by 22. We entered the loft by a ladder, which was placed outside. The number of persons that lived in that room the first winter, was ten grown persons and six children. We live a little better now, and have grown some since that time. Mr. Harrison then introduced Mr. Jacob Hinkle, the oldest settler of Sangamon county. He came here with his father in 1818, and is the youngest of eleven children, and is the only one living. He lives on the same place where he came to first, and had it not been for the old settlers' meeting he would never have seen this portion of Sangamon county, and was surprised to know there was such land in this section.

GOV. S. M. CULLOM'S SPEECH.

At this stage of the proceedings, Mr. R. W. Diller, President of the society, introduced Governor S. M. Cullom, who commenced by saying:

"Mr. President, Ladies and Gentlemen.—I am with you to-day in response to an invitation to attend the annual reunion of the old settlers of Sangamon and Menard counties. It is the first time in my life that I have appeared before an audience of old settlers to make an old settlers' speech. I was informed that I was invited to be present, not as governor, but as Shelby M. Cullom. I thank my old friends for the compliment of the invitation and the manner of giving it.

"This is an old settlers' meeting. What kind of a meeting could be more enjoyable if we enter into the true spirit of it as we may. Such occasions should be entirely free from unnecessary restraints and conventionalities; every man, woman and child should feel at home. Let the old fashioned hearty friendship be stirred up to-day. Let a spirit of good will be rekindled upon the altar of our hearts.

"I come here to have a good time with the people I have lived among now for twenty-eight years. Some times I think the influence of our civilization as it grows older, to some extent smothered out that warm-hearted, active sympathizing spirit for our neighbors and friends that used to burn brightly in the hearts of the people of this country. We go along now a days and meet our neighbors, and under the pressure of business and money making and fashion, we scarcely speak to our best friends. The country people are not quite so indifferent. You cherish the habits and friendships of your fathers, but not so to the same extent in our cities. There is not enough of hearty social feeling among the people of these days of high pressure, any where. The result is the very fountains of our better natures are in danger of being dried up. Unless we keep alive our friendships and attachments we will scarcely know after a while whether we have any friends we care for, and when people get to that point they will surely have no friends who will care for them.

"If there is anything which makes life worth the struggle, it is the sympathetic, the social part of our natures, the feeling that all the world is akin, the feeling that there are warm hearts in the breasts of God's noble men and women beating in sympathy with our own. Smother out this part of our natures and the world would be cold and gloomy, and humanity would dwarf into littleness, and soon become utterly selfish and mean. Then, fellow-citizens, old settlers and young, let us renew our friendships to-day, and we will leave here better men and women, feeling better satisfied with ourselves and the world around us.

"What is the significance of the term, an old settlers' meeting? It does not mean simply a gathering of persons who have lived to a good old age in the community, though many of you who bear the distinction of being an old settler, are now bending beneath the weight of many years, and your ranks, as you have heard to-day, are being thinned each year by the Silent Reaper. In the sense in which the term is used to-day, it means more—it means a gathering of pioneers in the community. Many of you may justly be called pioneers in this region of country. Pioneers cannot be found in the older States of the East. There the proverbial oldest inhabitants came into the world and passed his life amid scenes of advanced civilization and crowded population. He sees about him, in his old age, the same familiar objects that crowd the recollection of his youthful days; the home his father lived in he perhaps lives in. The farm where his father, and possibly his grandfather, passed their lives, he is laboring on and getting a scanty reward for his toil. The stories of hardships endured by the pioneer settlers of those old States live in history and in family tradition, but the men and women enduring the hardships are gone; they are not there to tell the story. Not so in our State. Some of the gray-haired men before me to-day have seen this county, now smiling with civilization, in which only bold, hardy spirits, men with brave hearts and strong arms ventured to make a home. When we listen to the statements of these men and women, who have lived in Illinois and Sangamon and Menard counties forty, and fifty, and some of them nearly sixty years, who came when, in a large part of the State, the red man made his home, when on our prairies there could scarcely be found the footprints of civilization, and then look about us and see our State vast as an empire, filled with populous cities, covered with fruitful farms, its territory crossed and re-crossed by thousands of miles of railroads, and reflect, that the span of a single life has marked all these vast changes, what a suggestion, yes, what an exhibition of rapid growth and progress. Some of you oldest people have seen it all. It has been the growth of fifty years.

"I know that much has been said about our rapid growth, but I fancy it is a subject which never ceases to be of interest, and we cannot study it without profit. One of the chief objects of these gatherings is to keep alive the memories of the primitive days of our State and to impress their lessons upon those who are to come after us. I do not think I am a very old man and technically I am not an old settler of Sangamon or Menard county, though when my father and mother came to this State with their family, now nearly fifty-one years ago, and settled in Tazewell county, it was only three years after it was taken off of Sangamon and made a county of itself. So you see, my friends, I am a tolerable old settler after all."

After referring to the organization of the county, the Governor continued:

"The first men who ever resigned office in this county were Matheny, Kelly and Latham. The first election ever held in the county was in 1821, at John Kelly's house. The first road located was from Springfield to Jacksonville. The first bridge was over the Sangamon. In 1829, the State made an appropriation of $1,000 to improve the navigation of the Sangamon. One steamboat got to Springfield, or as near as the river runs to it, but had to back out in order to get away, which ended the business of navigating the Sangamon.

"But I was talking about the changed condition and the growth in this country. 'When you and I were young' we found our pastime in hunting and fishing, in log rollings in corn huskings and quilting bees. When the young people forty or fifty years ago danced, they danced, not in a stiff, delicate sort of a way, but they danced in earnest. Do you remember how long it took the old fiddler to tune up and how impatient you were to begin. In those days everybody's house was open to all and all were welcome, and when we went visiting we went in earnest, taking along the whole family. I think the dinners our mothers used to get up when the friends would come in were better than we often see in these days. Everything cooked was set on the table at once, and everybody helped themselves. In those days when anybody got religion and joined the church, you could hear him tell about it a mile off. The preachers of those days were their own educators and they were mightily in earnest. They meant what they said and said what they meant. The late Peter Cartwright, for example, whose old home in which he lived for more than a half century, is near by. They belonged to the church militant and were as ready for a fight, if that was required to keep down the unruly, as they were for a sermon. They were full of zeal and served the Lord fervently, and helped to sow the seeds of temperance and truth, which are bearing good fruit to-day.

"Let us look a little at the history of our State.

"Illinois became a Sovereign State in 1818, with a population of fifty thousand, nine hundred souls. It is now the fourth state in the Nation and the census of 1880 shows a population of over three millions. But its present proud position has not been reached unhindered by serious obstacles.

"Early in its history, financial troubles encumbered its progress and tested to the utmost the wisdom and sagacity of the statesmen of that day. Many of you older men remember well the dark days when a cloud of debt hung over us that for a time seemed as though it would break in an overwhelming storm, when muttered talk of repudiation became almost outspoken. But you remember how those mutterings were smothered, how the legislature and the people declared in favor of the honest discharge of all just obligations. And to-day, as a State, we may proudly look the world in the face, for we owe no man.

"The vast system of internal improvements which involved the State so deeply in debt, the digging of the canal and the attempt at building railroads has been looked upon as a great error on the part of the statesmen of those days, and while it is true they undertook enterprises out of all proportion to their resources, time has, in a measure, vindicated the far reaching wisdom of their acts, for our rapid growth and development are, in no small degree, due to these improvements.

"The privations which the early settlers in eastern states endured and which are recorded in history, were repeated in the experience of those who ventured to make a home in Illinois in its earliest days. But the Jesuit missionaries who came first to Illinois with the purpose of Christianizing the Indians, and the traders and adventurers who soon followed them, reported a land fairer and more blessed in soil and climate than any under the sun, and soon, bold hardy men were willing to brave the dangers and hardships of a frontier life in order to live in and develop a land so fair. It was not, however, until the twenties and thirties that the development of Illinois fairly began. By that time the hunter's suit and coon-skin cap had given away to the home-spun garments; villages and soon cities had taken the place of the Indian camp. A few school houses were built which supplied the bare necessities of the people. In 1825 the State first undertook the establishment of common schools by appropriating $2 out of every hundred of State revenue for school purposes, which was divided pro rata between the counties as now. The free school system amounted to very little, however, until in 1855 when a new start was taken. We have a grand system now. We have forty-one thousand nine hundred and sixty-four public schools in the State, over twenty-two thousand teachers, and seven hundred and four thousand one hundred and four pupils. Up to the year 1850, Illinois had only one railroad, fifty-five miles long. In 1823 Chicago was a village of about one hundred and sixty-four people. Governor Reynolds, I believe, described it as a little village on Lake Michigan, in Pike county.

"A story is told of Governor Reynolds, that when he opened the first circuit court as judge in his county, the sheriff went into the court yard and said: 'Boys, come in, our John is going to hold court.' I believe it is related of him also that when he had to pronounce a sentence of death upon a man found guilty of murder, he said to him, 'Mr. Green, the jury in their verdict say you are guilty of murder, and the law says you are to be hung. Now, I want you and your friends down on Indian creek to know that it is not I, but the jury and the law who condemn you. When would you like to be hung?"

"My friends, this section of the State has long been noted for its fertility and attractiveness. As early as the war of 1812, the troops and rangers in their expeditions against the Indians on Peoria Lake, noted the country of Sangamon as one of great fertility. The Indians appreciated this, for, in the Pottawattamie tongue, Sangamo means 'the country where there is plenty to eat.' The 'St. Gamo Kedentry,' as it was called, became famous, and in the autumn of 1819, Mr. Kelly, with his family, camped on Spring creek, near the present location of Springfield. In May, 1821, a term of court was held in his cabin. In 1823, the public lands having been surveyed, a town was laid out and called Calhoun, but as the settlers came in that name was dropped and the name of Springfield adopted.

"Fellow citizens, you have lived in the world's greatest period of advancement, you have seen the transformation produced by the engine and the iron wheel over iron roads; the invention of the telegraph and its controlling power in business and commerce, so that at any time during the day we may know the markets of London, Paris and New York, the three great centers of the world. By the telephone, friends may hold communion with friends miles apart in their own voice. By rail we may travel at any speed up to sixty miles an hour. All these discoveries and improvements you have witnessed.

"In the political world you have seen vast changes, a great civil war, a country saved, slavery abolished, the Constitution amended, and one of your own old settlers of Sangamon, whom you all knew, elected President of the United States. You have seen the capital of our own State removed from Vandalia to Springfield, you have seen the states grow from twenty to thirty eight, and you have seen great improvement in agriculture. The improvement in agricultural implements is wonderful. You ride and cut and bind your grain, you ride and cut your grass, you ride and plow, and three men with your present advantages can do more than a dozen forty years ago.

"The world, my friends, has made its greatest leap of progress within the last forty or fifty years. It is as if some magician's hand had cast a spell of improvement over the age in which we live, and had called forth all the mighty engines of mother nature to make the world grow as it never did before.

"Illinois has been peculiarly fortunate in the possession of a class of pioneer citizens and statesmen far above the average of men. The first settlers of this country were remarkable men, strong in intellect, strong in will, and upright in character. The State has been greatly favored and honored by the men who have been prominent as its lawyers and statesmen. With such men as Edwards, Cook, Bond, Coles, Pope, Breese, Duncan, Thomas, and Lockwood, and Lincoln, Logan, Douglas, Browning, Hardin, Bissell, Yates, Stuart, Harris, Shields, Dement, and a host of others I might name, the prosperity and greatness of our State was firmly secure.

"They all helped to mould our early institutions. They left the impress of their thoughts and lives, not only to adorn the annals of our own State, but to add new luster to the historic page of the Nation and the world.

"But, fellow-citizens, I must close. We have a great county, State, and country. It is our duty to take care of the inheritance handed down to us, for those who are to come after us.

"Our State and Nation have a grand future. I have briefly referred to the growth and progress of our State, but it has only fairly entered upon its career of prosperity. Soon we shall pass off the stage, our children will take our places. When fifty years more shall have passed away, may it be truly said of us, as we say of our fathers and mothers who have gone, that we were worthy of our time and country."

The speech of the Governor was listened to with marked attention, and was received with applause.

At the conclusion of the Governor's speech, the meeting adjourned until two o'clock for dinner, after singing the Doxology, "Praise God, from whom all blessings flow."

After dinner, the meeting was again called to order, when the election of officers took place. R. W. Diller and James H. Matheny were each re-elected President and Secretary, together with the following-named Vice Presidents:

Moses G. Wadsworth, Auburn; Davis Meredith, Ball; John T. Constant, Buffalo Heart; John T. Stewart, Capital; James Parkinson, Curran; John Wilson, Clear Lake; Alex Irwin, Cartwright; Daniel G. Jones, Cotton Hill; Cyrus VanDeren, Catham; Daniel Waters, Cooper; J. Ray Dunlap, Fancy Creek; David Talbot, Gardner; Samuel O. Maxey, Island Grove; Charles Cantrall, Illiopolis; Joseph L. Wilcox, Loami; Oliver P. Hall, Mechanicsburg; Thomas Ray, New Berlin; John B. Weber, Pawnee; Milton D. McCoy, Rochester; Goodrich Lightfoot, Springfield; M. A. Stevens, Salisbury; John Ennis, Talcott; George Pickrell, Wheatfield, Isaac J. Taylor, Williams; Harness Trumbo, Woodside.

Mr. Kennedy, of Springfield, was then introduced and proceeded to address the meeting, and we regret we can only give a very imperfect synopsis of it.

The address carried the old settlers back two hundred years ago, when Marquette explored the Mississippi and Illinois rivers, and interviewed the Indian savages living on their borders. He then portrayed the saintly character of the Jesuit missionary—the first to plant the cross on the wilderness of the northwest, and elevating the mind to the noblest conceptions of the future life. Allusion was made to the stand taken by the French settlers of Kaskaskia, who, under the direction of Father Gibault, welcomed with hospitable hearts, General Clark and his distressed regiment, and rendered valuable assistance in the colonial struggle for freedom. These were worthy of the highest gratitude—first to the pioneer missionary, and second to the French settlers, closely allying them with the Illinois settlers of the present.

Mr. M. A. Stevens, of Salisbury, was next introduced and addressed the people briefly upon matters of interest to the old settlers present. He was happy to see so many present, both old and young. The young to honor the old settlers, and the old to see and greet each other as old friends. He referred to the land marks of the old settlers on every hand—schools, churches and other institutions. He closed with words of welcome to the old settlers to Salisbury.

James H. Matheny then came forward and made a characteristic speech. We can only give a brief synopsis: He said he did not know as he could be heard, as he was not in a very good condition, as they could all see that he had more cheek than the government allowed. He was proud of Salisbury, for in this meeting they had done honor to themselves. He spoke of the time when he and others of his friends were boys, and related some amusing anecdotes that set the audience in roars of laughter. He also told of how the boys obtained money to go to shows; they dug 'ginseng' to the amount of twenty-five cents, and then they were sure of the show, particularly if it was in summer—if in the winter, it was not so sure. He then spoke of the advances that had been made in all affairs of domestic life—and cited as illustrations the food seen on the tables, etc., set upon the grounds to-day. He related, with inimitable humor, his first visit to St. Louis, and his experience at the Planters' House with a bill of fare, and the mistakes he made in calling for food by the aid of this bill of fare. He then spoke eloquently of the advancement of our country and the people, making it one of the grandest and most glorious lands in the world. None could compare with it in all that made a people happy. He was glad to be here once more, and to meet old friends; it was to him the happiest day of the year; but he understood well that the time was not far distant when he would not be here. He had a list of the names of the old settlers who had gone to the other country, and soon others would follow, and the band of old settlers would be thinned one by one.

The closing remarks were eloquent and touching, and were received with great applause.

Mr. Alexander Irwin then made a report of the deaths of old settlers in Pleasant Plains, Cartwright township.

Maxwell Campbell; born in Cobarrus county, North Carolina, October 29, 1795; departed this life August 10, 1881; aged about eighty-six years.

Mrs. A. W. Hays; born in Pennsylvania, Lancaster county; married in May, 1834; died in March, 1881; aged sixty-seven years and four months.

Horace Howard; born in Vermont, April 8, 1803, and departed this life May 4, 1881; aged seventy-eight years and one month.

Thomas Mostiller; born October 8, 1807, in Butler county, Ohio; married in Franklin county, Indiana; came to Sangamon county, Illinois, in 1830; died February 22, 1881; aged seventy-four years.

Mark A. Mowrey; born July 12, 1815, in Smithfield, Rhode Island; married August 13, 1840; settled in Sangamon county in 1849; died April 24, 1881; aged sixty-five years, nine months and eighteen days.

Mrs. Anna M. Johnson; born in Champaign county, Ohio, June 6, 1830; departed this life April 9, 1881; aged forty-four years, ten months and three days.

After reading the list he made a humorous but brief speech about our country, which was well received by the audience, but for want of space we must omit even a synopsis.

General Anderson came forward, and said that he probably had as much vanity as anyone, but he had not vanity enough to attempt to make a speech, and he would not do it. He would say that he had been here over fifty years, and had seen all incidents to a settler's life. He borrowed money to purchase his first eighty acres. He gave an interesting account of how he was obliged to do in early days, and closed with giving some good advice to the young people present, and closed by thanking all for their attention.

Hon. James H. Matheny offered the following preamble and resolutions, which were unanimously adopted:

WHEREAS, The President of the United States has been shot down by the hand of a cowardly assassin, and now lies in a critical condition at the Executive Mansion, Resolved, That the old settlers and friends assembled deeply deplore the calamity which seems about to befall the country—a calamity which would be none the less deplorable than the assassination of our old friend and pioneer settler, Abraham Lincoln.

Resolved, That our prayers will ascend to the Throne of Grace for his speedy recovery, and that our deepest sympathies be extended to his family and to the Nation, in this, their great affliction.

At this stage of the proceedings Mr. L. Huber, of Cartwright township, exhibited an instrument little known at the present day, called a "hackle," which he found here when he came in 1855. The instrument was used in preparing flax and hemp. It excited considerable attention.

President Diller then made some complimentary remarks in relation to the meeting in Salisbury. He had not seen a drunken man during the meeting, which had not occurred at any other meeting, and he was proud of Salisbury, and her citizens had reason to be proud of the meeting. In conclusion he told the people that they could go home, as the old settlers' meeting for 1881 was closed, or in other words was adjourned.

The old settlers, after a general handshaking, left for their respective homes with pleasant thoughts of the old settlers' meeting for 1881.

EDUCATIONAL.

Few even of the older States of the Union have an educational history more rich, varied and instructive than that of Illinois. When that history shall be written and due honor shall be given to those who have raised the State to the high position which she now holds, worthy mention shall be made of that association of young men, who, early in 1829, while pursuing their studies in Yale College, devoted themselves to a life-work in the cause of education and religion in the then new State of Illinois. The names of those seven men were Mason Grosvenor, Theron Baldwin, John F. Brooks, Elisha Jenney, William Kirby, Asa Turner and Julian M. Sturtevant. The first fruits of their exertions was the establishment of Illinois College at Jacksonville. The after fruits of their united and individual action, both general and special, cannot be estimated.

The first educational convention in the State, was held at Vandalia, February 13, 1833, by gentlemen from different parts of the State, desirous of encouraging education and especially common schools. After an address on education by James Hall, an association was organized under the title of the "Illinois Institute of Education." An effort was made to procure statistics and information in regard to schools and the condition of education, but with little success.

A second convention was held at Vandalia, December 5 and 6, 1834, at which sixty delegates were present from over thirty counties of the State, principally members of the General Assembly, then in session, among whom were Abraham Lincoln, Stephen A. Douglas and others, whose names became well known in the State. Hon. Cyrus Edwards was chosen President, and Stephen A. Douglas, Secretary. Through the influences of this convention some important changes were effected in the previous school laws of the State, of 1825, 1829 and 1833.

In February, 1841, was formed the "Illinois State Education Society" at Springfield, "to promote by all laudable means, the diffusion of knowledge in regard to education; and especially to render the system of common schools throughout the State as perfect as possible." Its first officers were Hon. Cyrus Edwards, President; Col. Thomas Mather, Hon. William Thomas, Hon. S. H. Treat, Dr. W. B. Eagan and Onslow Peters, Vice-Presidents; A. T. Bledsoe and C. R. Wells, Secretaries; and P. C. Canedy, Treasurer. A memorial was prepared and presented to the legislature then in session, urging the appointment of a State School Superintendent, and other amendments to the school system. A new school law was passed, which, however, embraced but few of the desired improvements.

Another effort was made by the friends of popular education to secure through the legislature of 1843, the establishment of the office of Superintendent of Schools, which was now regarded as essential to a comprehensive system of public instruction. Petitions in this behalf were widely circulated for signatures, but it was found that the people generally were themselves opposed to the change, chiefly on the ground of supposed expense, and consequently nothing was done by the legislature. Notwithstanding this ill success, it was believed by many that the time was ripe for the proposed measure, and that a general convention should be called together, of the right men, not for investigation and discussion merely, but to devise a system of common schools that might be recommended with confidence to the succeeding legislature. The proposition was very favorably received, and an appointment was made for a convention of delegates, teachers and friends of education, to meet at Peoria, October 9, 1844.

The convention was not largely attended, but was unanimous in favor of a State Superintendency, and taxation for the support of schools. A plan of school system was drawn up and a long and able memorial to the legislature prepared by a committee. The proposed bill was explained and sustained by J. S. Wright before the legislative committee. The result was a general revision of the school laws, and the passage of an act making the Secretary of State ex-officio Superintendent of Schools, authorizing special taxation for school purposes, and introducing other decided improvements upon the former system.

An educational convention met in Springfield, December 16th, 17th, 19th and 23d, 1846. Various topics of educational interest were discussed and a committee instructed to memorialize the legislature for amendments to the school law, especially in making the school superintendency a distinct office to be filled by the legislature.

A convention met at Springfield January 15th to 18th, during the session of the legislature. A committee was appointed to prepare a memorial to the legislature and draft a bill for a school law that should embrace the following principles: That the property of the State should be taxed to educate the children of the State; that the office of State Superintendent of Public Instruction should be separate and distinct from every other office; that the County Commissioners should receive reasonable compensation for their services as ex-officio County Superintendents of Schools; and that a portion of the college and seminary funds should be devoted to aid in the education of common school teachers. These several principles were now for the first time pressed upon the attention of the legislature, but, though the school law was revised at this session, the system was left essentially as it was before.

On the 26th of December, 1853, there was convened at Bloomington an educational convention, composed more strictly of teachers, superintendents and commissioners of schools and other friends of popular education. Committees were appointed to petition the legislature for a State Superintendent of Schools, for the establishment and support of a Normal School, and a school system without taxation.

The petition was at last favorably received by the General Assembly, and a separate department of education was created, and Hon. Ninian W. Edwards, of Springfield, was appointed the first State Superintendent of Public Instruction, by whom a free school law was prepared, which, in its main features, is in force to-day. Thus, a citizen of Sangamon county became the author, virtually, of our common school law.

The present Superintendent of Public Schools is James P. Slade. Shortly after his election to the position, a teacher wrote the New England Journal of Education of him as follows:

"We have a new State Superintendent—a teacher, and the choice of the teachers. We are so elated at this victory of the profession over politicians, that I want to tell you something of our new chief.

"James P. Slade has long been a familiar name upon the rolls of our State Teachers' Association and of our State Association of County Superintendents. Always present at their meetings, always performing with marked ability every duty assigned, he has long been accounted one of the 'stand-bys;' executive committees knew that when they placed his name upon the programme they were sure of a good exercise. His business capacities were so generally recognized, that since a time to which the memory of man (or woman) runneth not to the contrary, he has been treasurer of both these State Associations. He has also filled acceptably other offices, usually those requiring much hard work and making very little show; and this is characteristic of the man. He is a quiet, diffident man, never putting himself forward, unless there is some hard work to be done which nobody else is ready to undertake. He is not a college-bred man; but so far from boasting of it, as some so-called self-made men do, he feels it to be a disadvantage, and all his life has regretted that the circumstance of his early years forbade his receiving that thorough mental training which a good college can give. But he is a born student, and his whole life has been given to study,—the study of books, of nature, and of men. Thus, outside of college walls, he has gained that mental discipline which some fail to gain even within them. That he has gained this is attested by the fact that he holds a State certificate for Illinois, and that the honorary degree of A. M. was conferred upon him in 1873 by Shurtleff College.

"Mr. Slade was born in Westerlo, Albany county, New York, February 9, 1837. His father was a farmer in very moderate circumstances. The story of his boyhood, is the familiar one of the struggle between an intense desire for an education and hard, unrelenting poverty. Only a few months each year could he go to school; the rest of the time was spent in work upon the farm. The spring he was seventeen his school-time was extended two months, during which time he attended the Chesterville Academy, two miles from home, boarding at home and doing chores nights and mornings. That summer, while helping to gather the scanty harvest from the not over-generous soil of a small farm, he persuaded his father to send him to school the following winter. The necessary money must be borrowed; but the boy, who had already determined what should be his life-work, promised to repay all with interest as soon as he could earn enough, by teaching to do so. As a result, he spent six months (1854-5) as a student in Fairfield Seminary, Herkimer county, New York. In the spring, being now eighteen years old he commenced teaching; for his first five months of pedagogic labor he received $80 and 'boarded round.' The following winter was spent in teaching, and the spring found him a student in Hudson River Institute, at Clave-rack.

"The summer vacation was spent, as usual, in the harvest field. In September, 1856, anticipating Greeley's advice, he went west to Belleville, St. Clair county, Illinois, which has ever since been his home. In less than a month he secured a country school for nine months, receiving a salary of $35 per month. The next fall, being then but twenty years of age, he was made teacher of the grammar school of Belleville. From that time to this he has been constantly and closely connected with these schools, rising by sheer force of merit to the highest educational positions in his city and county, as now he has risen to the highest in his adopted State.

"The circumstances connected with his election as Principal of the High School are suggestive. By agreement, each member of the Board made out a list showing his choice of teachers. On comparing these lists, made without any consultation together, it was found that each had the name of James P. Slade as Principal of the High School. This result was a complete surprise to Mr. Slade, who thus, at twenty-four, was put in this responsible position. He filled it with marked success. Before me, as I write, lie letters from some of his old pupils, and these give, perhaps unconsciously to their writers, a better idea of Mr. Slade as a teacher than any words of mine can do. Says one: 'He honestly and conscientiously dealt with his pupils, with a view, not only to their intellectual, but also to their moral, advancement.' Under date of July 19, 1866, one, just entering upon a university course, says: 'I think the principle he inculcated of knowing the why and the wherefore of things, and of getting, not so much what the book said, but the sense, the root of a thing, will be of great use to me at the university. Among the most important things learned, or partially learned, while in his school, is the science of study, the manner of getting lessons, or, rather, the science of applying one's mind to the investigation of a subject.'

"We could give pages of such testimony, were there room.

"Mr. Slade continued principal of the High School for six years; then (1867) he was appointed County Superintendent to fill a vacancy. At the expiration of this term, 1869, he was elected for the full four years' term, by a majority of more than 1,200 votes over two competitors. These six years were devoted to the supervision and visitation of the schools of St. Clair county, and they wrought wonders in those schools. He was re-appointed principal of Belleville High School, and continued to hold this position until after his nomination for the office to which he has just been elected.

"But the county could not spare his services. The County Superintendent died about a year after his election, and the Board of Supervisors persuaded Mr. Slade to take that position again; he did so, served out that term, and at the two elections since he has been re-elected by overwhelming majorities.

"This is his record since, as a boy of nineteen, he came into our State: One year's teaching in a country school; fifteen years in the Belleville schools, eleven of them as Principal of High School; ten years County Superintendent, six of these years devoting his whole time to the supervision of county schools, four of them serving both as Principal of High School and as County Superintendent. That he is a faithful and successful worker is proved by the fact that he was retained in the same schools so long, never leaving one situation except for one higher.

"From the time he first commenced teaching, Mr. Slade has been a constant subscriber, and of late years a valued contributor, to one or more educational journals. Of his work in State and county educational gatherings I have before spoken. He has also attended several meetings of the National Association, and counts it as one of his greatest privileges that at the meeting at St. Louis he saw and heard Horace Mann. He is one of the leading spirits in the Southern Illinois Educational Association, which has done so much for the cause of education in our 'Egypt.' He has attended each of its three annual meetings, and been once its Secretary and once its President.

"So much for the professional record of our chief. In business capacity and executive ability he also stands approved.

"His personal characteristics command the respect of all, and the tender devotion of those who know him best. He is a man of fine presence, and impresses you at once as a gentleman and a scholar. So modest is he that he says, 'Of three things I am certain: 1. I am not a great scholar; 2. I am neither a rapid nor a skillful writer; 3. I am neither fluent or eloquent in speech.' But we, looking upon his work with unprejudiced eyes, know that he underrates his own abilities, and feel sure that, as Dr. Bateman predicts, 'he will justify the reasonable expectations of the many good men who are looking to him with confidence and hope.'"

Progress in this county is nowhere better illustrated than in connection with our Public Schools. In the early day good schools were like "angel visits, few and far between," and it was considered very fortunate indeed if an opportunity was offered for obtaining even the rudiments of a common school education. A person competent to teach the three branches, commonly and sarcastically spoken of as the three "Rs," "Reading, 'Riting and 'Rithmetic," could seldom be obtained. Some of the few scattered settlements could not afford to employ a teacher, and were therefore compelled to do without, or send their children through the timber or across the prairie to some more fortunate settlement where a school was in operation. Some were sent a distance of six to nine miles, walking the entire distance morning and night of each day, in order that they might avail themselves of the opportunity of acquiring a little knowledge of their mother tongue, and thus fit themselves for the duties of life. How different now! In every township there are from seven to eleven schools in successful operation. Competent teachers are employed, many of whom have spent years in fitting themselves for their vocation, and who make teaching a profession, by preparing themselves as thoroughly for this work as the lawyer, doctor, or divine are presumed to do.

The description given elsewhere of the old log houses will answer for the old-fashioned school house. The school furniture was slab seats for the scholars, a three-legged stool and a hazel or birch rod for the teacher. As for books, but few were needed, the less the better, as the teacher could get along the more readily. The walls of the school room were decorated by the artistic hands of the scholars, with drawings of the teacher, instead of being hung with such beautiful and instructive maps as are now found in all our school buildings. Instead of the beautiful specimens of penmanship now-a-days set for our children to copy, teachers were then employed who, in many cases could scarcely write their own names. Altogether, in the light of to-day, the schools of forty and fifty years ago were very dreary affairs.

By law, the sixteenth section of every township was to be used for school purposes, but there being little or no sale for land, and the government price of $1.25 per acre being all that could be realized from its sale, the income to be derived from it could amount to but little. Subscription schools, therefore, had to be depended upon.

It was not until after the passage of the law framed by Hon. Ninian W. Edwards, that much was done in behalf of the free common schools. The various townships in the county were at once re-districted, and a thorough system of popular education was undertaken. In the quarter of a century that has past, much has been done. School houses have been erected at almost every cross-road, and the advantages of the common school system are now appreciated by all.

For the year ending June, 1881, as gleaned from the report of the County Superintendent of Public Schools, there were twenty-seven thousand, three hundred and thirty-eight persons under twenty-one years of age; between six and twenty-one, there were eighteen thousand, eight hundred and sixty. There were enrolled in the public schools, eleven thousand, one hundred and forty-one pupils. There were one hundred and fifty-two male and one hundred and eighty-five female teachers employed. Of brick school houses, there were thirty-four; of frame, one hundred and fifty. The highest monthly wages paid male teacher, was $150 per month; highest paid female teacher, $80; lowest paid male, $25; lowest paid female, $20. The estimated value of the school property outside of Springfield was $196,440. Estimated value of school property in Springfield, $120,000.

ILLINOIS STATE UNIVERSITY.

The Literary and Theological Institute of the Evangelical Lutheran Church at Hillsboro, was incorporated by an act of the legislature of Illinois, January, 1847, and immediately went into operation. The institution was divided into two separate departments, the one collegiate, and the other theological, and so independent of each other, that donations could be made to either department, and the donors have assurance that their gifts would be appropriated to the object designated. While the theological seminary was designated for the special benefit of young men who were desirous of qualifying themselves for the ministry in the Lutheran Church, the collegiate department was open to all alike, without any discrimination as to religious profession, provided only that their deportment be conformable to the moral principles and precepts which are universally acknowledged by Christians of all denominations.

The college began operation in 1849, and issued its first annual catalogue August, 1850. It had fair success during its existence in Hillsboro, but believing a better field to be open in Springfield, those most interested in its prosperity secured the passage of an amendment to the charter, permitting its removal to the latter place and changing its name to Illinois State University. Among those instrumental in its removal, living in Springfield, and who became members of its first Board of Trustees, were James C. Conkling, John T. Stuart, Elijah Iles, John M. Burkhardt, E. R. Wiley, Thomas Lewis, Jacob Divelbiss, David Miller, John B. Weber, Revs. James Smith, Albert Hale, R. V. Dodge, Francis Springer, Edmund Miller, S. W. Harkey, and C. B. Thummel. John T. Stuart was elected President of the Board; Rev. A. A. Trimper, Secretary; Thomas Lewis, Treasurer.

The following named constituted the faculty as first organized: Rev. Francis Springer, M.A., President and Professor of Political and Moral Science; Rev. S. W. Harkey, D.D., Professor of Christian Theology and Natural Science; Rev. Edmund Miller, M.A., Professor of Mathematics and Principal of the Preparatory Department; Rev. C. B. Thummel, M.A., Professor of Ancient and Modern Languages.

The college commenced operations April, 1852, in the building formerly occupied by the Mechanics' Union, and now used as a church by the German Lutheran Church. A new edifice was at once placed in process of construction, occupying a beautiful and commanding site about one mile northeast of the public square. The spot selected is high and healthy, having an elevation of twenty feet above that of the old State House. The edifice as originally designed was to be of brick, four stories in height, the main centre being 70x65 feet, with wings on each side 41 feet wide, or a total frontage of 152 feet, the whole to cost $35,000. Only the main centre was ever completed.

The trustees in their first annual announcement thus addressed the public:

"The trustees, animated by a patriotic desire to render the institution to which their cases are devoted, alike the honest pride of the State, and honorable to themselves, are resolved to do all in their power, not only to furnish suitable buildings, but also to supply the most accomplished and experienced instructors, and the best means for the literary and scientific improvement of the students. It is designed to carry into effect, as soon as possible, that provision of the charter which authorizes the trustees to establish separate departments of the learned professions, the science and arts, including, besides the usual departments of Theology, Medicine and Law, a department of Mechanical Philosophy, and also of Agriculture. The object to be attained is the establishment of a University fully capable of furnishing to all the great interests and pursuits of man, the rich blessings which learning, science and skill can impart. But the trustees do not venture to make this statement of their purposes and wishes for the sake of conveying an impression that they are already in possession of the pecuniary means which such an enterprise requires. On the contrary, they desire to be understood rather as making an appeal to the public for liberal and generous donations to enable them to carry forward to successful completion an undertaking which necessities of an intelligent and rapidly increasing community urgently demand. It will be perceived, also, that the trustees have a just appreciation of their responsibilities, and of the wants which the public mind expect them to supply. In order to fulfill their mission by a proper discharge of their legal incorporation, they must rely on the intelligence and philanthropy of their fellow man for the requisite funds and other needful co-operation."

The first session of the college occupied but a part of the year. Seventy-nine students were enrolled. The second year, ending June 29, 1853, witnessed an enrollment of one hundred and forty-four students, a gratifying increase. The Mechanics' Union Building was still occupied, the new edifice not being completed. During the summer of 1853, President Springer and Professor Harkey were engaged in collecting funds to finish the building.

For the coming year the faculty were the same as the year previous, save Rev. Daniel Garber, A. B., was substituted for Rev. C. B. Thummel, as Professor of Latin and Greek Languages.

The summer of 1854, found the college building still uncompleted, but it was finished in time for occupancy that fall. The number of the students for the year 1853-4 was one hundred and sixty.

In the year 1855, on account of a disagreement in some matters, President Springer resigned, and Rev. S. W. Harkey performed the duties of President. In the fall of 1856, the faculty was composed of the following named: Rev. S. W. Harkey, D. D., President, pro tem, Professor of Theology, Mental and Moral Science, Belles Lettres and the German Languages; Rev. Edmund Miller, A. M., Professor of Mathematics; Rev. Benjamin C. Suesserott, A. M., Professor of Latin and Greek Languages; Alexander Pollack, Professor of History, and Principal of the English and Business Departments.

In the summer of 1858, the Faculty elected Rev. William M. Reynolds, D. D., President, and he was inaugurated and delivered an excellent address July 29, 1858. The faculty was then composed as follows: Rev. W. M. Reynolds, President, Professor of Intellectual and moral Philosophy; S. W. Harkey, D. D., Professor of Belles Lettres and German Language and Literature; Rev. B. C. Suesserott, A. M., Professor of Ancient Languages; Rev. L. P. Esbiorn, Professor of Scandinavian Languages and Literature, Chemistry; H. Croll, A. M., Professor of Mathematics and Natural Philosophy; Alexander Pollock, Principal of the English Department and Assistant Professor of Mathematics; J. G. Auglade, Professor of French and Spanish.

After this time the University did not seem to prosper so well, but it continued to struggle along until 1867, when it ceased to be run as a University. But there has never been a time when a school of some kind has not been in existence in the building. The deed conveying the land requires that a school shall be maintained, or the title to the property shall revert to the original heirs of the donor, Pascal P. Enos.

Between 1867 and 1874 the title in the property was vested in Rev. Mr. Passavant, of the Pittsburg Synod, and by him transferred to the Missouri Synod of the German Evangelical Lutheran Church.

Rev. Francis Springer, D.D., the first President of the Illinois State University, was born March 19, 1810, at Roxbury, Franklin county, Pennsylvania. When a young man he learned the business of sign and ornamental painting. He received his literary education in Pennsylv-vania College, and his theological studies were pursued at the Theological Seminary of the Lutheran Church, both located at Gettysburg, Pennsylvania. He also studied under two distinguished ministers, one at Otsego, and the other at Schohaire, New York. He paid his expenses by occasionally working at his trade and teaching school. He was licensed to preach by the Evangelical Lutheran Synod of Maryland, October 18, 1836, and was ordained by the same body, October 17, 1837. He was married April 11, 1837, to Mary Kriegh, at Clear Springs, Washington county, Maryland. He taught school and preached in that vicinity from October, 1836, for about two and a half years. They moved to Springfield, Illinois, arriving May, 1839. In 1847 he moved to Hillsboro, Illinois, and in 1855 moved back to Springfield.

Rev. Francis Springer commenced teaching soon after his arrival in Springfield, and continued to teach and preach until 1847, when he moved to Hillsboro, Illinois, as President of Hillsboro College. That institution was moved to Springfield in 1852, as Illinois State University. These were both under the direction and patronage of the Lutheran church. He resigned in 1855. He was afterwards school commissioner of Sangamon county, and was Superintendent of Schools for the city of Springfield, which position he resigned, and became chaplain of the Tenth Illinois Cavalry, soon after the beginning of the rebellion in 1861. A short time after the battle of Prairie Grove, Arkansas—December 7, 1862—he united with Dr. James Johnson in raising a loyal regiment in Arkansas, of which he became chaplain. It was the First Arkansas Infantry. He was appointed in 1863 post chaplain at Fort Smith, which he held until 1867, when he resigned, and returned to his family, at Springfield. In 1870 he moved to Irving, Montgomery county, Illinois, and continued preaching until the fall of 1873, when he was elected superintendent of schools for Montgomery county, with his office at Hillsboro, Illinois.

In the summer of 1881, Mr. Springer returned to Springfield. He continues to preach as opportunity offers, believing the minister of God should always be faithfully employed. Rev. Francis Springer is a man of lively sympathy with the rest of mankind, without regard to race, color, nationality or religion. He has large faith in the perfectability of the human race by means of the labors and experiences of the life that now is, and the hereafter. His orthodoxy, as a religious man, does not descend to the min-nte particulars of a creed, but confides mainly in the cardinal fact of Christianity, that the only true ennobling of the race must be wrought out under the recognized leadership of the world's Redeemer "the Christ of God."

The degree of Doctor of Divinity was conferred on Rev. Francis Springer in 1869, by Wittenburg College, Springfield, Ohio.

GERMAN EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN CONCORDIA SEMINARY.

This institution of learning, the successor of the Illinois State University, is the outgrowth of a similar institution started in Fort Wayne many years ago.

In 1838 Wyneken came from Germany to America and settled in Fort Wayne, Indiana, where he was subsequently ordained a minister in the German Evangelical Lutheran Church, and as such for several years acted as a missionary in Ohio, Indiana, and the southern part of Michigan, traveling almost constantly, preaching the word wherever he went.

In 1844 he put in practical operation a scheme he had for the education of young men and preparing them for the sacred ministry. Two young men placed themselves under his instruction that year, and traveled with him wherever called, studying as the opportunity was afforded them, and receiving the instruction of the zealous missionary. This was the beginning of the flourishing Concordia University now in existence in Fort Wayne. The two young men thus instructed became zealous and efficient workers in the Master's cause. One of them died a few years since, the other yet labors "in season and out of season" in preaching the "glad tidings of salvation."

In 1845 Mr. Wyneken was called to the pastorate of a church in Baltimore, where he remained five years. In 1850 he was called to St. Louis, and soon after elected President of the Joint Missouri Evangelical Lutheran Synod, and as such removed to Fort Wayne, a more central location, from which place he visited the churches throughout the bounds of the Synod, and where good could be accomplished. In this office he served for several years with profit to the people and churches within his charge. In 1864 he accepted a call from a church in Cleveland, Ohio, where he labored for eleven years. On account of failing health the congregation sent him to California in 1875, where it was thought he might be restored to health and future usefulness. Early in May, 1876, he made all arrangements to return home, and on the morning of the 4th, while dressing himself, he fell over on the bed and soon expired. His last work on earth was done, and he was called to his reward.

In addition to the institution of learning in Fort Wayne, which grew from the humble beginning as stated to the rank of a university, the Missouri Synod opened a school in the interior of Missouri, which was subsequently moved to St. Louis, and became the present German Evangelical Lutheran College. Students in both these institutions became so numerous they could not be accommodated, and the property of the old Illinois State University being for sale it was thought advisable to purchase it. Preparatory to this end, early in January, 1874, about seventy-five pupils were transferred to this place, under charge of Professor Kroening. In October, 1874, the deed to the property was transferred to the Missouri Synod, under whose charge the three institutions are conducted. Professor Kroening remained in charge until the fall of 1875, when all needful preparations had been made to carry on a successful school. The faculty as organized at this time consisted of Professor A. Cramer, Director, who for twenty-five years previous had been connected either at Fort Wayne or St. Louis; Professor H. C. Wyniken, second theological Professor, and Professor G. Kroening, in the Preparatory Department. These gentlemen yet remain in the institution, and in addition in the fall of 1881, J. S. Simon, for twenty-eight years teacher in the senior class of the parochial school of the Evangelical Lutheran Congregation at Monroe, Michigan, was called as assistant Professor in the Preparatory Department, and entered upon the discharge of his duties, November 1.

Since the property passed into the hands of the present operators, the buildings and grounds have been greatly improved, four new residences for the faculty have been built, and other good work accomplished. As fast as means are secured other improvements will be made.

The college is supported by donation through various German Evangelical Lutheran Churches throughout the United States, and a student upon entering must state his firm determination to become an espouser of the doctrines to which the church adheres, and must have had a three years' course in a preparatory college situated at Fort Wayne, Ind. Its future is easily to be seen, with an attendance of nearly one hundred and twenty-five students, and yearly growing in proportion, it promises in the near future to rank among the first of its kind in the State, and it is, in reality, to be hoped that these most sanguine expectations will be verified. Let the good work commenced proceed and bear its fruit.

Rev. A. Cramer, D. D., Director of Concordia Seminary, was born in Germany.

Rev. H. C. Wyneken was born in Fort Wayne, Indiana, December 15, 1844. He is the son of Rev. Mr. Wyneken, a sketch of whom has already been given in connection with this article. The younger Wyneken went with his parents to the various places already mentioned, save California. While living in St. Louis, he attended the German Lutheran Parochial School, and also the English High School. He entered Concordia College, in St. Louis, in 1858, and subsequently was transferred to Fort Wayne, Indiana, where he graduated in 1865. He then entered the Theological Seminary of the German Evangelical Lutheran Church in St. Louis, and pursued a three years' course, graduating in 1868. He was prepared to accept a call from some congregation, but on account of ill health was sent to Europe, in January, 1869, where he remained nearly two years. On his return he was called as an assistant pastor to his father, from the church in Cleveland Ohio, and was duly ordained December 18, 1870. He remained at Cleveland until his removal here in January, 1876.

Professor Wyneken was united in marriage with Miss Couradine Schilling, of Bremen, Europe, June 29, 1871, by whom he has had five children, four of whom are now living.

Like his father, Professor Wyneken is a thorough worker, and in addition to his labors in the school room, acts as a missionary among the Germans in the neighborhood of Springfield, and among the colored people of the city. He has managed for some time a Sunday School for the latter in the College chapel, having some thirty to forty pupils in attendance.

Professor G. Kroening was born in Martinsville, Niagara county, New York, March 3, 1851. He is of German descent, his parents emigrating from the latter country, and settling in Martinsville, in 1845. When ten years of age, he commenced attending the common schools of Martinsville, where he continued for five years, and then spent three years in assisting his father in agriculture and other pursuits, at the expiration of which time he entered Concordia Seminary, in Fort Wayne, Indiana, where he remained six years, and entered the Concordia College at St. Louis, and studied theology for two years. In January, 1874, he accepted the professorship in the Seminary, and was immediately sent to Springfield as already stated.

BETTIE STUART INSTITUTE, SPRINGFIELD.

This institution, though drawing pupils from all parts of the Union, may from its influence be emphatically called a home school, was organized by Mrs. M. McKee Homes, a lady well and favorably known throughout the West as a successful instructor of young girls. The building that she first occupied being inadequate to her wants, and a number of her patrons recognizing her executive ability and superior fitness for conducting a Young Ladies' Seminary, made arrangements to provide for her a suitable building. To accomplish this, in 1879, a Board of Trustees was incorporated under the general State law for academies. The names of the incorporators were: Hon. John T. Stuart, J. Bunn, Hon. J. C. Conkling, Hon. John A. Chestnut, John Williams, and C. C. Brown.

The residence of Mr. C. C. Brown was purchased, added to and remodeled. The institution was named "Bettie Stuart Institute," in honor of the memory of the late Mrs. C. C. Brown, the lovely and accomplished daughter of the Hon. John T. Stuart. So far as the educational work of the school is concerned, it has been under the sole control of Mrs. Homes, who has done her work faithfully and thoroughly. She has called to her aid the best teachers in every department of study. Some of the most efficient she found in Springfield, others have come from the best schools of this country and Europe. A characteristic feature of the Board of Instruction is a union of feeling, and a concentration of interest in the work they have undertaken to accomplish.

A high grade of scholarship has been established and maintained in every department. A diploma from this school entitles the holder to a high degree of respect. It signifies that she has attained, in all the varied studies of a four years' course, a satisfactory proficiency; that her attendance during that time has averaged well, and that her deportment has been above reproach. Considering the fact that the institution has been, thus far, self-supporting, its success and efficiency are wonderful. The annual average attendance has been over a hundred, and it has already graduated sixty-four young ladies, several of whom are sustaining a high reputation as teachers, while many more are presiding with dignity over their own households. To show how important a factor this school is in educational matters, we quote (from memory) the words of a distinguished divine, formerly of Springfield, uttered in a sermon preached to his people: "Few realize how much Springfield owes to Mrs. Homes' school. It has raised the standard of scholarship and laid the foundations for a broad culture, and where it has taken one pupil out of the Public Schools, it has put twenty in, by awakening a more wide-spread interest in the subject of education. Among the graduates are the daughters of many whose names are indissolubly connected with the history of the State in its various interests, military, political, financial and religious. Indeed, the school represents in its patronage, all the professions and industries. Its founders and supporters are a class of people calculated to give added tone and dignity to its character, and it will doubtless be cherished with pride by the State, as it is now, by its capital city—Springfield.

The following-named compose the present Board of Trustees: Hon. John T. Stuart, John A. Chestnut, Colonel John Williams, Hon. Shelby M. Cullom, Hon. J. C. Conkling, Dr. A. W. French, Jacob Bunn, Hon. Milton Hay.

The following named comprise the faculty of the institution for 1881-2:

Mrs. M. McKee Homes, Principal, Morals and Metaphysics.

Miss Margerie Constant, History, Rhetoric, and English Literature.

Miss Clara H. Page, Mathematics.

The Bettie Stuart Institute is situated on Fourth street, near the Executive Mansion, and in the most beautiful and eligible part of the city. The grounds are ample, and the building is large, commodious and well ventilated.

No better recommendation of the school can be desired than the record of the past thirteen years. In this time it has graduated more than sixty young ladies, whose symmetrical development of intellectual and moral character fits them equally for society and the responsibilities of life. While aiming at thoroughness, the personal peculiarities of pupils are also studied, and the course of instruction adapted to individual needs. The highest advancement of scholars must ever be dependent upon an intelligent and sympathetic analysis of individual character.

All the pupils of this school have written examinations the first Wednesday of each month, and oral at the close of each term. The pupils are not only made familiar with the contents of their text books, but are taught to apply the principles there learned and to reason independently. A special advantage of the Bettie Stuart Institute over boarding schools in general, is its home-like character. Not content with mere intellectual development, special attention is given to the social and moral culture of the pupils. A symmetrical Christian womanhood is the end desired in the system of education pursued. Parents may feel in leaving their daughters at the Bettie Stuart, that none of the home comforts will be missed by them; that their health will be carefully watched over, and that loving interest will be given them.

ST. AGATHA'S SCHOOL.

This institution of learning commenced operations in 1881, and is under the supervision of Rt. Rev. George F. Seymour, D. D., L. L. A., Bishop of the Diocese.

BETTIE STUART INSTITUTE, SPRINGFIELD, ILLINOIS.

St. Agatha's School is admirably situated in the central part of the city. It is on the same street with the State House, and is in the midst of a beautiful lawn and garden of over three acres in extent, affording the advantages of the country in the very heart of the city, securing the best air and opportunities for exercise for the pupils. The house is large, dry, well ventilated, and every attention paid to the health and comfort of the pupils. Misses Murdoch and Dusenberre give careful attention to the thorough education of those confided to their care; and the discipline firm, though gentle. All the usual branches are taught, and it will be the constant aim of the Principals to sustain a high standard of scholarship. The Primary Department receives careful attention; and in it, French and drawing are taught without extra charge. Unusual advantages are enjoyed for the study of Natural Sciences, and an experienced and accomplished teacher has been secured for that department. St. Agatha's School will not only afford its pupils a thorough course in the ordinary branches of education under experienced and efficient teachers, but it will do this under the eye of the Church, and in connection with that moral and religious training which is of the very first importance in the formation of a true and lofty womanhood. The school will embrace three courses—Primary, Academic and Collegiate.

CHAPTER XXI.

ILLUSTRIOUS AND PROMINENT DEAD.

"Earth to earth and dust to dust" is the common lot of all men. Neither rank nor station in life will exempt one from a call from that grim monster, Death. His calls are made to suit the pleasure of none. He comes unbidden, and often chooses the fairest and the best. In this chapter are given a few, and but a few, of the illustrious and prominent men of Sangamon county who have been summoned to a brighter world, and whose memories are cherished by those who remain this side the "valley and shadow of death."

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

Abraham Lincoln, the great and the good, the martyr President. The historian, in the necessarily short sketches given, can but feel his inability to do justice to so worthy a name. The following is a copy of a letter written by Mr. Lincoln in December, 1852, to Jesse W. Fell, of Bloomington, Illinois. The letter was not written for publication, but, containing the only words ever written by Mr. Lincoln of himself and family, are worthy of preservation:

"I was born February 12, 1809, in Hardin county, Kentucky. My parents were both born in Virginia, of undistinguished families—second families—perhaps I should say. My mother, who died in my tenth year, was of a family of the name of Hanks, some of whom now reside in Adams, and others in Macon counties, Illinois. My paternal grandfather, Abraham Lincoln, emigrated from Rockingham county, Virginia, about 1781 or '82, where, a year or two later, he was killed by Indians, not in battle, but by stealth, when he was laboring to open up a farm in the forest. His ancestors, who were Quakers, went to Virginia from Berks county, Pennsylvania. An effort to identify them with the New England family of the same name ended in nothing more definite than a similarity of Christian names in both families, such as Enoch, Levi, Mordecai, Solomon, Abraham, and the like.

"My father, at the death of his father, was but six years of age, and he grew up literally without education. He removed from Kentucky to what is now Spencer county, Indiana, in my eighth year. We reached our new home about the time the State came into the Union. It was a wild region, with many bears and other wild animals still in the woods. There I grew up. There were some schools, so called, but no qualification was ever required of a teacher beyond "readin', 'ritin', and cipherin'" to the rule of three. If a straggler, supposed to understand Latin happened to sojourn in the neighborhood, he was looked upon as a wizard. There was absolutely nothing to excite ambition for education. Of course, when I came of age, I did not know much; still, somehow I could read, write, and cipher to the rule of three, but that was all. I have not been to school since. The little advance I now have upon this store of education, I have picked up from time to time, under the pressure of necessity.

"I was raised to farm work, which I continued till I was twenty-two. At twenty-one I came to Illinois, and passed the first year in Macon county. Then I got to New Salem, at that time in Sangamon, now in Menard county, where I remained a year, as a sort of clerk in a store. Then came the Black Hawk war, and I was elected Captain of Volunteers, a success which gave me more pleasur^e than any I have had since. I went the campaign, was elated; ran for the legislature the same year—1832—and was beaten, the only time I ever have been beaten by the people. The next, and three succeeding biennial elections, I was elected to the legislature. I was not a candidate afterwards. During this legislative period I had studied law, and removed to Springfield to practice it. In 1846, I was once elected to the lower house of Congress; was not a candidate for re-election. From 1849 to 1854, both inclusive, practiced law more assiduously than ever before. Always a Whig in politics, and generally on Whig electoral tickets, making active canvasses; I was losing interest in politics, when the repeal of the Missouri Compromise aroused me again. What I have done since then is pretty well known.

"If any personal description of me is thought desirable, it may be said, I am in height, six feet four inches, nearly, lean in flesh, weighing on an average one hundred and eighty pounds, dark complexion, with coarse black hair and gray eyes; no other marks or brands recollected.

"Yours, very truly.

"A. LINCOLN."

Hon. J. W. Fell.

Mr. Lincoln was always active in public affairs, and was always an acknowledged leader. As he remarked in his letter, the repeal of the Missouri Compromise aroused him, and he united with others in the formation of the Republican party, becoming its acknowledged leader. In 1858, he was a candidate for United States Senator, to succeed Stephen A. Douglas, whose term was drawing to a close. Contrary to the usual custom with candidates for that office, instead of aiming to influence the members of the legislature, by whose votes the choice is made, the contest was brought directly before the people, in order to influence their action in choosing members of the legislature, who were to choose a United States Senator. That led to seven joint debates between Mr. Lincoln and Mr. Douglas, in different parts of the State of Illinois. Mr. Douglas was elected as his own successor, but Mr. Lincoln's speeches in that campaign gave him a National reputation, and proved that his understanding of the slavery question was more clear and comprehensive than that of any other man in the Nation. This led to his being chosen by the Republican National Convention, which assembled in Chicago in June, 1860, as the candidate of that party for the office of President of the United States. After an exciting campaign, he was triumphantly elected, in November of that year, and inaugurated at Washington, March 4, 1861. It is unnecessary to follow his career during the long and bloody war that followed. In that struggle, he placed his reliance upon the Almighty God, as is clearly shown in the following letter, written in September, 1864, to a member of the Society of Friends:

"EXECUTIVE MANSION,

"WASHINGTON, September 4, 1864. }

Eliza P. Gurney:

"MY ESTEEMED FRIEND—I have not forgotten—probably never shall forget—the very impressive occasion when yourself and friends visited me, on a Sabbath forenoon, two years ago; nor has your kind letter, written nearly a year later, ever been forgotten. In all, it has been your purpose to strengthen my reliance on God. I am much indebted to the good Christian people of this country for their constant prayers and consolations; and to no one of them more than yourself. The purposes of the Almighty are perfect, and must prevail, although we erring mortals may fail to accurately perceive them in advance. We hoped for a happy termination of this terrible war long before this; but God knows best, and has ruled otherwise. We shall yet acknowledge His wisdom and our error therein. Meanwhile, we must work earnestly in the best light He gives us, trusting that so working still conduces to the great ends He ordains. Surely, He intends some great good to follow this mighty convulsion, which no mortal could make, and no mortal could stay.

"Your people, the Friends, have had, and are having, a very great trial. On principle and faith, opposed to both war and oppression, they can only practically oppose oppression by war. In this hard dilemma, some have chosen one horn, and some the other. For those appealing to me on conscientious grounds, I have done, and shall do, the best I could and can, in my own conscience, under my oath to the law. That you believe this, I doubt not; and, believing it, I shall still receive, for our country and myself, your earnest prayers to our Father in Heaven.

Your sincere friend,

"A. LINCOLN."

No man ever discharged his duties more honestly, more faithfully, than did Abraham Lincoln. With a heart full of tender mercy, he loved all mankind, and knowingly would wrong no man. The South never had a more trusty friend, and in his death they lost one who could and would have done them more good than possible for any other man. On the evening of April 14 1865, while in attendance on a performance at Ford's Theater, in Washington, he was shot down by the hands of a cowardly assassin, and breathed his last on the morning of the 15th. An account of the deep grief, the respect paid his memory, the great funeral cortege reaching from the Capital of the Nation to his late home in Springfield, will be found elsewhere in this work. His remains now lay in a beautiful tomb, erected by a grateful people, in Oak Ridge Cemetery, and is annually visited by thousands of people.

The following tribute to his memory is embodied in an address by Isaac N. Arnold, a lifelong friend of Lincoln, before the Royal Historical Society, of London, England, and is worthy of its author and the subject treated:

"The noblest inheritance we Americans, derive from our British ancestors is the memory and example of the great and good men who adorn your history. They are as much appreciated and honored on our side of the Atlantic as on this. In giving to the English-speaking world, Washington and Lincoln we think we repay, in large part, our obligation. Their pre-eminence in American history is recognized, and the republic, which the one founded and the other preserved, has, already, crowned them as models for her children.

"In the annals of almost every great Nation some names appear standing out clear and prominent, names of those who have influenced, or controlled, the great events which make up history. Such were Wallace and Bruce, in Scotland, Alfred and the Edwards, William the Conqueror, Cromwell, Pitt, Nelson and Wellington, in England, and such in a still greater degree were Washington and Lincoln.

"I am here, from near his home, with the hope that I may, to some extent, aid you in forming a just and true estimate of Abraham Lincoln. I knew him, somewhat intimately, in private and public life for more than twenty years. We practiced law at the same bar, and, during his administration, I was a member of Congress, seeing him and conferring with him often, and therefore, I may hope without vanity, I trust that I shall be able to contribute something of value in enabling you to judge of him. We in America, as well as you in the old world, believe that "blood will tell;" that it is a great blessing to have had an honorable and worthy ancestry. We believe that moral principle, physical and intellectual vigor in the forefathers are qualities likely to be manifested in the descendants. Fools are not the fathers or mothers of great men. I claim for Lincoln, humble as was the station to which he was born, and rude and rough as were his early surroundings, that he had such ancestors. I mean that his father and mother, his grandfather and grandmother, and still further back, however humble and rugged their condition, were physically and mentally strong, vigorous men and women; hardy and successful pioneers on the frontier of American civilization. They were among the early settlers in Virginia, Kentucky and Illinois, and knew how to take care of themselves in the midst of difficulties and perils; how to live and succeed when the weak would perish. These ancestors of Lincoln, for several generations, kept on the very crest of the wave of Western settlements—on the frontier, where the struggle for life was hard and the strong alone survived.

"His grandfather, Abraham Lincoln, and his father, Thomas, were born in Rockingham County, Virginia.

"About 1781, while his father was still a lad, his grandfather's family emigrated to Kentucky, and was a contemporary with Daniel Boone, the celebrated Indian fighter and early hero of that State. This, a then wild and wooded territory, was the scene of those fierce and desperate conflicts between the settlers and the Indians which gave it the name of 'The dark and bloody ground.'

"When Thomas Lincoln, the father of the President, was six years old, his father (Abraham, the grandfather of the President), was shot and instantly killed by an Indian. The boy and his father were at work in the corn-field, near their log-cabin home. Mordecai, the elder brother of the lad, at work not far away, witnessed the attack. He saw his father fall, and ran to the cabin, seized his ready-loaded rifle and springing to the loop-hole cut through the logs, he saw the Indian, who had seized the boy, carrying him away. Raising his rifle and aiming at a silver medal, conspicuous on the breast of the Indian, he instantly fired. The Indian fell, and the lad, springing to his feet, ran to the open arms of his mother, at the cabin door. Amid such scenes, the Lincoln family naturally produced rude, rough, hardy, and fearless men, familiar with wood-craft; men who could meet the extremes of exposure and fatigue, who knew how to find food and shelter in the forest; men of great powers of endurance—brave and self-reliant, true and faithful to their friends and dangerous to their enemies. Men with minds to conceive and hands to execute bold enterprises.

"It is a curious fact that the grandfather, Abraham Lincoln, is noted on the surveys of Daniel Boone as having purchased, of the government, five hundred acres of land. Thomas Lincoln, the father, was also the purchaser of government land, and President Lincoln left, as a part of his estate, a quarter-section (one hundred and sixty acres), which he had received from the United States, for services rendered in early life as a volunteer soldier in the Black Hawk Indian war. Thus for three generations the Lincoln family were land owners directly from the government.

"Such was the lineage and family from which President Lincoln sprung. Such was the environment in which his character was developed.

"He was born in a log cabin, in Kentucky, on the 12th of February, 1809.

"It will aid you in picturing to yourself this young man and his surroundings, to know that from boyhood to the age of twenty-one, in winter, his head was protected from the cold by a cap made of the skin of the coon, fox, or prairie wolf, and that he often wore the buckskin breeches and hunting-shirt of the pioneer.

"He grew up to be a man of majestic stature and Herculean strength. Had he appeared in England or Normandy, some centuries ago, he would have been the founder of some great Baronial family, possibly of a Royal dynasty. He could have wielded, with ease, the two-handed sword of Guy, the great Earl of Warwick, or the battle-axe of Richard of the Lion-heart.

HIS EDUCATION AND TRAINING.

"The world is naturally interested in knowing what was the education and training which fitted Lincoln for the great work which he accomplished. On the extreme frontier, the means of book-learning was very limited. The common free schools, which now closely follow the heels of the pioneer and organized civil government, and prevail all over the United States, had not then reached the Far West. An itinerant school-teacher wandered occasionally into a settlement, opened a private school for a few months, and, at such, Lincoln attended at different times in all about twelve months. His mother, who was a woman of practical good sense, of strong physical organization, of deep religious feeling, gentle and self-reliant, taught him to read and write.

Although she died when he was only nine years old, she had already laid deep the foundations of his excellence. Perfect truthfulness and integrity, love of justice, self-control, reverence for God, these constituted the solid basis of his character. These were all implanted and carefully cultivated by his mother, and he always spoke of her with the deepest respect and the most tender affection. 'All that I am, or hope to be,' said he, when President, 'I owe to my sainted mother.'

"He early manifested the most eager desire to learn, but there were no libraries and few books in the back settlements in which he lived. Among the stray volumes, which he found in the possession of the illiterate families by which he was surrounded, were Æsop's Fables, Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress, a life of Washington, the poems of Burns, and the Bible. To these his reading was confined, and he read them over and over again, until they became as familiar almost as the alphabet. His memory was marvelous, and I never yet met the man more familiar with the Bible than Abraham Lincoln. This was apparent in after-life, both from his conversation and writings, scarcely a speech or State paper of his in which illustrations and allusions from the Bible cannot be found.

"While a young man, he made for himself, of coarse paper, a scrap-book, into which he copied everything which particularly pleased him. He found an old English grammar, which he studied by himself; and he formed, from his constant study of the Bible, that simple, plain, clear Anglo-Saxon style, so effective with the people. He illustrated the maxim that it is better to know thoroughly a few good books than to skim over many. When fifteen years old, he began (with a view of improving himself) to write on various subjects and to practice in making political and other speeches. These he made so amusing and attractive that his father had to forbid his making them in working hours, for, said he, 'when Abe begins to speak, all the hands flock to hear him.' His memory was so retentive that he could repeat, verbatim, the sermons and political speeches which he heard.

"While his days were spent in hard, manual labor, and his evenings in study, he grew up strong in body, healthful in mind, with no bad habits; no stain of intemperance, profanity or vice of any kind. He used neither tobacco nor intoxicating drinks, and, thus living, he grew to be six feet four inches high, and a giant in strength. In all athletic sports he had no equal. I have heard an old comrade say, 'he could strike the hardest blow with the woodman's axe, and the maul of the rail-splitter, jump higher, run faster than any of his fellows, and there were none, far or near, who could lay him on his back.' Kind and cordial, he early developed so much wit and humor, such a capacity for narrative and story-telling, that he was everywhere a most welcome guest.

A LAND SURVEYOR.

"Like Washington, he became, in early life, a good practical surveyor, and I have, in my library, the identical book from which, at eighteen years of age, he studied the art of surveying. By his skill and accuracy, and by the neatness of his work, he was sought after by the settlers, to survey and fix the boundaries of their farms, and in this way, in part, he earned a support while he studied law. In 1837, self-taught, he was admitted and licensed, by the Supreme Court of Illinois, to practice law.

A LAWYER.

"It is difficult for me to describe, and, perhaps, more difficult for you to conceive the contrast when Lincoln began to practice law, between the forms of the administration of justice in Westminster Hall, and in the rude log courthouse of Illinois. I recall to-day what was said a few years ago by an Illinois friend, when we visited, for the first time, Westminster Abbey, and as we passed into Westminster Hall. 'This,' he exclaimed, 'this is the grandest forum in the world. Here Fox, Burke, and Sheridan hurled their denunciations against Warren Hastings. Here Brougham defeated Queen Caroline. And this,' he went on to repeat, in the words of Macauley, (words as familiar in America as here) 'This is the great hall of William Rufus, the hall which has resounded with acclamations at the inauguration of thirty kings, and which has witnessed the trials of Bacon and Somers and Stafford and Charles the First.' 'And yet,' I replied, 'I have seen justice administered on the prairies of Illinois without pomp or ceremony, everything simple to rudeness, and yet, when Lincoln and Douglas led at that bar, I have seen justice administered by judges as pure, aided by advocates as eloquent, if not as learned, as any who ever presided, or plead, in Westminster Hall.'

"The common law of England (said to be the perfection of human wisdom) was administered in both forums, and the decision of each tribunal were cited as authority in the other; both illustrating that reverence for, and obedience to, law, which is the glory of the English-speaking race.

"Lincoln was a great lawyer. He sought to convince rather by the application of principle than by the citation of authorities. On the whole, he was stronger with the jury than with the court. I do not know that there has ever been, in America, a greater or more successful advocate before a jury, on the right side, than Abraham Lincoln. He had a marvelous power of conciliating and impressing everyone in his favor. A stranger entering the court, ignorant of the case, and listening a few moments to Lincoln, would find himself involuntarily on his side and wishing him success. He was a quick and accurate reader of character, and seemed to comprehend, almost intuitively, the peculiarities of those with whom he came in contact. His manner was so candid, his methods so direct, so fair, he seemed so anxious that truth and justice should prevail, that everyone wished him success. He excelled in the statement of his case. However complicated, he would disentangle it, and present the important and turning point in a way so clear that all could understand. Indeed, his statement often alone won his cause, rendering argument unnecessary. The judges would often stop him by saying, 'If that is the case, Brother Lincoln, we will hear the other side.'

"His ability in examining a witness, in bringing out clearly the important facts, was only surpassed by his skillful cross-examinations. He could often compel a witness to tell the truth where he meant to lie. He could make a jury laugh, and generally weep, at his pleasure. On the right side, and when fraud or injustice were to be exposed, or innocence vindicated, he rose to the highest range of eloquence, and was irresistible. But he must have faith in his cause to bring out his full strength. His wit and humor, his quaint and homely illustrations, his inexhaustible stores of anecdote, always to the point, added greatly to his power as a jury advocate.

"He never mis-stated evidence or misrepresented his opponent's case, but met it fairly and squarely.

"He remained in active practice until his nomination, in May, 1860, for the Presidency. He was employed in the leading cases in both the Federal and State Courts, and had a large clientage, not only in Illinois, but was frequently called, on special retainers, to other States.

AN ILLINOIS POLITICIAN.

"By his eloquence and popularity he became, early in life, the leader of the old Whig party, in Illinois. He served as member of the State Legislature, was the candidate of his party for speaker, presidential elector, and United States Senator, and was a member of the lower house of Congress.

SLAVERY.

"When the independence of the American Republic was established, African slavery was tolerated as a local and temporary institution. It was in conflict with the moral sense, the religious convictions of the people, and the political principles on which the government was founded.

"But having been tolerated, it soon became an organized, aggressive power, and, later, it became the master of the government. Conscious of its inherent weakness, it demanded and obtained additional territory for its expansion. First, the great Louisiana territory was purchased, then Florida, and then Texas.

"By the repeal, in 1854, of the prohibition of slavery north of the line of thirty-six degrees, thirty minutes of latitude (known in America as the 'Missouri Compromise'), the slavery question became the leading one in American politics, and the absorbing and exciting topic of discussion. It shattered into fragments the old conservative Whig party, with which Mr. Lincoln had, theretofore, acted. It divided the Democratic party, and new parties were organized upon issues growing directly out of the question of slavery.

"The leader of that portion of the Democratic party which continued, for a time, to act with the slavery party, was Stephen Arnold Douglas, then representing Illinois in the United States Senate. He was a bold, ambitious, able man, and had, thus far, been uniformly successful. He had introduced and carried through Congress, against the most vehement opposition, the repeal of the law, prohibiting slavery, called the Missouri Compromise.

THE CONTEST BETWEEN FREEDOM AND SLAVERY IN THE TERRITORIES.

"The issue having been now distinctly made between freedom and the extension of slavery into the territories, Lincoln and Douglas, the leaders of the Free-soil and Democratic parties, became more than ever antagonized. The conflict between freedom and slavery now became earnest, fierce and violent, beyond all previous political controversies. and from this time on, Lincoln plead the cause of liberty with an energy, ability and eloquence, which rapidly gained for him a national reputation. From this time on, through the tremendous struggle, it was he who grasped the helm and led his party to victory. Conscious of a great cause, inspired by a generous love of liberty, and animated by the moral sublimity of his great theme, he proclaimed his determination, ever thereafter, 'to speak for freedom, and against slavery, until everywhere the sun shall shine, the rain shall fall, and the wind blow upon no man who goes forth to unrequited to.'

THE LINCOLN AND DOUGLAS DEBATE.

The great debate between Lincoln and Douglas, in 1858, was, unquestionably, both with reference to the ability of the speakers and its influence upon opinion and events, the most important in American history. I do not think I do injustice to others, nor over-estimate their importance, when I say that the speeches of Lincoln published, circulated and read throughout the Free States, did more than any other agency in creating the public opinion, which prepared the way for the overthrow of slavery. The speeches of John Quincy Adams, and those of Senator Sumner, were more learned and scholarly, and those of Lovejoy and Wendel Phillips were more vehement and impassioned; Senators Seward, Chase and Hale spoke from a more conspicuous forum, but Lincoln's speeches were as philosophic, as able, as earnest as any, and his manner has a simplicity and directness, a clearness of illustration, and his language a plainness, a vigor, an Anglo-Saxon strength, better adapted than any other, to reach and influence the understanding and sentiment of the common people.

"At the time of this memorable discussion, both Lincoln and Douglas were in the full maturity of their powers. Douglas being forty-five and Lincoln forty-nine years old. Douglas had had a long training and experience as a popular speaker. On the hustings (stump, as we say in America) and in Congress, and especially in the United States Senate, he had been accustomed to meet the ablest debaters of his State and of the Nation.

"His friends insisted that never, either in conflict with a single opponent, or when repelling the assaults of a whole party, had he been discomfited. His manner was bold, vigorous, and aggressive. He was ready, fertile in resources, familiar with political history, strong and severe in denunciation, and he handled, with skill, all the weapons of the dialectician. His iron will, tireless energy, united with physical and moral courage, and great personal magnetism, made him a natural leader, and gave him personal popularity.

"Lincoln was also now a thoroughly trained speaker. He had contended successfully at the bar, in the legislature, and before the people, with the ablest men of the West, including Douglas, with whom he always rather sought than avoided a discussion. But he was a courteous and generous opponent, as is illustrated by the following beautiful allusion to his rival, made in 1856, in one of their joint debates. 'Twenty years ago, Judge Douglas and I first became acquainted; we were both young then; he a trifle younger than I. Even then, we were both ambitious, I, perhaps, quite as much as he. With me, the race of ambition has been a flat failure. With him, it has been a splendid success. His name fills the Nation, and is not unknown in foreign lands. I affect no contempt for the high eminence he has reached; so reached, that the oppressed of my species might have shared with me in the elevation. I would rather stand on that eminence than wear the richest crown that ever pressed a monarch's brow.'

"We know, and the world knows, that Lincoln did reach that high, nay, far higher eminence, and that he did reach it in such a way that the 'oppressed' did share with him in the elevation.

"Such were the champions who, in 1858, were to discuss, before the voters of Illinois, and with the whole Nation as spectators, the political questions then pending, and especially the vital questions relating to slavery. It was not a single combat, but extended through a whole campaign.

"On the return of Douglas from Washington, to Illinois, in July, 1858, Lincoln and Douglas being candidates for the Senate, the former challenged his rival to a series of joint debates, to be held at the principal towns in the State. The challenge was accepted, and it was agreed that each discussion should occupy three hours, that the speakers should alternate in the opening and the close—the opening speech to occupy one hour, the reply one hour and a half, and the close half an hour. The meetings were held in the open air, for no hall could hold the vast crowds which attended.

"In addition to the immense mass of hearers, reporters, from all the principal newspapers in the country, attended, so that the morning after each debate, the speeches were published, and eagerly read by a large part, perhaps a majority of all the voters of the United States.

"The attention of the American people was thus arrested, and they watched with intense interest, and devoured every argument of the champions.

"Each of these great men, I doubt not, at that time, sincerely believed he was right. Douglas' ardor, while in such a conflict, would make him think, for the time being, he was right, and I know that Lincoln argued for freedom against the extension of slavery with the most profound conviction that on the result hung the fate of his country. Lincoln had two advantages over Douglas; he had the best side of the question, and the best temper. He was always good humored, always had an apt story for illustration, while Douglas sometimes, when hard pressed, was irritable.

"Douglas carried away the most popular applause, but Lincoln made the deeper and more lasting impression. Douglas did not disdain an immediate ad captandum triumph, while Lincoln aimed at permanent conviction. Sometimes, when Lincoln's friends urged him to raise a storm of applause (which he could always do by his happy illustrations and amusing stories), he refused, saying the occasion was too serious, the issue too grave. 'I do not seek applause,' said he, 'nor to amuse the people, I want to convince them.'

"It was often observed, during this canvass, that while Douglas was sometimes greeted with the loudest cheers, when Lincoln closed, the people seemed solemn and serious, and could be heard, all through the crowd, gravely and anxiously discussing the topics on which he had been speaking.

Douglas secured the immediate object of the struggle, but the manly bearing, the vigorous logic, the honesty and sincerity, the great intellectual powers, exhibited by Mr. Lincoln, prepared the way, and, two years later, secured his nomination and election to the Presidency. It is a touching incident, illustrating the patriotism of both these statesmen, that, widely as they differed, and keen as had been their rivalry, just as soon as the life of the Republic was menaced, by treason, they joined hands to shield and save the country they loved.

"The echo and prophecy of this great debate was heard, and inspired hope in the far-off cotton and rice-fields of the South. The toiling blacks, to use the words of Whittier, began hopefully to pray:

" 'We pray de Lord. He gib us signs
Dat some day we be free,
De Norf wind tell it to de pines,
De wild duck to de sea.

" 'We tink it when de church-bell ring,
We dream it in de dream,
De rice-bird mean it when he sing,
De eagle when he scream.'

THE COOPER-INSTITUTE SPEECH.

"In February, 1860, Mr. Lincoln was called to address the people of New York, and, speaking to a vast audience, at the Cooper Institute (the Exeter Hall of the United States), the poet Bryant presiding, he made, perhaps, the most learned, logical, and exhaustive speech to be found in American anti-slavery literature. The question was, the power of the National Government to exclude slavery from the Territories. The orator from the prairies, the morning after this speech, awoke to find himself famous.

"He closed with these words, 'Let us have faith that right makes might, and in that faith let us, to the end, do our duty as we understand it.'

"This address was the carefully finished product of, not an orator and statesman only, but also of an accurate student of American history. It confirmed and elevated the reputation he had already acquired in the Douglas debates, and caused his nomination and election to the Presidency.

"If time permitted, I would like to follow Mr. Lincoln, step by step, to enumerate his measures one after another, until by prudence and courage, and matchless statesmanship, he led the loyal people of the Republic to the final and complete overthrow of slavery and the restoration of the Union.

"From the time he left his humble home in Illinois, to assume the responsibilities of power, the political horizon black with treason and rebellion, the terrific thunder clouds,—the tempest which had been gathering and growing more black and threatening for years, now ready to explode,—on and on, through long years of bloody war, down to his final triumph and death—what a drama! His eventful life terminated by his tragic death, has it not the dramatic unities, and the awful ending, of the Old Greek tragedy?

HIS FAREWELL TO HIS NEIGHBORS.

"I know of nothing in history, more pathetic than the scene when he bade good-bye to his old friends and neighbors. Conscious of the difficulties and dangers before him, difficulties which seemed almost insurmountable, with a sadness as though a presentment that he should return no more was pressing upon him, but with a deep religious trust which was characteristic, on the platform of the rail-carriage, which was to bear him away to the Capital, he paused and said, 'No one can realize the sadness I feel at this parting. Here I have lived more than a quarter of a century. Here my children were born, and here one of them lies buried. I know not how soon I shall see you again. I go to assume a task more difficult than that which has devolved upon any other man since the days of Washington. He never would have succeeded but for the aid of Divine Providence, upon which, at all times, he relied. * * * I hope you, my dear friends, will all pray that I may receive that Divine assistance, without which I cannot succeed, but with which, success is certain.'

"And as he waved his hand in farewell to the old home, to which he was never to return, he heard the response from many old friends, 'God bless and keep you.' 'God protect you from all traitors.' His neighbors 'sorrowing most of all, for the fear 'that they should see his face no more.'

HIS INAUGURAL AND APPEAL FOR PEACE.

"In his inaugural address, spoken in the open air, and from the eastern portico of the capitol, and heard by thrice ten thousand people, on the very verge of civil war, he made a most earnest appeal for peace. He gave the most solemn assurance, that 'the property, peace, and security of no portion of the Republic should be endangered by his administration.' But he declared, with firmness, that the Union of the States must be 'perpetual,' and that he should 'execute the laws faithfully in every State.' 'In doing this,' said he, 'there need be no blood shed nor violence, nor shall there be, unless forced upon the National Authority.' In regard to the difficulties which thus divided the people, he appealed to all to abstain from precipitate action, assuring them that intelligence, patriotism, and a firm reliance on Him, who had never yet forsaken the Republic, 'were competent to adjust, in the best way, all existing troubles.'

"His closing appeal, against civil war, was most touching, 'In your hands,' said he, and his voice, for the first time faltered, 'In your hands, and not in mine, are the momentous issues of civil war.' * * * 'You can have no conflict without being yourselves the aggressors.'
